LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 10200.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 14, 1927.

Rehearing Denied with Modification Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨419—Evidence held to authorize Industrial Accident Commission's finding that total temporary disability had not terminated.

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that total temporary disability of employee whose eye and cheek had been injured by flying splinter had not terminated held authorized under evidence.

2. Master and servant ⇨416—Ordering payment for surgical operations on employee's face, mainly for cosmetic purposes, held within authority of Industrial Accident Commission (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 9, subd. [a], as amended).

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 9, subd. (a), being St. 1917, p. 836, as amended, the Industrial Accident Commission has power to order employer to pay for surgical operations on employee's face, notwithstanding that the major object of the proposed operations is for cosmetic purposes only.

3. Master and servant ⇨416—Finding under statute that employer's hospital facilities were inadequate held unnecessary, where order to pay for private treatment was conditioned on employer's failure to furnish it (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 10).

Finding of inadequate facilities under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 10 (St. 1917, p. 840), providing that the Industrial Accident Commission might, after notice and opportunity to be heard, declare employer's hospital facilities inadequate, and thereafter employee might procure treatment elsewhere, held unnecessary, where an order to pay for private treatment was expressly made conditional on employer's failure to furnish treatment ordered.

4. Master and servant ⇨416—Order requiring employer to furnish surgical treatment, or, on its neglect or refusal, to pay expenses for such treatment, held proper.

Order requiring employer to furnish to injured employee within a reasonable time certain surgical treatment, recommended in the doctor's report, and that, if the defendant should neglect or refuse to furnish such treatment within reasonable time the employee might secure treatment from his own physician at the employer's expense, held proper, where employer, after twenty-two operations, admitted inability to furnish further relief.

5. Master and servant ⇨417(5)—Whether Industrial Accident Commission exceeded powers in refusing to furnish employer transcript of hearing cannot be considered in petition for certiorari.

Whether, upon payment by employer of fees prescribed by statute, the Industrial Accident Commission exceeded its powers by refusing to furnish him with a transcript of the hearing before the commission, cannot be considered in a petition for writ of review.

Application by County of Los Angeles, employer, to the Industrial Accident Commission, for the termination of a continuing award to Philip Nelson, employee, with request that the percentage of the employee's permanent disability be fixed and determined. Order denying application, continuing compensation, and ordering further medical and surgical treatment. Employer petitions for certiorari to review the order. Award affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, see 259 P. 369.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Dep. County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

PER CURIAM. This proceeding comes before this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, First Division, Mr. Justice Houser having written the opinion for that court. 259 P. 369. We are in accord with said opinion in many respects, and adopt and approve the following portion thereof:

"Certiorari. The purpose of this proceeding is to review certain findings, orders, and the award made in pursuance of an application to the respondent commission by an employee for adjustment of compensation as a result of injuries sustained by him while acting within the scope of his employment with the petitioner herein.

[1] "From the record it appears that the employee, who was engaged as a 'spudder' on a pile driver operated by the petitioner, suffered an injury by reason of a large splinter which 'flew off a pile, striking him, proximately causing injury to the right eye and cheek'; that in due course, on findings of temporary total disability, an award of continuing compensation and an order for future medical and surgical treatment of the employee were made by the Industrial Accident Commission, the respondent herein; that approximately twenty months thereafter, on the ground that the disability of the employee had become permanent, the employer (petitioner herein) filed an application with respondent commission for the termination of the continuing award to the employee, together with a request that the percentage of such permanent disability be fixed and determined by said commission—which petition finally resulted in an order by said commission denying the employer's application that the award as theretofore made and then in force as to continuing compensation to said employee be terminated, at the same time ordering further medical and surgical treatment of the employee.

"The findings made by the commission, together with its order last mentioned, were as follows:

"That the temporary total disability, resulting from the injury sustained by the employee on February 7, 1923, has not yet terminated.

"That further operative treatment as recommended in the report of Dr. George W. Pierce, dated April 21, 1926, should be furnished to the employee at the expense of the defendant county of Los Angeles. * * *

"It is ordered that the defendant's (petitioner's) said petition to terminate indemnity, be, and it hereby is, denied.

"It is further ordered that the said defendant shall furnish to the applicant, within a reasonable time, the further operative treatment recommended in the report of Dr. George W. Pierce, dated April 21, 1926.

"It is further ordered that, should said defendant neglect or refuse to furnish such treatment within a reasonable time from date hereof, the applicant shall be entitled to secure such treatment from his own physician, and said defendant county of Los Angeles will be liable for the reasonable expense thereof, to be determined upon the filing of itemized bills, in duplicate, and the approval of the medical department of this commission."

"The first point presented by petitioner is that the commission acted in excess of its powers in making its finding in effect that total temporary disability of the employee had not terminated. * * *"

The employee Nelson testified as to his condition since sustaining the injury, and particularly as to his condition at the time of the hearing before the commission. He in effect testified that he had not returned to work, and that he had been unable to do any work since his injury; that he had visited his brother at his ranch in Minnesota, and, while there, had assisted in the light chores when he felt well enough, such as driving the cattle and horses into the yard. As to having difficulty with his eye at the time he said: "Yes, lots of it, I cannot get the distance with it." Dr. Pierce testified before the commission that an "examination of the mouth shows sinus opening above the right upper first molar, apparently from antrum. No sulcus behind the lower lid to hold artificial eye. There is a purulent discharge into the mouth." There was undoubtedly sufficient evidence before the commission to justify the finding that total temporary disability of the employee had not terminated.

We also adopt and approve the further portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal:

"The next finding and order of the commission to which petitioner directs attention is that wherein in effect it was found and ordered that the employer furnish to the employee 'the further operative treatment recommended in the report of Dr. George W. Pierce'; furthermore, that, should the employer neglect or refuse to furnish such treatment within a reasonable time after the date of the order, at the expense of the employer, the employee should be entitled to secure such treatment from his own physician.

"At the time the report of Dr. Pierce was made, it appears therefrom that the condition of the employee was as follows:

"Present condition: Numerous scars over the entire right cheek; lower border of orbit, sunken, apparently fracture. There is a paresthesia of the upper lid. The palpebral fissure is one-half inch lower than on other side. There is some voluntary contraction in the orbicularis palpebrarum. The upper lid overlaps the lower at the outer canthus and is distorted at this point of adhesions. There is some loss of tissue of the lower lid with irregularity.

"Examination of the mouth shows sinus opening above the right upper first molar, apparently from antrum. No sulcus behind the lower lid to hold artificial eye. There is a purulent discharge from the orbit. There is also a continuous purulent discharge into the mouth. There is some loss of periorbital fat."

"The operative treatment recommended by Dr. Pierce, to which reference was made in the order by the commission, was indicated in the following language:

"There are two different stages of repair necessary in this case: First—is the deepening of the socket, which could be done in one operation by the method of epithelial inlay, and which would not require over one week to ten days, and then the lower lid would require some plastic operation to complete the borders, while the upper lid could be freed and raised up. These operations would not require any great length of time. The second stage would be the cleaning out of the antrum and closure of the sinus. I cannot state just how long this would take.

"By plastic operation, however, the appearance of the patient could be markedly improved, and he would wear an artificial eye."

"It is the contention of petitioner that the proposed operations and treatment recommended by Dr. Pierce were for cosmetic effect only, and that the commission was without jurisdiction to make the order of which complaint is made. But an inspection of the report discloses the fact that in part at least the purpose of the recommended treatment was to relieve the patient from the condition arising primarily from the two 'purulent discharges' referred to in the report, together with the added feature of 'cleaning out the antrum and closure of the sinus.' To that extent, therefore, it is clear that the commission was acting within its statutory powers. The principal attack of petitioner, however, is directed toward that part of the recommendation with reference to the other steps leading to the conclusion that 'the appearance of the patient could be markedly improved and he would wear an artificial eye.'

[2] "To put the position assumed by petitioner perhaps more plainly, it is that petitioner objects to any operation, the expense of which must be borne by it, for the ultimate purpose of so building up the tissues and bony structure surrounding the orbital cavity that the employee may be provided with and wear an artificial eye.

"Section 9[a] of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831, as variously amended) provides that:

"Where liability for compensation under this act exists, such compensation shall be furnished or paid by the employer and be as provided in the following schedule:

"(a) Such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, including artificial members, as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury. * * *

"Respondent directs particular attention to the words 'as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury.' The photographs of the employee, presented at the time of the hearing before the referee, together with the report made by Dr. Pierce (hereinbefore set forth), regarding the condition of the employee shortly preceding the time of the hearing, indicate a deplorable situation so far as the probability of the employee being able to secure employment was concerned.

"On the part of the employer, the purpose of any surgical attempt in connection with an injury received by an employee is to restore him to as nearly a natural and normal condition as may be possible or practicable, to the end that his earning power by reason of his injury may be diminished to the least possible extent. To illustrate: If by accident arising from his employment the foot of a day laborer should be so crushed that by no known surgical skill could it be made useful as a member of his body, the probable medical course and practice would indicate the amputation of the foot. In due course thereafter it is clear that an artificial foot would greatly aid the employee in bringing about a restoration to a considerable extent of his earning power. Could it be doubted that the language of the statute which requires the furnishing by the employer of such surgical treatment, 'including artificial members' as may be required to 'cure and relieve from the effects of the injury,' would be applicable? In the instant case, that the present appearance of the employee would be a decided handicap to his obtaining employment 'in an open labor market' is obvious. The evident purpose of some of the proposed surgical operations on the employee is to give him a more presentable personal appearance. In his present condition, by reason of his limitations and the natural competition in securing employment, it might, and in all probability would, be extremely difficult for the employee to secure even such work as he is capable of doing. If successful, the result of the proposed surgical operations would place the employee, not only in a position where he could secure better and more remunerative employment than at this time he may command, but his improved personal appearance would assist in enabling him to retain such position. The probabilities are that the morale of the employee would be bettered, and his self-respect and appreciation of his good-workmanship qualities be increased—all tending toward a rehabilitation and restoration of the earning powers of the employee as of the date of the injury which he sustained. The principle of the question here under consideration is treated to some extent in the case of New York Central R. Co. v. Bianc, 250 U. S. 596, 40 S. Ct. 44, 63 L. Ed. 1161, where among other things, it is said:

"Even were impairment of earning power the sole justification for imposing compulsory payment of workmen's compensation upon the employer in such cases, it would be sufficient answer to the present contention to say that a serious disfigurement of the face or head reasonably may be regarded as having a direct relation to the injured person's earning power, irrespective of its affect upon his mere capacity for work.

"Under ordinary conditions of life, a serious and unnatural disfigurement of the face or head very probably may have a harmful effect upon the ability of the injured person to obtain or retain employment. Laying aside exceptional cases, which we must assume will be fairly dealt with in the proper and equitable administration of the act, such a disfigurement may render one repulsive or offensive to the sight, displeasing, or at least less pleasing, to employer, to fellow employees, and to patrons or customers. (See Ball v. William Hunt & Sons, A. C. 496, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 782, 106 L. T. N. S. 911, 28 Times L. R. 428, 56 Sol. Jo. 550, 5 B. W. C. C. 459.)

"This court is therefore led to the conclusion that, even though conceding that the major object of the proposed surgical operations on the employee may be for 'cosmetic purposes' only, the respondent commission, in making its order therefore, was not acting in excess of its statutory powers.

[3, 4] "It is also objected by petitioner that 'the Industrial Accident Commission acted without, or in excess of, its powers in ordering petitioner to pay bills covering operative treatment rendered Philip Nelson by private parties prior to a finding upon notice as provided in section 10 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, that petitioner's approved hospital was inadequate.' From an examination of the order by the commission (hereinbefore set forth) relating to petitioner's objection, it will be noted, not that the commission has arbitrarily ordered the employer to pay bills covering operative treatment rendered to the employee prior to a finding that the hospital of petitioner was inadequate, but that, in fact, the order was to the effect that the employer furnish the proposed operative treatment within a reasonable time, or on its neglect or refusal so to do the employee 'be entitled to secure such treatment from his own physician' at the expense of the employer. The point made by petitioner, therefore, is without application to the facts herein. It may, however, be said that the record herein clearly discloses the fact that, after twenty-two surgical operations on the employee, the employer admitted its inability to further relieve the employee from the effect of his injuries. Dr. Pierce, the evidence of whose surgical skill was admitted, promised the desired relief. In such circumstances, assuming the successful outcome of the proposed surgical operations, the case of Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 33, 210 P. 410, is authority for the principle that the employer may be made liable for the necessary expense connected therewith.

[5] "Finally, it is urged by petitioner that the respondent commission acted in excess of its powers in refusing to furnish petitioner with a transcript of the hearing before the commission.

"Without deciding whether in ordinary cir-circumstances, upon payment by the petitioner of the fees prescribed by statute therefor, it becomes the duty of the commission to furnish such transcript, this court is of the opinion that the relief sought is one that cannot be considered in a petition for writ of review.

The award is affirmed.

In re SIEMERS' ESTATE.★
RAFTERY et al. v. KUCK et al.
(S. F. 12024.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 14, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Wills ⚡358—Where minute entry recited granting of application for probate of will and denial of application to establish lost will, but formal findings were made and judgment entered on subsequent date, latter judgment only was appealable.

In will contest where record showed entry in court's minutes reciting granting of application for probate of will and denial of application to establish lost will, and showed filing of certificate of proof and facts, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1317, on same date, and also showed that on subsequent date court signed formal findings of fact, and entered judgment admitting will to probate and denying application to establish lost will, only judgment rendered or appealable held that of latter date; and attempted appeal from granting and denial of applications at time of minute entry would be dismissed.

2. Wills ⚡358—Order denying motion to vacate judgment in will contest held not appealable.

Appeal held not to lie from order denying motion to vacate judgment in will contest; the judgment itself being appealable, so that to permit appeal from the order would allow two appeals.

3. Wills ⚡358—Appeal from order denying new trial in will contest held dismissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 939).

Supreme Court will dismiss attempted appeal from order denying motion for new trial in will contest, since the order is not appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

4. Wills ⚡302(8)—Evidence held to sustain finding that purported lost will was not in fact made.

In will contest, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of trial court that purported lost will was never in fact made.

5. Wills ⚡302(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that decedent did not intend certain instrument to be his will.

In will contest, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that decedent executed alleged will merely to terminate importuning of another to make a will in her favor, and that he did not intend that it should be his will.

6. Wills ⚡367—Notice of appeal, making general reference to order and judgment admitting will to probate, and denying probate of alleged prior will, held to include order denying probate.

Where notice of appeal made general reference to order and judgment admitting will to probate and denying probate of alleged prior will, it was sufficient to include order denying probate of alleged prior will, though it made no express mention of the order.

7. Witnesses ⚡240(2)—Propriety of putting leading questions to own witnesses rests largely in discretion of trial court.

Whether party should be permitted to ask leading questions of his own witnesses rests largely in discretion of trial court.

8. Appeal and error ⚡971(5)—Permitting leading questions will not be held error, in absence of abuse of discretion.

Appellate court will not hold that it was error to permit parties to ask leading questions of their own witnesses, in absence of abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Application by Lillian Kuck and others for probate of will of Johann Diedrich Siemers, deceased, opposed by Catherine Raftery, also known as Catherine Buckle, and another, who made application to establish an alleged lost will. From various orders and judgments, Catherine Raftery and another appeal. Affirmed.

Clarence A. Henning, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Grant & Zimdars, and William P. Hubbard, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. [1] This appeal purports to be from two orders or judgments of Hon. Frank H. Dunne, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, in the matter of the estate of Johann Diedrich Siemers, deceased. One of said orders or judgments, it is claimed by appellants, is an order and judgment of said court dated January 30, 1925, admitting to probate an alleged will of said deceased of date November 1, 1922, and denying the application of Catherine Raftery to establish a lost will as the last will and testament of said deceased, alleged to have been dated May 1, 1923. The other of said orders or judgments so appealed from is a judgment rendered on February 27, 1925, denying the probate of an alleged will of date May 1, 1923, being the alleged lost will bearing said date, and also refusing to admit to probate a writing dated October 1, 1922, as the last will of said deceased, and admitting to probate as the last will and testament of said deceased an instrument bearing date November 1, 1922, and appointing Lillian Kuck executrix of said last will of said deceased. The appeal also purports to be from an order of said court denying a motion for a new trial and from an order denying motion to vacate judgment.

[2, 3] It is contended by appellants that the court rendered two judgments in the same proceeding in the matter of said estate instituted to establish and prove the last will and testament of said deceased; one bearing date the 30th day of January, 1925, and the other of date February 27, 1925. The record, however, on this appeal fails to bear out this contention of appellants. On the other hand, the record shows an entry in the minutes of said court dated January 30, 1925, as follows:

"Application for probate of will dated November 1, 1922, granted. Application to establish lost will said to have been dated May 1, 1923, denied."

On the same day the court signed and annexed to the instrument bearing date November 1, 1922, and filed the same in the papers of said estate, a certificate of the proof and facts found as required by section 1317, Code of Civil Procedure. No other or further order or judgment in said estate was made or entered by the court on said day. On the 27th day of February, 1925, however, the court signed formal findings of fact, and entered judgment in the matter of the contest of the will of said deceased denying the application of Catherine Raftery to establish said alleged lost will of date May 1, 1923, and denying the probate, as the last will of said deceased, of the writing dated October 1, 1922, and admitting to probate, as the last will of said deceased, the instrument dated November 1, 1922, and appointing Lillian Kuck executrix thereof. Therefore the only judgment rendered in said matter was that dated and entered on February 27, 1925. There being no judgment of date January 30, 1925, in said matter, the attempted appeal therefrom is therefore dismissed. No appeal lies from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 939. Neither does an appeal lie in this case from the order denying the motion to vacate the judgment, as the judgment itself is appealable, and on appeal therefrom the order denying the motion to vacate said judgment is reviewable. To permit, therefore, an appeal from such an order would be virtually allowing two appeals from the same order. Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 150 P. 989. The appeals, therefore, from the order denying the motion for a new trial and to vacate the judgment are dismissed. This leaves for our consideration only the appeal from the judgment of date February 27, 1925.

[4] Johann Diedrich Siemers died in the city and county of San Francisco on the 29th day of December, 1923, leaving an estate therein consisting of real and personal property of the value of $20,000 or thereabouts.

After his death there was found in his safe deposit box in the Mission Bank in said city a document purporting to be a will of said deceased, entirely written, dated, and signed by the said deceased. By the terms of this document $2,000 was bequeathed to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco in trust to care for the graves of said deceased and his wife, who had predeceased him; $5,000 to Stiene Kuck, a sister of said deceased; $2,000 to Lillian Kuck, her daughter; and a number of other bequests of $500 each to various relatives of himself and his wife; also a like amount to the Masonic Home situated at Decoto, Cal. Said bequests were preceded by a statement that "I * * * hereby dispose of all my property both real and personal upon my death as follows." The said Lillian Kuck was named in said instrument as the executrix thereof. On January 3, 1924, she filed said instrument in the office of the clerk of said court, together with her petition for the probate thereof, and asked that letters testamentary thereon be issued to her. Her petition was regularly set for hearing and notice thereof given of the time and place of the hearing thereof. In due time the contestants, Catherine Raftery and Mary Raftery, filed their opposition to the probate of said instrument as the last will and testament of said deceased, and in their said written opposition they alleged that, subsequent to the execution of said instrument, of date November 1, 1922, said deceased, on May 1, 1923, executed a writing, which they alleged to be the last will and testament of said deceased, by which instrument he disposed of all his estate, and in which the said Catherine Raftery was named as the executrix thereof. It was further alleged by said contestants that said will was entirely written by said deceased in his own handwriting, had never been revoked or destroyed by said deceased or by any one in authority; that it was left by him at the time of his death as his last will and testament; that by the terms thereof said Catherine Raftery was bequeathed the sum of $10,000, her sister, Mary Raftery, $2,500; that the same bequests were made to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco and the Masonic Home at Decoto as were mentioned in the instrument of November 1, 1922; and that the remainder of his estate was given to his nieces and nephews residing in San Francisco and Germany. Said contestants also alleged that said will was lost and had been destroyed by a person or persons other than deceased, and without his consent, authority, direction, or knowledge, but was at the date of his death in full force and effect. Upon this petition, the said written opposition thereto, and the answer of said Lillian and Stiene Kuck to the said written opposition, said proceeding came on for trial before said court sitting without a jury. During the trial, which began on October 21, 1924, the proponent, Lillian Kuck, produced a writing dated October 1, 1922. This writing appears to have been written entirely by the deceased and purported to dispose of all his real and personal property. Its terms were much the same as those claimed by appellants to have been contained in the instrument of May 1, 1923, which appellants sought to establish as the lost will of said deceased. By the terms of the writing of date October 1, 1922, the said Catherine Rafferty was bequeathed the sum of $10,000, her sister, Mary Rafferty, $2,500, and the same bequests were made to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco and the Masonic Home at Decoto as were asserted to have been made in said alleged lost will. By its terms $2,500 was given to said Stiene Kuck, sister of said deceased, and the remainder of his estate was distributed among his nieces and nephews residing in Germany and San Francisco. The said Catherine Rafferty was by said document appointed the executrix thereof. At the time said Lillian Kuck produced said document of October 1, 1922, she testified that some months after the date of the death of said deceased she and her mother, while searching through a pantry in the house which had been the home of said deceased at the time of his death and for some years prior thereto, the mother of said Lillian Kuck discovered this paper of date October 1, 1922, in a "cubby hole" in this pantry, between the house of said deceased and the adjoining house; that it was inclosed in an envelope marked "Missions Lodge, No. 169 F. A. M. Deliver this my last will to the proper authority only after my death, John D. Siemers"; that with this envelope was found a second envelope addressed to Mrs. Catherine Buckle, 440 Chenery street, San Francisco, Cal. (but not in the deceased's handwriting), in which second envelope were two letters, one dated Roxbury, Mass., November 15, 1923, and the other dated New York City, February 14, 1922. (The evidence shows that these two letters were letters of the appellant Catherine Rafferty.)

This document of date October 1, 1922, was never formally offered for probate either by Catherine Rafferty or by anybody else. No question is made but that the writing dated October 1, 1922, and that dated November 1, 1922, respectively, were entirely in the handwriting of the deceased. The court found that the instrument of date November 1, 1922, was the last will and testament of said deceased; that said deceased did not leave a last will and testament or any writing purporting to be his last will and testament dated May 1, 1923, and no such instrument was lost, or destroyed by any person or persons; that no such instrument as the one alleged of date May 1, 1923, ever existed, or was ever in force or effect or of any validity whatever; that Catherine Rafferty for over one year prior to the death of decedent had persistently importuned the decedent to make a last will and testament in her favor; that decedent, for the purpose of bringing to an end the said importuning, signed the writing dated October 1, 1922, for the purpose of making it appear to said Catherine Rafferty that he had complied with her request; "that the said decedent did not in fact at the time of the signing of the paper of October 1, 1922, intend that the said writing should take effect as his will, but executed the same simply for the purpose, as aforesaid, of bringing to an end the importuning of the said Catherine Rafferty; that, after the signing of said writing, he gave the same into the possession of said Catherine Rafferty; that shortly thereafter he executed the will of November 1, 1922, which the court finds to be the last will and testament of said decedent, and said will of November 1, 1922, he placed in his safe deposit box."

Appellants attack these findings on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support them or any of them. We will first consider the contention of appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the decedent did not leave a last will and testament of date May 1, 1923. This was the purported lost will which appellants sought to establish. At the time of his death, and for some years prior thereto, the deceased had made his home at 987 Guerrero street, in the city of San Francisco. He was 67 years of age at the time of his death, and had been a widower some 10 or 12 years before he died. His sister, Stiene Kuck, and her daughter, Lillian Kuck, lived across the street from his home, and with them he was on friendly terms. He had known Catherine Rafferty some 7 years prior to his death. Up to about 10 weeks before the death of deceased she had lived at 440 Chenery street, in said city, where she took care of a Mr. Buckle. Just how long she had had the care of Buckle, or in what capacity she was rendering him care and attention, does not clearly appear in the record. There is evidence, however, that her name appeared on his death certificate as his wife, and she often went by the name of Mrs. Buckle, although there is no claim that she was ever legally married to him. He died on October 20, 1923, and immediately thereafter she moved to the home of Siemers, where she remained up to the day before the death of Siemers. Prior to taking up her home with Siemers she was often at his house, and the two were frequently in each other's society. The deceased was taken ill only a day or two before his death, which occurred on December 29, 1923. Regarding the purported will of May 1, 1923, Catherine Rafferty testified that in a conversation with deceased held on May 1, 1923, he said to her: "I am going to make a will, and leave you $10,000." She then testified: has somebody to take care of him.' 'I know you will take care of me like that if I am sick.' I was there when he wrote it out. He just sat down and wrote it out. He said he was going to leave it in the Masonic Temple. But he never did leave it there; because he said he was going to write out another one, later on. He didn't say that very day, but he said he was going to show it to some people, and then he left it in the drawer. He took it down to the bank and showed it to Mr. Dunn and Mr. Wood. He said, 'Later on I will write out another one and leave you $15,000.' He didn't write that. * * * I read the will of May 1, 1923, on the same day, May 1, 1923, that he wrote it. I handed it back to him. He put it in the drawer in his room. He put it into an envelope. He wrote on the envelope this, 'To be distributed by the proper authorities,' on the outside. He put the envelope into the bureau drawer in the bedroom on May 1, 1923. I saw the will again on Tuesday, the 11th of December, 1923. The circumstances under which I saw this particular will, dated May 1, 1923, were, I said, 'Dick, I had better do housework; people are talking because I am staying here with you.' He said, 'Oh, they will talk anyway. You don't have to work. This is for you.' So he opened the will and showed it to me, in his, the same, room. He took it out of the drawer and opened it up so that I could see it, and said, 'This is for you, and you don't have to work.' I looked at it and recognized it as being the same will of May 1, 1923, the same one. He put it in the drawer again. That was December 11, 1923. He showed it to me again, and I didn't open it up any more after that. Just previous to December 11th I was in Los Angeles for a week, away from Mr. Siemers. I came back to San Francisco Friday, December 7th. While in Los Angeles Mr. Siemers wrote me and said for me to come back, that he was lonesome for me, and for me to come back. * * * Q. Preceding the death of Mr. Siemers, what was the last time that you saw in this bureau drawer, where Mr. Siemers placed this will in the envelope upon May 1, 1923, what was the last time you saw the envelope in the bureau drawer preceding Mr. Siemers' death? A. I think that very day, but I didn't pay any attention to it at all. On the day of his death I was continuously with Mr. Siemers. * * *

"And then he wrote the will out. This was in his house after we came back from the park, because he said 'nobody took care of his brother when he was sick.' And he said, 'Mr. Buckle

Nita B. O'Neill, a witness on behalf of the contestants, testified that the deceased, on or about December 6, 1923, showed her a writing which he said was his will, which was dated May 1, 1923, and signed Johann Diedrich Siemers. This witness gave the names of the devisees named in said will, and, as given by her, they were practically the same as those which the contestant, Catherine Raftery testified were in the instrument claimed by her to be the will of May 1, 1923. This witness testified that deceased called on her on said day, December 6, 1923, and requested her to write to Catherine Raftery, in Los Angeles, and ask her to come home. He showed her this writing of date May 1, 1923, and his bank book, and said: "This is what I have done for her in case of my death." The witness took the writing which the deceased said was his will and read it over three times. This witness was shown the writing of October 1, 1922, and stated, "I recognize that handwriting as being the same handwriting on the will I saw." Her attention was called to the words "without bonds" interlined in the writing of October 1, 1922, and she said that she saw no such words interlined in the writing of May 1, 1923, which she said the deceased had shown to her and stated it to be his will. Percy A. Wood, a witness in behalf of the contestants, testified that he was an attorney at law, and was assistant trust officer of the Union Trust Company; that some 6 or 7 months prior to January 1, 1924, the deceased, Siemers, and Catherine Raftery came to the bank, and Siemers showed him a writing which he said was his last will and testament, and asked the witness whether it was a legal document. Upon being informed by Siemers that it was written, dated, and signed entirely in his own handwriting, the witness advised Siemers that in his opinion the document was legal. He did not remember the date of the writing nor the names of the beneficiaries therein. He was shown the writing of October 1, 1922, and his attention called to the interlined words "without bonds," and he said that he did not believe it was the same instrument shown to him by Siemers, nor were the words "without bonds" interlined in the writing shown to him by Siemers. Another witness testified the deceased prior to his death had told him that he had made a will in which he had left Catherine Raftery some money, and that this will was in the Mission street bank.

As against this evidence the respondents, Lillian Kuck and her mother, Stiene Kuck, each testified that they came over to the home of the deceased on the afternoon of the day just prior to his death and were with him up to the time he died; that besides a Mr. Meissner, a clerk in a nearby grocery store, the two respondents were the only persons with deceased at the time of his death, which occurred at about half past 2 Saturday morning. Very soon after his death these three persons locked up the house and left together; that later on, and during the same morning, Lillian Kuck went over, and put a bolt on the back door; that no one after the death of deceased had access to the house except the respondents, Lillian and Stiene Kuck; that a day or so after his death they examined the bureau drawer in which Catherine Raftery testified the will of May 1, 1923, was left, and made a thorough examination of the whole house, but found no will in the house of date May 1, 1923, or any writing at all purporting to be a will of said deceased, except the instrument dated October 1, 1922, which was not found until some months after his death; that in the bureau drawer they found a bank book belonging to Miss Raftery, but no letters nor papers nor anything that purported to be a will. Upon this evidence the trial court found that the deceased never made a will of May 1, 1923, and that no such will ever existed. In arriving at such a conclusion, the court must have rejected the evidence of Catherine Raftery and her witnesses in so far as they testified to the existence of such a will and accepted the evidence of the respondents that no such will was found after the death of the deceased. If the deceased ever made a will of date May 1, 1923, according to the testimony of Catherine Raftery, the only person who testified upon this phase of the case, it was kept in the drawer of this bureau, in the room in which he died, and was there on the day of his death. Both Lillian Kuck and her mother testified that it was not there at any time when they first examined the drawer, which was a day or so after the death of deceased. There is nothing in the evidence to lead to the belief or inference that any one had access to said bureau drawer or had removed any paper therefrom between the time fixed by Catherine Raftery as the last occasion on which she said she saw the will of May 1, 1923, in the bureau drawer, and the time when Lillian Kuck and Stiene Kuck said they first examined said bureau drawer. Therefore, if deceased ever left such a document, it must have been in said bureau drawer at the time Lillian and Stiene Kuck first examined the same after the demise of the testator, and would have been found by them on said occasion. As has already been stated, they each testified that no such document was in said drawer, nor was any such document found by them at any time. The trial court undoubtedly accepted their testimony in this regard. In so doing it rejected the evidence of Catherine Raftery that such a writing was left by said deceased in said drawer. The evidence of Lillian Kuck and her mother was sufficient to support the finding of the court that the deceased left no will of date May 1, 1923. The court, having rejected Catherine Raftery's evidence that the deceased left a will of that date in the bureau drawer, was warranted in rejecting all of her evidence bearing upon the execution and existence of such a will and in believing and finding that no such will ever existed.

[5] Reverting now to the finding of the trial court that the document of date October 1, 1922, was not the last will and testament of said deceased and to appellants' contention that this finding is unsupported by the evidence, it will be observed that this will was executed just one month prior to the will of November 1, 1922. The latter will purports upon its face to dispose of "all my property both real and personal upon my death as follows." The testator then proceeded to make a number of specific bequests aggregating the sum of $15,500. The will, however, contains no residuary clause.

There was no finding by the trial court as to the value of decedent's estate. In respondents' petition it is stated that its value does not exceed $17,400. In contestants' petition they allege that its probable value is $22,000, and in the affidavit of Lillian Kuck, designated as "Testimony of Applicant on Probate of Will," the statement is made that the estate "does not exceed the value of $26,000." The question as to its value had but scant consideration during the trial, and we find but little evidence in the record dealing with the question of its value. The will of November 1, 1922, being subsequent in time, would be a revocation of all former wills made by deceased, but only to the extent that its provisions were inconsistent with those of former wills. Civ. Code, 1296. The bequests of $15,500 made in the will of November 1, 1922, are undoubtedly valid, and are a first charge against the estate after the payment of the debts of the deceased, his funeral expenses, and the cost of administration. There was no evidence as to the amount of debts left by deceased. The record is also silent as to the amount of his funeral expenses and the cost of administration of his estate. The bulk of the property left by deceased was real property, which would have to be sold in order to pay the bequests created by the will. Upon forced sale the amount this real property would bring would be problematical. It is evident from these facts that there would not be any considerable amount of the estate remaining after the payment of the amounts chargeable against it, including said bequests of $15,500. This fact, taken in connection with the expression used by the deceased in his will that he hereby disposes of "all my property both real and personal," may well and reasonably lead to the conclusion that said testator, by said will of November 1, 1922, intended to, and did, dispose of all his property. If such were his intention, then the said will was inconsistent with the provisions of the prior will of October 1, 1922, and therefore amounted to, and was, a complete revocation of said prior will.

But whether there was or was not a revocation of the writing of October 1, 1922, the trial court found that the decedent did not at the time of its signing intend that said writing should take effect as his last will, but that he executed the same simply for the purpose of bringing to an end the importuning of Catherine Raftery that he make a will in her favor, and that, after giving the same to said Catherine Raftery, he executed the will of November 1, 1922, which was the last will of said decedent. While the evidence in support of this finding may be somewhat meager, we are not able to say that there is an entire absence of any evidence in the record to justify it. The effect of the testimony of a number of witnesses was that Catherine Raftery greatly annoyed and bothered deceased, and that he was anxious to get rid of her; that he was greatly annoyed because she was after his property. One witness, a distant relative by marriage of the deceased, testified that some time in December, 1923, about the 17th of the month, she was with the deceased, and that "he said Miss Catherine was in Los Angeles, and he hoped that she would stay there, because she tried to get him to sign all the property he had over to her, and she got mad because he wouldn't do it." The witness, Carl G. Meissner, testified that either in November or December, 1923, the deceased came to him and had him address a letter to Catherine Buckle at Los Angeles, and at that time the deceased said to him that "he wanted to get rid of this woman, who was after his money. * * * He said, 'She is just bothering me to death.'" The witness Julius Bruns testified that "Mr. Siemers told me that Mrs. Buckle or Miss Raftery was a lot of trouble to him. * * * He did not know what to do." Proof that the contestant Catherine Raftery was endeavoring to secure decedent's property, and that the latter was bothered and annoyed by her actions in this respect, followed by the further proof that he executed a will in her favor, which he gave to her, but in a few days thereafter he executed another will in many, if not in all, respects inconsistent with the former will, which latter will he left in his safe deposit box, sufficiently justified the trial court in believing that decedent did not intend that the first of said writings should be or remain his last will and testament. In our opinion, the finding in question was justified by the evidence.

It is conceded that the instrument of date November 1, 1922, was entirely written, dated, and signed by the testator. The court upon sufficient evidence having found that decedent did not leave a last will and testament or any writing purporting to be his last will and testament of date May 1, 1923, and that the writing of October 1, 1922, was not his last will, it of necessity follows that the will of November 1, 1922, was the last will and testament of said deceased.

[6] Respondents make the further contention that appellants cannot be heard to object to this order denying to probate the writing of October 1, 1922, for the reason that they have failed to take any appeal from said order. While the notice of appeal makes no express mention of the writing of October 1, 1922, nor of any order of court concerning it, yet we feel that the general reference made in said notice of appeal to the order and judgment of February 27, 1925, is sufficiently comprehensive to include the order in reference to said writing of October 1, 1922.

[7, 8] The court permitted respondents to ask certain leading questions of their own witnesses, and this action of the court is by appellants assigned as error. This matter is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and, in the absence of an abuse of this discretion, its action will not be reversed on appeal. There is no showing that the appellants were prejudicially affected by these rulings of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RABE. (Cr. 3023.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 9, 1927.

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 130—Counts of indictment charging obtaining property of different amounts and at different times held not repetitions of same offense.

Where same person was alleged to have been defrauded by accused by employing same false representations in each count of indictment, counts were not repetitions of same offense, where in each count property obtained by accused was obtained at a different time and was different in character and value from property alleged to have been acquired in other counts.

2. False pretenses $\S$ 7(1)—Making of first false representation does not immunize defendant from punishment for subsequently obtaining property from person defrauded.

Where proof shows fraudulent intent or purpose of accused to obtain property from another by false or fraudulent representation which induced person to whom they were made to part with property, making of first false representation does not immunize accused from punishment for subsequently obtaining from same person other property which was parted with under influence of representation which was operating on mind of defrauded person at time he passed property to accused.

3. False pretenses $\S$ 4—One designedly creating in mind of another false belief in existence of material fact is strictly accountable for its effect on person influenced.

Since no person may profit by his fraudulent acts or conduct, if one designedly creates in another's mind false belief in existence of material fact, he will be held to strict accountability of its effect on mind of person influenced.

4. False pretenses $\S$ 39—Burden is on person creating false belief to show it has been removed.

Burden is on person creating false belief in mind of another of existence of a material fact to show that it has been removed, or it is presumed, in absence of proof to contrary, to have influenced action of person imposed upon.

5. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 12—Obtaining property by false or fraudulent means is not complete until defrauding party obtains possession of another's property by fraudulent representations (Pen. Code, § 20).

Since, under Pen. Code, § 20, in every crime there must exist union or joint operation of act or intent, intent to obtain property by false or fraudulent means is shown by plan devised by person contemplating offense, but crime is not complete until he obtains possession of another's property as result of fraudulent representations.

6. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 54—Punishment prescribed for crime of gaining possession of real property by false pretenses is measured by its convertible money value (Pen. Code, § 532).

Where crime of obtaining possession of real property by false or fraudulent representation is punished under Pen. Code, § 532, in same manner and to same extent as for larceny of money or property so obtained, punishment is to be measured by real property's convertible money value.

7. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 2—Since offense of false pretenses is analogous to larceny, Legislature could depart from common-law rule and include real property in list subject to statute (Pen. Code, § 532).

Since offense of false pretenses is analogous to offense of larceny, it was competent for Legislature to depart from common-law rule and include real property in list of property subject to Pen. Code, § 532, providing punishment for defrauding another of property, whether real or personal.

8. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 54—Obtaining property by false pretenses being punishable as for larceny, statute fixing penalty for larceny in its two degrees is applicable (Pen. Code, §§ 4, 532).

Since under Pen. Code, § 532, punishment for obtaining property either real or personal by false or fraudulent representation is in same manner and to same extent as for larceny, provision of statute which fixes penalty for larceny in its two degrees is applicable, under section 4, providing that common-law rule of strict construction of Penal Statutes is inapplicable to Code.

9. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 49(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of obtaining property by false pretenses.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of person, selling stock in corporation, of obtaining property by false pretenses.

10. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 7(5)—Misrepresentations on sale of stock that company had bought land and procured certain individuals as directors held false pretenses (Pen. Code, §§ 950–952).

Misrepresentations in obtaining subscriptions of stock that company had bought harbor land, that bond issue had been arranged for, and that particular individuals had been chosen as directors, and that subscriptions were worth amount charged therefor, held false pretenses as representations of past facts; indictment charging such representations being in conformity with Pen. Code, §§ 950–952.

11. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 15—False pretenses statute covering property real or personal held to extend to real property, despite provision that crime is punishable as for larceny of property so obtained (Pen. Code, § 532, as amended).

Pen. Code, § 532, as amended, providing every person knowingly defrauding any other person of property, whether real or personal, is punishable in same manner and to same extent as for larceny of money or property so obtained, held to include fraudulently obtaining real property, though real property is not subject of larceny; artificial distinction between real and personal property as to actions to quiet title being removed by 1921 Amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 738.

12. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1032(7)—Claim of material variance could not be asserted for first time on appeal.

Claim of material variance not presented to trial court could not be asserted on appeal.

13. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 38—Proof of one material misrepresentation will sustain conviction for false pretenses.

Only one material misrepresentation need be proved to sustain conviction for obtaining property by false pretenses.

14. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 38—Where defendant made no claim that he did not receive money under check which he obtained, he could not complain of failure to prove cashing of check.

Where defendant, accused of obtaining property by false pretenses, made no claim that he did not receive money under check given him, he could not complain of failure to prove check had been cashed.

15. False pretenses $\hookrightarrow$ 38—That moneys were paid to defendant in capacity as trustee held not fatal variance in prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses.

In prosecution for obtaining property by false pretenses, that evidence showed moneys were paid to defendant in capacity as trustee held not fatal variance with proof and allegation that defendant received money and property; it being unnecessary to show what defendant did with money.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Paul B. Rabe was convicted of obtaining money and property by false pretenses, and he appeals. Judgments of the superior court and District Court of Appeal (254 P. 602) affirmed.

Henry C. Huntington, of Los Angeles, Keeler, Fickert & French, of San Francisco, and Frank G. Howe, Gretchen Wellman, and Dena Jacobson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The facts of this case are more specifically set out in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, THOMPSON, J., which is appended as a part of our opinion. We will therefore not repeat them in our introductory observations.

[1] The petition for hearing by this court laid much stress upon two points passed upon by said district court. The first is that the defendant stands convicted upon three counts of the indictment which, in fact, are but repetitions of one and the same offense. We think this contention is without merit. It is true that the identical person is alleged to have been defrauded by the accused by employing the same false representations in each count, but this does not reduce the three separate acts to one act. In each count of the indictment the property obtained by appellant was obtained at a different time and was different in character and value from the property alleged to have been acquired by the false representations set out in the other counts of the indictment. The theory of appellant is that a single crime has been split into several parts, and each part of the whole has been made the basis of a criminal action. This contention is not maintainable.

[2] Where the proof in a given case is sufficient to show the existence of a fraudulent intent or purpose on the part of an accused to obtain property from another by false or fraudulent representations, the making of the first false representations which moved or induced the person to whom they were made to part with his property does not immune the defrauding person from punishment for subsequently obtaining from said person other property which was parted with under the influence of the fraudulent representation, which was still operating upon the mind of the defrauded person at the time he passed his property into the hands of said designing person.

[3, 4] No person will be permitted to profit by his fraudulent acts or conduct, and if one designedly creates in the mind of another a false belief in the existence of a material fact he will be held to a strict accountability for its effect upon the mind of the person designed to be influenced thereby, and the burden is upon the person creating such false belief to show that it has been removed, else it will be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have influenced the actions of the person imposed upon in his dealings with the person who is responsible for said false belief. It is a statutory rule that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent. Pen. Code, § 20.

[5] The intent to obtain property by false or fraudulent means is shown by the plan devised by the person contemplating the offense, but the crime is not complete until such person obtains possession of the property of the other as a result of fraudulent representations. In other words, the crime is accomplished when an accused receives into his possession property which he had planned to fraudulently gain. So in the instant case, while a general intent to defraud may have been formed in the mind of the accused at the time of or before he completed the first offense, the other crimes charged were completed as separate and distinct offenses on the days that he unlawfully took possession of the property described in the several counts of the indictment. If appellant's theory be correct and the value of the property first acquired had been under $200, the appellant could have been put to his trial for a misdemeanor only, and other subsequent offenses would have been merged into the misdemeanor or prosecution. This anomalous result would of itself cause us to pause in considering appellant's theory if that was all that could be said in rebuttal. Clearly the several counts set out different and distinct crimes. The cases cited by appellant re-announce a well-recognized rule, which is not applicable in the instant case. It is the act of getting possession of or of obtaining property by false and fraudulent representations which the law punishes as a crime.

[6] People v. Cummings, 114 Cal. 437, 46 P. 284, which appellant cites as an authority sustaining his contention, merely interpreted section 532, Penal Code, a statute which defines the crime of obtaining property by false and fraudulent representations and prescribed a penalty therefor, as and of the time that case was written. It was there held that real property was not named as a kind of property that was within the provisions of section 532, Penal Code. That section has now been amended to read:

"Every person who knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defrauds any other person of money, labor, or property, whether real or personal, * * * and by thus imposing upon any person obtains credit, and thereby fraudulently gets possession of money or property, or obtains the labor or service of another, is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained."

The crime of obtaining possession of real property is punishable "in the same manner and to the same extent as larceny of the money or property so obtained." It is very clear that the punishment prescribed for the crime of gaining possession of real property by false representations is to be measured by its convertible money value. This is the natural meaning of the statute and is such an interpretation as the average citizen would place upon it. The crime is punishable as if the property was capable of asportation according to its value reduced to money or a chattel.

[7] There is no doubt that it was competent for the Legislature to depart from the common law by including real property in the list of property that shall be subject to the provisions of section 532, Penal Code. The offense of false pretenses has always been construed as largely analogous to and closely bordering upon that of larceny. People v. Cummings, supra.

[8] The Legislature has provided the same punishment for gaining the possession of real property by fraudulent means as is provided by law for obtaining personal property by like means. The degree of punishment in each case depends upon the value of the property fraudulently obtained. The punishment is as definitely prescribed as it is for larceny. There is no difficulty in the way of applying the penal provisions of the statute which fixes the penalty for larceny in its two degrees to the crime described by the indictment in the instant case by giving heed to section 4, Penal Code, which provides:

"The rule of the common law, that Penal Statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice."

People v. Cummings, supra, cannot, in our view, longer be regarded as authority for the holding which is repeated in People v. Folcey, (Cal. App.) 247 P. 916, to the effect that:

"Since real estate is not the subject of larceny, the words 'punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained' are meaningless in relation to real property."

The statute was adopted with the view of checking a variety of frauds, tricks, and false representations so commonly practiced as to become a menace to the ownership of real property. The punishment, inasmuch as the crime partakes of a larcenous intent, was appropriately fixed by adopting the penal clause of the statute prescribing the penalty for the commission of a larceny.

[9] We have given consideration to appellant's contentions, many of which are extremely technical, and after so doing feel convinced that the evidence is sufficient in substance to sustain the verdict of the jury. An attempt, marked by considerable industry, is made by appellant to show that the alleged representations charged to appellant did not relate to a past or existing fact, and were nothing more than the expression of opinions as to future events, or the expression of hope, or the making of promises, or the expression of opinion on the part of appellant, and, therefore, not actionable at criminal law. The scheme conceived by the appellant, as set out in the exhibits, was quite elaborate in its initiatory stage, and contained language which undoubtedly related to the existence of present facts and conditions, as well as to future probabilities and possibilities. A representation that a corporation, whether completely formed or in its formative process, has purchased land and is to be conducted or operated according to specific or definite plans and in accordance with a fixed disclosed program, and is to be officered by persons well known for their business probity and integrity, if false, may furnish the basis for the kind of action here prosecuted against the appellant, the essence of which is gaining possession of property by false representations.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, adopted as a part of our opinion, follows:

The appellant was charged with the offense of obtaining money and property by false pretenses. The indictment was in four counts, upon all of which the jury returned a verdict of guilty. Judgment was pronounced upon the verdict, the sentence was suspended upon the third and fourth counts, and after denial of appellant's motion for a new trial he instituted this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion.

The first count charged the obtaining on August 1, 1924, of 200 shares of capital stock of the Moreland Truck Company and 20 shares of the capital stock of the First Federal Securities Company, taken together, of the total value of $4,000, from Elmer E. Owen. The second and third counts charged the obtaining on August 2 and 5, 1924, from Henrietta McGaw, of $1,250 and $4,000, respectively, and the fourth count, of obtaining on August 15, 1924, from the same person, a deed to real property of the value of $11,000. In each instance the money or property was advanced in payment of subscriptions for what was termed preorganization stock of a proposed corporation to be known and styled the Long Beach Dock & Terminal Company, which company was not incorporated upon any of the dates of the subscriptions or subsequently.

[10] The misrepresentations were the same in each instance and were as follows: (1) That defendant was taking preorganization subscriptions for the purchase of capital stock of the Long Beach Dock & Terminal Company; (2) that the company had bought and practically paid for 140 acres of harbor land, upon which to erect docks and warehouses; (3) that a bond issue of $6,000,000 had been "arranged for" to cover the cost of construction; (4) that Gen. George W. Goethals had been secured to act as chairman of the board of directors and as supervisor of construction; (5) that the promoters had secured the consent of Senator Shortridge, Congressman Lineberger, and C. H. Windham, city manager of Long Beach, to act as officers and directors of the company; (6) that the subscriptions were worth the amount charged therefor.

At the opening of the trial defendant objected to the introduction of evidence on the ground that the facts stated did not constitute a public offense; that matters were stated which constituted a justification; and that there was not a compliance with sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code. He now urges the same objections as insufficiencies of the indictment. His position may be stated as follows: That the indictment shows that the defendant was in fact taking preorganization subscriptions; that there is no allegation that the subscriptions were not of the value charged therefor; and that as to all other representations they relate to future acts, i. e., the organization in the future of a company to take over the land and to be officered by the individuals named. This thought runs all the way through appellant's brief and is the foundation upon which rests most of his argument. Such is not the effect of the allegations. They are very similar to the facts in the case of People v. Ballard (Cal. App.) 241 P. 596. From a bare recital of the allegations one would judge that all that remained to constitute the Long Beach Dock & Terminal Company a corporate entity was to comply with legal formalities; that to all intents and purposes the personnel of its directors had been determined; that its promoters were sufficiently financed to have purchased for it most valuable real property holdings and had arranged very extensive financing. All of these things were representations of past acts and present conditions and not outbursts of the prophet looking with optimistic eye into the distant future. They are all alleged to be false, and we can hardly imagine what might be added to bring it more squarely within the condemnation of the statute. The allegation of falsity not only covers the representation that it was preorganization stock, but also that it was worth the price charged.

[11] Outside of these objections, however, we do not find a serious question concerning the fourth count of the indictment. While appellant pays scant attention to the third and fourth counts by reason of the fact that sentence was suspended, there is sufficient in his brief that we have concluded that we must examine and pass upon them. As has been stated, the indictment shows the obtaining of a deed to real property of the value of $11,000. Counsel says that this count is fatally defective on the authority of People v. Folcey (Cal. App.) 247 P. 916, wherein it is held that no penalty is provided for obtaining real property by false pretenses. While a petition for a hearing of this case in the Supreme Court was denied, we feel that under the authority of People v. Davis, 147 Cal. 346, 81 P. 718, and Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 532, 129 P. 981, we are not bound to accept the language as precedent, but should give expression to the reasons for our dissent therefrom. The entire history of larceny, it is true, refers to the felonious taking and carrying away of personal property, so that there is no such thing as the larceny of real property. When on account of defects in the common law relative to cheats and expanding commerce it was found necessary to extend the law by statute, the similarity of the offense to larceny operated to confine the statute to personal property, in which condition section 532 of the Penal Code was found when the case of People v. Cummings, 114 Cal. 437, 46 P. 284, came before the Supreme Court. To remedy the deficiency thus existing in the law, and pointed out in this case, the Legislature amended section 532 to read as follows, the amendment being here set forth in italics:

"Every person who knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defrauds any other person of money, labor, or property, whether real or personal, or who causes or procures others to report falsely of his wealth or mercantile character, and by thus imposing upon any person obtains credit, and thereby fraudulently gets possession of money or property, or obtains the labor or service of another, is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained." (Italics ours.)

It will be noted, of course, that the concluding language was not changed, so that if there be a penalty for obtaining real property by false pretenses we must insert the words "like value" or some similar expression, after the word property, where it last occurs in the section, in which event the final portion would read as follows: "Is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property of like value so obtained." If this construction be not adopted the amendment is fruitless and the words "whether real or personal" mean nothing. It is not our understanding of the rules of construction that such should be the case, but that rather effect should be given to each word and phrase if fairly and reasonably possible. Many cases might be cited to support this rule. It has been said (Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 543, 222 P. 838) that the distinction between real and personal property, so far at least as actions to quiet title are concerned, is purely artificial. This particular artificiality was removed by amendment of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1921, and in this age of industrial development, where it is almost as easy to defraud one of real property as of personal property, we think the plain intent of the Legislature to remove the artificiality under discussion should govern and that we should hold the fourth count of the indictment to be sufficient.

[12, 13] The next assertion of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. We have carefully examined the voluminous transcript and fail to see how the jury could have arrived at any other verdict. Concededly Senator Shortridge, Congressman Lineberger, and Mr. Windham had never consented to become officers and had never consented to the use of their names. The representations were freely made that "they," which "they" must mean the organizers or promoters of the proposed company, had purchased from the Union Pacific and practically paid for 140 acres of harbor land—and it was positively established that they had not purchased from the Union Pacific 140 acres or any other land. If the defendant or any one associated with him had purchased 140 acres of land from any other source not covered by his representation, it was his duty to present such evidence after proof of the falsity of the representation. Shemwell v. People, 62 Colo. 146, 161 P. 157. Instead, on the stand he denied having made the representation. Nor can the defendant avail himself of the claim that the proof shows a false representation that the purchase of 140 acres was made of the Union Pacific and that this proof is at variance with the allegation that they had purchased 140 acres, on this appeal, for the reason that if such amounts to a material variance, and we do not so believe, it was not presented to the trial court. People v. Fraser (Cal. App.) 253 P. 340; People v. Gonzales, 69 Cal. App. 609, 231 P. 1014; People v. Fuski, 49 Cal. App. 4, 192 P. 552. It is sufficient if one material misrepresentation be proved. People v. Fraser, supra; People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 P. 521. In this case several misrepresentations were conclusively established.

[14] Nor can it be seriously argued that the subscribers received what they paid for. As has been indicated, every representation of fact, every suggestion, the entire scheme, was based upon the immediate organization of the corporation, which was never done. The subscribers got nothing except a subscription agreement which likewise was so artfully drawn as to leave out a time limit for incorporation, apparently because the actual incorporation was represented to be almost a closed incident. Lured on by the imposing distribution of a supposedly large capital, the subscribers parted with their money and property and received what they paid for only on the theory that they were subscribing for the "hole in the doughnut."

Attack is next launched upon the testimony specially directed toward count one, and it is claimed to be insufficient to show the obtaining from Mrs. McGaw of $1,250 in cash. The testimony shows that she had invested $1,500 with Harry C. Weist Company, with whom the defendant was at the time of investment associated. She executed an assignment of her claim for the return of the money to the defendant. Then when the check was made out to her—Mr. Farrell, an associate of the defendant, brought the check to her—she indorsed it; delivered it to Mr. Farrell, who in turn says he delivered it to the defendant. On August 18 the defendant wrote to Mrs. McGaw, saying that he had received confirmation of her subscription of August 1, which is the subscription in question. Under these circumstances we think the jury were fully justified in believing that the defendant had cashed the check. In the case of People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 P. 194, which was a case of obtaining money by false pretenses, it appeared that Mrs. Martin was induced to buy 100 shares of stock at the price of $1,000 and gave the defendant a check for $1,200 in payment for the 100 shares, plus 20 shares purchased by her sister. "The check was given on May 3, 1905. The defendant remained in Sacramento, where this transaction occurred, for several weeks thereafter, and, while there, hired men to go with him to the mines, which were in the state of Nevada, and for more than six months thereafter he was in charge of the affairs of the mining company, either at the mines or at Sacramento." The court says:

"There was nothing disclosed by the evidence to indicate that the defendant experienced any difficulty or delay in obtaining payment of the check. The facts concerning the payment of the money were all elicited upon the examination in chief of the two witnesses. There was no cross-examination on that subject, nor any attempt, at any stage of the case, to show that the check had not been paid in the usual course of business. Under the circumstances, the jury were justified in construing the testimony of the prosecuting witness and her sister to mean that the money called for by the check had actually been paid."

While we think that this case is decisive of the question here, we call attention to another case where the charge was obtaining money by false pretenses and the check was drawn bearing a general indorsement the same as in the instant case, and the court says:

"Before passing this phase of the case it might be well to call attention to the fact that the check bears a general indorsement, and there is nothing in the record inconsistent with the fact that it was paid in due course. The least that can be said, under the circumstances, is that the prosecution made out a prima facie case, and assuming, without deciding, that the defendant might properly make out a defense by showing that the maker was ultimately relieved from payment, the burden to do so, after the prima facie showing on the part of the prosecution, was cast upon him, and, not having done this, he cannot now complain." People v. Steffner, 67 Cal. App. 1, 11, 227 P. 690, 695.

No claim was made by the appellant here that he did not receive the money upon the check and for the reasons stated he cannot be heard to complain. Also, in the case of People v. Hutchings, 56 Cal. App. 397, 205 P. 480, it was held that proof of receipt of check sufficiently supports the charge of obtaining money in the absence of evidence that the check was not cashed.

Counsel argues that there is no causal connection between the false pretenses and the obtaining by defendant of the money and property of complaining witnesses. What has been said heretofore with respect to the immediate organization of the proposed corporation is applicable at this juncture. Furthermore, we think that the case of People v. White, 7 Cal. App. 99, 93 P. 683, is not at all in point for the reason that there is a connection alleged and proved in this case. There was a natural connection between the pretenses and the parting with their money and property by the complaining witnesses. Industrial corporations of the character contemplated in the scheme of the defendant owe their success or failure in many instances to the character, integrity and genius of the men composing the organization and to their ability to finance the organization with large sums of money, such as was proposed here. There can be no doubt that the representations here made were the inducing cause of the investment the complaining witnesses supposed they were making.

[15] The last argument advanced by appellant, that the subscription agreement, having recited that the moneys were paid to the defendant as trustee, that there is a fatal variance between the proof and the allegation that the defendant obtained the money and property is fully answered by the cases of People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 597, 51 P. 960, and People v. Griesheimer, supra, in which last case this language is used:

"The crime charged against this defendant was complete upon his obtaining the money from Muck by false and fraudulent representations, and it was not necessary to show what defendant did with it."

Also, in the case of State v. Balliet, 63 Kan. 707, 66 P. 1005, quoting from an Indiana case:

"The law does not make it an element of the offense of obtaining money or property under false pretenses that it shall be obtained for the person making the pretenses himself, or that it shall be intended to obtain it for another, for it is provided that 'whoever shall obtain money or property' by false pretenses shall be guilty of a felony."

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CRONEVITCH. (Cr. 1508.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Burglary § 41(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of burglary.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of burglary.

2. Criminal law § 516—Admissions of defendant, made on officers' suggestion that defendant might as well clear up matter, held not confession improperly induced so as to preclude use as evidence.

Where officers, in attempting to get from defendant a statement or confession of his connection with the crime of burglary, stated to him that, "You might as well clear it up, take a dirty slate that you have dirtied and clean it up and start on a new one," and made additional remarks wherefore defendant made reversal statements or admissions relative to the stolen property, such admissions held not a confession improperly induced so as to preclude use as evidence.

3. Criminal law § 1169(12)—Court could not say, as matter of law, that defendant was injured by evidence of his admissions, even if admissions were improperly obtained, in view of other evidence.

In trial of defendant on charge of burglary where there were in evidence certain admissions by defendant and other strong evidence suggestive of guilt was shown, court could not say, as matter of law, that the admission in evidence of certain statements or admissions of defendant caused injury to defendant, even if such admissions were improperly obtained.

4. Criminal law § 516—Defendant's statements to officers relative to taking stolen property and location thereof held only admissions, and not confession.

Where defendant while detained on a burglary charge made statements to officers relative to the taking of certain property from hotel rooms, the location of such stolen articles, and other statements relative to the stolen property, held, that such statements were only admissions, and not a confession.

5. Criminal law § 409—That admission, as distinguished from confession, was voluntarily obtained need not be shown preliminary to its introduction in evidence.

The rule is well settled that with reference to admissions, as distinguished from confessions, it is unnecessary to show preliminarily to their introduction in evidence that they were made voluntarily by the defendant without the use of coercion or intimidation or without promise of reward or immunity from punishment.

6. Criminal law § 1186(4)—Admitting in evidence defendant's statement to officer relative to another crime held not reversible error, in view of other evidence of guilt (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Admission in evidence, in defendant's trial upon burglary charge, of statements made by defendant to an officer relative to a different crime from that upon which defendant was being tried, held not reversible error because of Const. art. 6, § 4½, relative to the reviewing court's examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, when passing upon errors, since there was in the record much other strong evidence of guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

John Cronevitch was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Richard Kittrelle, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction on each of three several charges of burglary against him, and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial thereon.

It is first urged by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. The case against defendant was the burglarizing of rooms in certain hotels in the city of Los Angeles. Among other things, it was shown in evidence that the stolen property, consisting of money and jewelry, was taken without the consent of either of the several owners thereof; that at the time each of the burglaries was committed defendant was registered as a guest at the particular hotel from a room of which the property was stolen; that when defendant was arrested, among other things, the following articles were found in his possession, to wit, three files and a small pinch bar, besides two talcum powder cans, each having a false bottom and containing some of the stolen property and the complete parts of seventeen detachable skeleton keys. Defendant stated that the stolen property in his possession had been taken from the designated rooms in the hotels which had been burglarized. He also gave the location of other of the stolen articles. In addition thereto, with regard to a certain conversation had between him and defendant, a police officer testified, in part, as follows:

"I asked him at what time of the day or night did he enter the room of the Biltmore Hotel or the Rosslyn Hotel. He said that all the rooms were entered between 2 and 4 o'clock, as people were sound asleep at that time."

[1] Appellant contends that such evidence merely shows possession of stolen property, and that it is insufficient to support a verdict of guilty of the crime of burglary. It will be noted that the evidence against defendant includes the following circumstances which tend toward the conclusion of his guilt, namely, his presence in the hotel at the time the burglary was committed; the possession by him of tools and appliances well calculated to enable him to commit the crime; his personal possession of a part of the stolen property and its concealment, together with skeleton keys, underneath a false bottom in a talcum powder can; his knowledge of the location of other articles of the stolen property; together with an admission by defendant as to the hours between which the several burglaries were committed. While it is possible that even in such circumstances defendant might be innocent, it is clear that the evidence was sufficient to leave no reasonable doubt of his guilt.

In the course of the trial, over the objection of defendant, each of several police officers testified to conversations theretofore had with defendant. Appellant raises the point that admissions made by defendant were illegally procured in that some benefit or reward was held out to defendant as an inducement to him to make the admission or admissions regarding his knowledge of the commission of each of the several offenses of which he was accused. In that connection, appellant directs attention to the following statements made by one of the witnesses:

"* * * I asked him several questions about the burglaries, and on this particular day and time I asked him why it was that he resorted to a measure of silence in the face of knowing that there was a lot of reason for his having his name placed on the register of these here different hotels, and I said, 'Now, John, we are interested chiefly in the return of the property that has been taken, and this will never profit you a bit, and you need never think that is going to do you any good. It will go from you just like you got it. It will never benefit you. You might as well clear it up, take a dirty slate that you have dirtied and clean it up and start on a new one.'"

[2] Generally speaking, it is a well-recognized rule that a confession induced by means of a promise of reward, or of immunity from punishment, cannot be received in evidence. The following cases support appellant's contention: People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342; People v. Thompson, 84 Cal. 598, 24 P. 384; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 95 P. 863.

However, in the later case of People v. Castello, 194 Cal. 595, 601, 229 P. 855, 857, where it appears that prior to the confession the officers made statements to defendants in effect that they "had the goods on them," and that they (defendants) "had just as well come clean," it was held that such remarks presented no legal obstacle to the introduction of a confession in evidence. And a similar ruling was made in People v. Haney, 46 Cal. App. 317, 189 P. 338, where the inducing statement made to the defendant was that "the truth would not hurt him, and he better come out and tell it."

In the Castello Case, 194 Cal. 595, 601, 229 P. 855, 857, among other things, the court said:

"In the light of the decisions of the courts of this state it cannot be said that error was committed in the reception of the confessions in evidence even though we accept as true, as we must, the statements of the arresting officers made to the defendants, which were to the effect that they had the goods on them and that defendants 'had just as well come clean.' The statement carried no threat with it or hope of reward or promise of immunity whatsoever.

Neither was it sufficient to create terror or fear in the minds of defendants. It was nothing more than an accusatory remark. The officers made no promise that they would aid or assist defendants in obtaining any immunity whatsoever, nor did they hold out any inducements which could properly be said to have brought forth the confessions. * * *

[3, 4] With the exception as to results obtained in the way of a confession, as distinguished from an admission, the situation there presented exactly fits the situation in the instant case. But aside from the admissions made by defendant, the other evidence was so strong and so suggestive of the guilt of defendant that, as a matter of law, it may not be said that any injury resulted to defendant by reason of the introduction in evidence of such admissions. In addition thereto, the facts stated by defendant did not amount to a confession. At most, they were simply admissions of certain facts which, taken with others, indicated the guilt of defendant. As is pointed out in the case of People v. Ferdinand, 194 Cal. 555, 568, 229 P. 341, 346:

"An admission as applied to criminal law is something less than a confession, and is but an acknowledgment of some fact or circumstance which in itself is insufficient to authorize a conviction, and which tends only toward the proof of the ultimate fact of guilt. On the other hand, a confession by a defendant leaves nothing to be determined, in that it is a declaration of his intentional participation in a criminal act, and must be a statement of such a nature that no other inference than the guilt of the defendant may be drawn therefrom [citing cases]. * * *

[5] The rule is well settled that with reference to admissions, as distinguished from confessions, it is unnecessary to show preliminarily to their introduction in evidence that they were made voluntarily by the defendant, without the use of coercion or intimidation of any sort, and without promise of reward or immunity from punishment. It must therefore be concluded that the contention of appellant cannot be sustained.

Finally, it is urged by appellant that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in admitting evidence of the commission of other offenses by the defendant.

[6] While from the record it appears that, over the objection of defendant, a separate statement made by defendant to one of the police officers was admitted in evidence which contained admissions in effect that defendant had committed burglaries other than those of which he was accused, and while in the circumstances the introduction of such evidence constituted error on the part of the court, we are constrained to hold that, in view of the great weight of other evidence in the case which pointed almost conclusively to the guilt of defendant, the error of which complaint is made did not result in a miscarriage of justice. In other words "after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence" (section 4½, art. 6, Const.), we are of the opinion that had evidence of the commission by defendant of other burglaries not been presented to the jury, no verdict other than "guilty as charged in the information" could have been reached.

The judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Edward Ackley against Irene Porcari Maggi, also known as Irene Porcari, Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Franklin T. Poore, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank T. Deasy, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant, a married woman.

The complaint alleged "that the defendant became indebted to plaintiff's assignor, A. W. Morton (a physician and surgeon), upon an open book account for medical and surgical services rendered to said defendant upon the special instance and request of said defendant." The proof failed to show any book account except one with the defendant's husband, who was not a party to the action. This statement might seem to dispose of the case, but the defendant's answer and the proceedings at the trial were such that we must consider whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against the wife for debt irrespective of the absence of any book account with her.

[1] The defendant's answer denied "that she ever became indebted to said physician upon an open book account or upon any other account or in any other manner," etc. It is true, as contended for by appellant, that averments of an answer may supply vital allegations omitted from the complaint, but it is doubtful whether a mere denial in the answer, however sweeping, has this effect. Such effect is usually only obtained by affirmative allegations or new matter, and not by mere denials. Vanalstine v. Whelan, 135 Cal. 232, 67 P. 125; Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 492, 59 P. 386; Pomeroy's Code Remedies (4th Ed.) § 470 (*579). The defendant's answer, however, went further and set up a special defense, alleging that she had no separate property; and she was not living with her husband at the time the services were rendered, obviously pleading herself out from the provisions of Civil Code, § 171, which provides for what debts a married woman's separate property is liable. The answer also alleged that she was divorced from her husband, but this, according to the briefs, was at a date after the physician rendered the services.

The trial was very brief, and amounted substantially or in large part to an agreed statement of facts. As soon as the case was called, counsel for the defendant made the following statement:

"I think I can shorten the proceedings by admitting most of the facts. This is a case for services rendered to the wife during the time that the husband and wife were living together. There is no question of the services or the reasonable value, nor any question of the doctor's performing them. The only question herein is a point of law, and that is: Before this suit was commenced, there was a divorce suit instituted between the husband and wife in which the wife got the divorce and got the custody of the child and an allotment of property of $5,350. There was a settlement of property rights. After that suit was tried, this suit was instituted, and the point of law that I am raising is the question of the liability of the wife for an obligation that was made during the time the marital relations existed, and whether this award, or gift, or otherwise, of property is in lieu of alimony and property rights. The property, $5,350, came from community funds before the divorce. The husband owned and controlled and operated a business known as a bakery, and sold it before the divorce took place. There was a part payment on this bill; the court allowed that particular sum of money. So the only difficulty we have is the question, the point of law, and, if satisfied on that, Mr. Prosek and myself will submit authorities on that."

Counsel for plaintiff then called the doctor, and asked only one question, which brought out the fact that the services were performed at the request of the defendant's husband. A brief cross-examination established that the book account was with the husband alone; that bills were sent to him; and that he had made a $200 payment on account of the bill. This was all the testimony, except that the record of the defendant's divorce from her husband was also received in evidence. When this action was commenced, according to the briefs, an attachment was levied on the fund awarded the defendant from her husband in the divorce action.

This record fairly shows that the action was treated by both the parties as trying the issue of whether the defendant was liable for the debt whether upon an open book account or otherwise, and we also shall so treat it.

The points raised by respondent here and as defendant in the trial court follow: (1) That the evidence does not show an express contract upon the part of the wife. This is undoubtedly true. (2) That the law does not imply a promise or a contract upon the part of a married woman for family expenses or necessities, but such contract is implied upon the part of the husband only. In this she is supported by Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 219, 41 P. 1028. (3) That, before plaintiff can obtain a judgment against her by virtue of whatever liability is created by Civil Code, § 171, he must prove that she owns the particular kind of separate property made liable for such a debt by that section.

In Turner v. Talmadge, 42 Cal. App. 794, 187 P. 969, it was stated that this section did not impose a personal liability upon the wife. The statement does not appear to have been a necessary part of the decision.

In Evans v. Noonan, 20 Cal. App. 288, 123 P. 794, the section received a very full and careful consideration. It was held there that judgment should be given against the wife for necessities of life furnished while she was living with her husband. The suggestion that such procedure might result in having the judgment satisfied out of her property not made liable by the section was disposed of by saying that that question could be disposed of after execution issued. This case is cited and followed in Wisnom v. McCarthy, 48 Cal. App. 697, 192 P. 337, and quoted upon this point in Nielsen v. Richards, 75 Cal. App. 680, at page 686, 243 P. 697.

[2] We think the result of the section is to permit an action to be brought directly against the wife for necessities of life furnished as described in the section; and whether the wife has, or in the future may obtain, property legally liable for the satisfaction of the judgment so obtained, is a matter which may or may not be considered in the form of the judgment, but must in any event be considered at the time of an attempted satisfaction of the judgment out of her property.

[3] The statement of facts contained in the record will do away with the necessity of our making additional or new findings of fact herein. That statement in itself will suffice as findings of fact. Stanwood v. Carson, 169 Cal. 640, 147 P. 562; 23 Cal. Jur. 913.

Regardless of the nature of the fund attached in this action, and irrespective of whether the wife presently owns separate property liable for this debt under the terms of Civil Code, § 171, judgment should be for the plaintiff herein for the amount of the bill, less the $200 payment, to wit, $800.

There are insufficient facts in the record to enable us to determine whether the fund attached is liable for the debt here sued upon under the doctrine and procedure pointed out in the case of Frankel v. Boyd, 106 Cal. 608, 39 P. 939.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and judgment entered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $800, together with trial costs and costs of appeal.

STEHLI SILKS CORPORATION v. DIRECTOR et al. (Civ. 5945.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 5, 1927.

1. Sales $\S$ 379—Complaint in action for breach of sales contract, purporting to plead performance, held not to tender issue of what excuses performance (Civ. Code, § 1511, subd. 3).

Complaint in action for breach of contract, alleging that defendants purchased and plaintiffs agreed to deliver during certain months an invoice of silks, and that during those months plaintiff prepared balance of merchandise for delivery to defendants and tendered delivery, but defendants refused to accept delivery and refused to pay value, thus purporting to plead performance, did not tender issue of what facts will excuse performance, under Civ. Code, § 1511, subd. 3.

2. Trial $\S$ 86—In action on two sales contracts covering silk, admitting evidence of value of silk without showing to which contract it referred, held not error in face of general objection.

In action for failure to accept goods under two sales contracts covering silk, admitting evidence of value of silk which, under terms of second contract, should have been delivered on certain date, without showing whether it was silk described in either first or second contract, held not error, where defendants did not ask for order directing application of evidence.

3. Trial $\S$ 199—Court should construe papers relating to cancellation of contract (Code Civ. Proc. § 2102).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2102, in action for breach of sales contract, court should have construed letters and telegrams relating to cancellation of contract, instead of directing jury to do so.

4. Trial $\S$ 251(4)—Giving instruction on excuse for nonperformance of contract held error where it was not an issue.

In action for damages for breach of contract, giving of instruction on excuse for nonperformance held error where excuse for nonperformance was not involved in issues in case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Benjamin F. Warner, Judge.

Action by the Stehli Silks Corporation against H. Director and others for damages for a breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Isaac Pacht and Clore Warne, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wetherhorn, Hoyt & Jones, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages. The defendants answered, and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict on which a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was entered. From that judgment the defendants have appealed and have brought up a bill of exceptions.

In its complaint the plaintiff pleaded two separate causes of action involving two separate and distinct contracts. On the submission of the cause, acting upon request of counsel, two special verdicts were submitted to the jury. When the jury returned its verdicts and the trial court had duly considered the same, judgment was ordered in favor of the plaintiff on the first cause of action, and not on the second cause of action. The plaintiff has not appealed, and it becomes unnecessary to further refer to the second cause of action.

[1] As to the first cause of action, the plaintiff nowhere alleges that it has performed. It is alleged that the defendants purchased and plaintiff agreed to deliver, "during the months of May and June, 1920," an invoice of silks. It is also alleged that:

"During the months of May and June, 1920, plaintiff prepared the balance of said merchandise for delivery to defendants herein and tendered delivery thereof to defendant corporation, but to accept delivery thereof defendant corporation refused and still refuses and have further refused and failed and now refuses and fails to pay the value thereof. * * *

The defendants filed an answer denying all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint. The defendants contend that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and in this behalf they contend that the evidence is all one way, and that the undisputed facts are that the plaintiff never tendered delivery of the merchandise, and that the defendants never refused to accept the merchandise. In making this contention they are supported by the record. In reply the plaintiff cites authorities as to what facts will excuse performance. Civ. Code, § 1511, subd. 3. It is unnecessary to go into that subject. The plaintiff's complaint did not tender the issue. The allegation as tendered by the plaintiff's complaint at least purported to plead performance. They certainly did not make any attempt to plead nonperformance and a valid excuse therefor. The two theories are entirely different. Peek v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 133, 124 P. 834.

The defendants assert that no damages were shown. In making this assertion we think they have overlooked the testimony given by the witness Levanthal. His testimony seems to have been free and clear of the objections that were interposed regarding other witnesses, and his testimony was of such a nature that this point must be ruled against the defendants. The defendants in the next place contend that the court erred in admitting evidence of an attempted compromise. In answer to this point the plaintiff picks up a telegram dated July 17, 1920, and contends that the telegram was not an attempted compromise. Be that as it may, the telegram was merely one part of the evidence to which the defendants objected. Prior to the month of June, 1920, the defendants had asked the plaintiff to cancel their order which was the subject matter of this action. There had been some oral conversation, and there had been some written communications. No agreement had been reached. On the 29th of June, 1920, Mr. Scher was in the office talking to Mr. Barlow, the manager of the plaintiff. When Mr. Scher was on the stand as a witness he was asked and was compelled to answer, over the objection of the defendants, the following questions:

"Didn't you also make the same request early to Mr. Barlow and at the same time ask him what he would accept in settlement and release the corporation? * * * Then, when you saw Mr. Barlow 3½ months later, did you make a similar request upon him? * * * Didn't you take up with Mr. Barlow the proposition of paying a certain amount to the Stehli Silks Corporation for a release from your contracts? * * *

And, finally, when Mr. Barlow was on the stand:

"Q. I show you what purports to be a telegram dated July 17th, addressed to plaintiff, signed A. C. Scher, and ask you if plaintiff received that telegram?"

The last question being answered in the affirmative and the telegram being identified, it was admitted in evidence and read to the jury. In this manner there was introduced all of the evidence concerning the attempted compromise. In this connection, at least in one place, some of the defendants stated that they were willing to pay the plaintiff for the requested release and cancellation, but they were unwilling to pay $10,000.

[2] The fourth point made is that the trial court erred in admitting, over the objection of the defendants, evidence as to damages. As recited above, the plaintiff's complaint contained two counts. The first count was predicated on an order calling for delivery during May and June, 1920. The second count was predicated on an order calling for delivery during July, August, September, and October, 1920. If a breach of the first contract occurred, necessarily it occurred in May or June, 1920. Nearly all of the questions propounded by the plaintiff regarding values were addressed to the date August 23, 1920. As such questions were asked, the defendants interposed a general objection and as "not showing whether it was the silk described in either the first or second contract. * * *

As we understand the record, a certain quantity of a special article was the subject-matter of the first contract, and another quantity of the same article was the subject-matter of the second contract. If so, the question was not objectionable, but the evidence was applicable to goods which under the contract should have been delivered on August 23, 1920, and was not applicable necessarily to goods which should have been delivered in May and June, 1920. If the defendants had asked for an order directing the application of the evidence, the request would probably have been granted. At any rate, the record does not sustain the point.

[3, 4] The last point made by the defendants is that the court erred in instructing the jury. Under this point they designate several different instructions which the court gave and several instructions which the court refused to give. We think that several of the contentions made under this head must be sustained. Before we proceed, it should be stated that the plaintiff is a New York house; that the defendant corporation was doing business at Los Angeles; and that the most of the communications prior to the 1st day of July, 1920, were in the form of letters or telegrams. The trial court did not of its own motion construe, and it was not requested to construe, any of the writings. But when it came to instructing the jury in the first instruction which the trial court gave, it directed the jury that it might construe the letters and telegrams, and that it had the power to find that such letters and telegrams amounted to a refusal. The court should have itself construed those writings. Code Civ. Proc. § 2102; Jones on Evidence, § 175a. The instruction as a whole is an instruction on excuse for nonperformance. As noted above, excuse for nonperformance was not involved in the issues in the case. It should not have been given. The criticism last made is equally applicable to other instructions objected to.

The judgment is reversed.

MOELLER v. PACKARD. (Civ. 3303.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Pleading ⚡427—Evidence of contributory negligence, received without objection, put in issue defense though not specially pleaded in answer.

Although answer did not specially plead contributory negligence, where evidence addressed to that plea was introduced and received without objection, defense of contributory negligence was sufficiently put in issue.

2. Highways ⚡174—Automobile driver had no duty to assume girl of 8 years would leave place of safety to expose herself to peril.

Where automobile driver struck girl 8 years of age who suddenly ran on to the highway, driver had no duty to assume that she would suddenly leave place of safety to expose herself to peril by running in front of his automobile.

3. Highways ⚡184(3)—Whether girl of 8 years possessed intelligence to know pedestrians are exposed to risk of injury held for trier of facts.

In action for death of girl of more than 8 years of age run down by defendant's automobile on a public highway, whether deceased at time of accident possessed intelligence and mental capacity to appreciate fact that pedestrians using public highways were always exposed to risks of physical injury, and therefore are required to use reasonable care for their own safety, held under evidence for trier of facts.

4. Trial ⚡267(3)—Charge that girl had right to return to highway held abstract and subject to qualification on duty of care to protect herself.

In action for death of a girl of more than 8 years of age run down by defendant's automobile on a public highway, charge that deceased had right to return to highway after she had gotten off was abstract statement and subject to qualification that she was charged by law with duty of using reasonable care to protect herself against injury by passing vehicles.

5. Highways ⚡174—Doctrine of last clear chance held inapplicable where child ran onto pavement 30 or 40 feet ahead of automobile.

In action for death of a child of more than 8 years of age run down by defendant's automobile on a highway, doctrine of last clear chance was not, as matter of law, applicable where deceased left place of safety and ran onto highway about 30 or 40 feet ahead of defendant's approaching car.

6. Highways ⚡174—Automobile driver held not negligent, as matter of law, in failing to sound horn before girl ran onto pavement.

In action for death of a girl of more than 8 years of age run down on highway by defendant's automobile, where defendant, having increased speed of his car from 15 to 25 miles an hour after he saw deceased and her companions leave pavement when he was 100 feet from them, was not required to anticipate they would return to highway unless he warned them of his approach, and hence was not negligent, as matter of law, in failing to sound his horn before reaching point within 30 or 40 feet of point from which decedent ran onto pavement.

7. Highways ⚡173(2)—Automobile driver must anticipate probability of encountering persons using highways.

Operators of motor vehicles have duty to constantly keep in mind probability of encountering other persons using streets and highways either as pedestrians or motorists, and must anticipate that such situation may arise at any moment.

8. Highways ⚡173(1)—Pedestrians when using highways must use reasonable care for own safety.

Pedestrians must, when using highways and streets, use reasonable quantum of care for their own safety.

9. Highways ⚡173(2)—Automobile operator need not indulge presumption that persons using highway will not exercise care.

Operators of automobiles are not required to indulge in presumption, when driving over public highways, that persons using highway in front of him, whether pedestrians or motorists, will not exercise requisite care for their own safety.

10. Highways ⚡173(2)—Automobile driver may assume persons using highway are sufficiently intelligent to know duty to exercise care necessary for safety.

Operators of automobiles, if they be not negligent in their use of the highway, have legal right to assume motorists or pedestrians using highway and in front of him, going in either direction, are sufficiently intelligent to know it is their duty to exercise necessary care for their own safety and that they will do so.

11. Highways ⚡184(3)—Court cannot hold, as matter of law, that particular rate of speed of automobile constitutes negligence.

Unless speed limit is specifically fixed by statute, or, in absence of statutory speed limit, evidence unquestionably shows automobile was driven at outrageously high rate of speed, appellate court cannot say that particular rate of speed is unlawful per se or constitutes negligence of driver.

12. Highways  174—Increasing automobile's speed to 25 miles an hour after observing children leaving pavement held not unreasonable, as matter of law (Motor Vehicle Act 1923, § 113).

In action for death of a girl of more than 8 years of age run down by defendant's automobile on highway, evidence that defendant increased rate of speed to 25 miles an hour after he observed deceased and companions pass from pavement ahead of him held not unreasonable rate of speed, as matter of law, within state Motor Vehicle Act, § 113 (St. 1923, p. 553).

13. Appeal and error  1010(1)—Trial court's finding that deceased's injuries were due to her own negligence, sustained by evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

In action for death of a girl of more than 8 years of age run down by defendant's automobile, finding of trial court that direct cause of injuries to decedent was her own negligence, sustained by evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by H. J. Moeller against C. E. Packard. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Grant & Bailey, of Woodland, for appellant.

Charles W. Thomas and J. G. Bruton, both of Woodland, for respondent.

HART, Acting Presiding Justice. Upon a record prepared in accord with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and after a motion for a new trial was made by him and denied by the court, the plaintiff prosecutes an appeal from the judgment rendered and entered against him in an action in which he claims damages for injuries alleged to have been negligently inflicted by defendant upon the person of his (the plaintiff's) infant daughter and for her death resulting therefrom, the cause having been tried by the court, sitting without a jury.

[1] The complaint, after describing the manner in which the injuries were caused and charging that they were the direct result of the negligence or culpable carelessness of the defendant, declares that as the result of such negligence the plaintiff suffered damage as measured in money in the aggregate sum of $3,121.85, said sum including expenditures by plaintiff in payment of the bills of doctors, nurses, sanitarium at which the minor was treated for her injuries up to the time of her death, funeral expenses, and also for loss to plaintiff of the services of the infant.

The answer consists of general denials of the allegations of the complaint, contributory negligence on the part of the deceased not being specially pleaded, yet evidence addressed to that plea was introduced and received without objection. This sufficiently put in issue the defense of contributory negligence. Coffman v. Singh, 49 Cal. App. 342, 193 P. 259; Hoffman v. S. P. Co. et al. (Cal. App.) 258 P. 397.

There is but one point upon which the plaintiff relies for a reversal, and that is that the evidence does not give sufficient support to the finding that the proximate cause of the injuries received by the child was the negligence of the former.

At the time of the accident, the deceased and three other children (Leonard Clark, Johnny and Frances Melgar, the two last named being brother and sister) were walking together in a northerly direction on a public highway in Yolo county, later to be described. The child who was injured in the accident was named Maybelle Moeller, and, as above stated was the daughter of the plaintiff. At the time of the accident she was 8½ years of age.

It is expressly conceded by the defendant's counsel that there is no conflict whatever in the evidence. The testimony from which principally the court educed its findings was that of the defendant himself. Finding No. 1 quite fully sets forth the facts to which defendant testified, he having been called to the witness stand by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We quote said finding as setting forth a general statement of the circumstances under which the accident occurred:

"That on the 17th day of October, 1923, defendant was in the possession of and was driving one Dodge automobile northerly on the county highway between Woodland and Knight's Landing; and that at a point between the intersection of McGriff's land on the east side of said highway and the road going westerly on the south side of the Charles Laugenour place and on the east side of the paved portion of said highway in the county of Yolo, state of California, and that at said time and place Maybelle Moeller, a daughter of the plaintiff of the age of 8½ years, was walking northerly on said highway and off of, and to the east of, the paved portion thereof; that defendant was driving at a speed of about 25 miles per hour when he observed several children on the highway at a distance of about 400 feet ahead of him, and that when he observed said children, he removed his foot from the throttle of the automobile and gradually slackened his speed until he was driving at a rate of about 15 miles an hour; that another automobile was approaching from the opposite direction and the children got off of the paved portion of the highway, upon which defendant was driving, onto the unpaved portion of the highway at defendant's right and to a position of safety; that defendant did not sound his horn, but, on observing that the children had gotten off of the paved highway and to a position of safety, he gradually increased his speed until he was again driving at the rate of about 25 miles per hour; that when he had reached a point within about 30 or 40 feet of where the children were at the side of the road, plaintiff's daughter suddenly ran out onto the paved portion of the highway to recover some article that had blown from her hand; that upon observing her, defendant immediately pulled his automobile to the left to avoid striking her, but that he did not succeed in entirely missing her, and that some portion of the rear part of the automobile struck her; that said automobile continued to the left and overturned on the left-hand side of said highway; that by reason of some part of said automobile striking said daughter of said plaintiff, she thereby sustained injuries from which she thereafter died."

[2] In said finding the court also found that:

"Said injuries were caused solely and entirely by the negligence of said Maybelle Moeller in suddenly and negligently, and without warning, running from a place of safety off of the paved portion of said highway and to the right thereof to a place of danger on the paved portion of said highway and in front of defendant's approaching automobile, and that said injuries were not caused by any negligence on the part of defendant whatsoever."

In addition to the testimony of Packard, as set forth in the foregoing finding, he further stated that when he was about 30 feet from the children they were about 5 feet off the road or pavement; that it was at that time that he observed something "blow across the road" and immediately thereupon he saw Maybelle "run out" upon the road. Packard said that the reason he did not sound his horn was because the children, when he was about 100 feet from them, were entirely off the road and that there was then nothing in front of him to call for a warning of his approach. He further testified that, so far as he could observe, the children were facing north when he was at a point on the road about 100 feet from them, but when he reached a point about 30 feet from where the children were he noticed "a little boy looking at me." Further testifying, he said that the reason he did not "blow his horn" immediately upon the child running onto the road was because he had no time to do so; that he was then directing his attention and energies to the guiding of his car off the pavement so as to avoid striking the child; that, after the car upset, he "climbed out," ran to where the child was lying on the highway, which was about "5 feet from the right-hand edge of the pavement going north" and took her into his arms and so held her until a Mr. Sheridan came along, when he (Packard) requested Sheridan to convey her to the sanitarium in Woodland; that Sheridan consented, and that he (Packard) held the child in his arms until they reached the hospital.

Leonard Clark, an 11 year old boy, and referred to above, and called as a witness by the defendant, stated that Packard, driving his car, was, when he (Leonard) first observed him on the highway, between a third and a half a mile from where he and his companions were walking on the highway; that within a brief time thereafter a car coming from the opposite direction from that in which Packard was traveling was approaching, and that thereupon he and his companions left the paved portion of the highway to permit the passing of said car with safety to themselves; that all four of the children, including the deceased, looked back, and that he saw Packard within a short distance from them; that before Packard reached the point at which they were walking, Johnny Melgar grabbed his sister by the arm, although she was still off the highway proper, and pulled her further away from the paved portion thereof and "in the ditch"; that when the car was within a very few feet from where they were, a paper was blown from the hand of deceased onto the highway, and that the latter immediately started after it by stepping on the highway in the way of Packard's car; that simultaneously with that movement by deceased, Johnny Melgar "hollered, 'Look out, Maybelle.'"

"Q. What did Maybelle do? A. She just ran out and stooped over, and the hind end of the car of Mr. Packard hit her."

Testifying further, Leonard said that the car "tipped over"; that Packard then got out of the car and rushed to where the child was lying on the pavement and took her into his arms. He also testified that when the impact happened the deceased was about in the center of the paved portion of the highway, and that it was then that she stooped to pick up the paper which had blown from her hands. He further said that he "walked backwards" a part of the time, which would mean that thus he was enabled to see motor vehicles traveling in the direction in which he and his companions and Packard's car were going. It is only fair to state that this witness, responding categorically to questions by one of the attorneys for the defense, stated that he and his companions left the paved portion of the highway on observing a car traveling towards them, and at that time he (witness) did not know that "Mr. Packard was right close there."

The Mr. Sheridan above mentioned, testifying for defendant, stated:

"When we went back there (referring to the fact of his return to the scene of the accident after he conveyed the child to the sanitarium), I stopped and examined those tracks there very carefully, and the machine, to my estimation now, was probably $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 feet from the edge of the highway—from the right-hand side. * * * The car swerved right straight across the road, almost as straight as you could turn a car, into the ditch, and turned over on its side. It was a Dodge car with the body made of light material and the body probably was 4 feet high and the length of the Dodge truck."

Mrs. Moeller, mother of the deceased minor, testified that the latter, at the time of the accident, was 8½ years of age; that the child was at that time in her third term of school; that "she was very bright in school. She was above the average of girls at her age, but she was quiet and didn't talk very much but she thought deeply;" that she was perfectly capable of taking care of herself in passing along the highway, as "she had been going back and forth all the time." Mrs. Moeller further testified that the child had always been healthy; that the child was sufficiently developed to be able to assist her (the mother) in disposing of work in the kitchen at their home and in sweeping and dusting about the house, and that she (the child) did so assist the mother.

The plaintiff, father of the child, testified, as did his wife, relative to the ability of the girl to take care of herself in traveling as a pedestrian over the highway on which the accident happened, and also as to the capability of the deceased of assisting her mother in some of the latter's household duties and that the child, at and for some time prior to the accident, did render such assistance.

The above statement, in substance, encompasses all the essentially vital testimony in the case, and upon that testimony we are asked to declare and hold, as a matter of law, that the findings and the judgment thereupon entered and appealed from are not fortified by sufficient evidentiary support. We have with solicitous care examined the evidence as it has been presented here and considered the point suggested, but have not thus been persuaded to the conclusion that this court, with legal justification, can hold that the decision does not rest upon a sound evidentiary foundation. To the contrary, it has been found to be one of those cases with which the reviewing courts have oftentimes been confronted and as to which they have been compelled to hold that the evidence, upon its face, was sufficient to support a verdict or findings either for or against the party complained of. The case of Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 250 P. 565, in which Presiding Justice Finch of this court, acting as Justice pro tem. of the Supreme Court, prepared the opinion, is, in many particulars, a parallel case to this, and therein, while not expressly so declaring, the necessary implication from the analysis and the nature of the discussion of the evidence by the author of the opinion is that had the verdict been for the defendant (the plaintiff having prevailed at the trial) the court would, upon the evidence as it was presented in the transcript, have been required to sustain the result thus arrived at below. There is, however, a significant distinction between that case and this in certain particulars, to wit: There the injured minor was but 6 years of age, and started to walk across the paved portion of the highway at a time when the defendant's view of the pavement in front of him was unobstructed for a distance of over 100 feet from the point where the disaster occurred, while in the present case the minor was 8½ years of age and dashed suddenly from the unpaved portion of the road onto the pavement when defendant's car was only 30 or 40 feet from her, thus creating an emergent situation which called for quick or sudden action on the part of the defendant to avert a collision with the child, if, under the circumstances, a collision could have been avoided. The rule applicable to circumstances such as are existent in the instant case is well stated in Depons v. Ariss, 182 Cal. 485, 188 P. 797. There the deceased stepped in front and in the path of the defendants' truck while the machine, operated by an employee of defendants, was traveling at a low rate of speed on a street in the city of Oakland. The general circumstances of that case it is not necessary to recite herein. It is sufficient to say that there was evidence strongly tending to show that the deceased took the perilous step without exercising the moderate care which would have at once suggested the dangerous consequences of such an act. After stating the facts in detail the court, on page 487 (188 P. 798) of the report, said:

"Under the facts stated we are asked to reverse the judgment. This we cannot do. It was shown that deceased left a position of safety and put himself directly in the path of the approaching truck. This evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court. Under these circumstances no duty was imposed upon the driver of the truck to assume that deceased would suddenly expose himself to imminent peril. On the contrary, he had a right to conclude that he would not recklessly move directly in front of the approaching machine. Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 44, 76 P. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68; Basham v. Southern Pacific Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 P. 359."

It is true that in the case from which the foregoing excerpt is taken the party who was injured and who passed out from the effects of the injuries received was an adult, but it cannot justly be set down as a matter of law or an abstract proposition that the rule therein invoked and applied is any the less applicable to the case of a minor past the age of 8 years injured under like circumstances. In this case both the mother and the father of the child testified, as seen, that she was physically robust and of unusual intelligence, always maintaining a standard of excellence in her studies in school. Moreover, it appears from the testimony of the parents that she had been for some period of time accustomed to walking to and from school over the highway upon which she received the fatal injuries. Her father, who naturally knew her ability and capabilities, stated that he had always regarded her as being able to take care of and protect herself against the menacing perils of the automotive traffic over and along the highway on which she was injured when walking to and likewise returning from school along said highway. It would seem unreasonable to conceive that a child of her age, intelligence, and her experience as a pedestrian over a public highway, acquired while she was daily walking to school and likewise returning to her home, would not, as well as an adult, know of the heavy motor traffic on the highways of the state and of the risks and hazards to which pedestrians as well as motor or other vehicles traveling over such highways are constantly exposed, or that she did not, when using the highway over which she unfortunately received the injuries which resulted in her death, anticipate the passing of automobiles at any time from any direction of said highway, and that it did not behoove her, when using the highway as a pedestrian, to exercise ordinary or that amount of care necessary for her own safety or protection against being struck by a passing automobile.

[3] Thus have we ventured our own views regarding the evidence and its apparent effect upon the question of the intelligence and mental capacity of the child in the relation of that question to the issue of contributory negligence arising from the intrinsic character of the testimony introduced to prove the negligence of the defendant, for the purpose of emphasizing the proposition suggested at the outset of this opinion, that whether or not the child at the time of the accident was possessed of such a degree of intelligence and mental capacity as to know, understand, and appreciate the fact that pedestrians passing over and along public highways, while so using such thoroughfares, are always exposed to the risk of serious or fatal physical injury, and are therefore required, in such circumstances, to use reasonable and proper care for their own safety, was a question which, under the state of the evidence in this case, it was peculiarly within the province of the trial court, as the trier of the questions of fact, to determine. Of course there may arise, and doubtless have arisen, cases where it may be held as a matter of law that to a child contributory negligence may not, in cases of personal injury, be imputed. "An infant," said Judge Finlayson in Todd v. Orcutt, 42 Cal. App. 687, 690, 183 P. 963, 964, "may be so very young that, like an idiot or a lunatic, no negligence may legally be imputed to him. But not all infants are in that class. 'It is,' says Mr. Beach, 'a question of capacity, and it has been found a very difficult question, and has been, in many cases, a very fruitful source of controversy as to what age is sufficient to constitute an infant sui juris. Unless the child is exceedingly young it is usually left to the jury to determine the measure of care required of the particular child in the actual circumstances of the case. Where there is no doubt as to the capacity of the child, at one extreme or the other, to avoid damage, the court will decide it as a matter of law.' Beach on Contributory Negligence, § 117. It has been held that a child 7 or 8 years of age is capable of taking ordinary care of himself, and may be guilty of negligence. Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365; Messenger v. Dennie, 137 Mass. 197, 50 Am. Rep. 295. The rule is that the defense of contributory negligence may be invoked in actions by or on behalf of children who are of an age sufficient to exercise discretion for the avoidance of injury to themselves. The law does not fix this age of discretion. It may depend upon the character of the injury, the circumstances under which it occurred, and the size, intelligence, and capacity of the child."

[4] Taking up now the charge that the defendant himself was guilty of negligence in operating his car and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, it is to be conceded, as counsel for plaintiff declare, that the children had the right to use the highway, and that the mortally injured child had "the right to return to the highway after she had gotten off." This, however, is a mere abstract statement of a sound rule, and is manifestly subject to the qualification that when a pedestrian of an age and mental capacity to exercise intelligent discretion, for any reason, leaves a highway over which he has been traveling and then returns thereto, or when using the highway, is charged by the law with the duty of using or exercising a reasonable amount of care to protect himself against being injured by passing vehicles. As is said in Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 95, 239 P. 709, 714 (41 A. L. R. 1027):

"Pedestrians, as is true of every person who travels over the highways by whatsoever means or mode, must exercise reasonable or the due amount of care, considering the conditions existing as to the highways, for their own safety. If they fail in the exercise of such care and themselves thereby contribute proximately to the cause of any injury they may sustain at the hands of one having an equal right to use the highways, or if such failure is the sole cause of the damage they have suffered, then, of course, they have no ground upon which to base just complaint."

[5] It cannot be held, upon the face of the evidence, or as a matter of law, that there is justification for invoking the doctrine of the last clear chance. The evidence shows (and we say it "shows" because the trial court, as must be presumed, accepted it) that the child ran onto the pavement as the defendant was about 30 or 40 feet from her, and thus, so it seems, and as the trial court at least impliedly found, there arose a situation of sudden peril in which, if, indeed, the defendant could therein by any act or movement of his have averted collision with the child, the exhibition of error of judgment will, in cases of this general character, exonerate the accused from actionable responsibility. It is difficult to conceive what other course the defendant could have adopted under the circumstances. The court could well have concluded from the situation as the evidence exposed it, as it may be presumed that it did conclude, that had not the defendant swerved his car to the left immediately upon observing the sudden darting of the child onto the pavement, the latter would have been struck by the fore part of the machine, with immediate fatal result. And, in this connection, it may further be suggested that the evidence—the testimony of Leonard Clark—tends strongly to warrant the inference that had the child not stooped to pick up the paper which had blown from her hands to the pavement, the swerving to the left of the car by the defendant would have saved her from being struck and injured. To the complaint that the defendant was negligently remiss in his duty, under the circumstances, by failing to sound the horn attached to his car on observing the child, when about 30 or 40 feet ahead of him, suddenly run back to the pavement, is sufficiently answered by the suddenness of the situation thus produced and the obvious inference following therefrom as well as from his own testimony that his mind, with a suddenness equal to and contemporaneously with the suddenness of the production of the situation, was charged more with concern as to how to manage or manipulate the car so as to avoid disaster than with the less important matter (at that particular point of time) of sounding by means of the horn what appears would have been a belated warning. It was thus a case in which the judge could reasonably have expressly found, and impliedly did find, that:

"An emergency existed in which the exercise of ordinary care demanded an immediate stopping [or, as here, the swerving] of the car, and not the sounding of a warning." Neff v. United Railroads of S. F., 188 Cal. 722, 725, 726, 207 P. 243, 244.

[6] But the plaintiff goes farther than this and insists that it was the duty of the defendant, having increased the speed of his car from 15 to 25 miles an hour, after he saw the children, including the deceased, leave the pavement when he was about 100 feet from them, and proceed to walk on the unpaved portion of the highway, to anticipate that the children would return to the highway unless he warned them of his approach, and that, therefore, he should have sounded warnings long before he reached a point within 30 or 40 feet only of the point from which the little girl ran onto the pavement. In this connection, counsel cite the case of Hat- zakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., supra, and the cases therein cited as follows:

"That it is the duty of a driver of an automobile to anticipate the presence of pedestrians upon the highway over which he is thus traveling, is thoroughly settled as a part of the law of the road and is emphasized in Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 37, 179 P. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401, and in Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125. In the first named of these cases it is said: 'Aside from the mandate of the statute the driver of a motor vehicle is bound to use reasonable care to anticipate the presence on the streets of other persons having equal rights with himself to be there.' In the case last mentioned the court said: 'He (the driver) still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop. Kessler v. Washburn, 157 Ill. App. 532; Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 P. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401.'"

[7, 8] It is, of course, the duty of operators of motor vehicles over the streets and highways of the state constantly to keep in mind the probability of encountering other persons using such streets and highways either as pedestrians or motorists. They must anticipate that such a situation may arise at any moment. In other words, they will not be permitted to close their eyes to the fact, of common knowledge in these days of dangerously "rapid transit" over the common highways of the state, that they may at any instant of time meet or overtake motorists or pedestrians traveling in or from the same direction in which they are going. Pedestrians, too, as is obvious and has already been shown above, must, when using the highways and streets of the state, use a reasonable quantum of care for their own safety. In the present case, "anticipation" had passed into actual knowledge of the presence upon the highway in front of him of pedestrians moving in the direction in which he was traveling; but, at the time he observed this, he also saw those pedestrians (the children including the deceased), upon the near approach of an automobile towards them, pass from the pavement to the side thereof or the unpaved portion of the highway, a place of safety for pedestrians; that he thereupon accelerated the speed of his car to 25 miles an hour upon the assumption that, they having shown, as he noticed, that they fully appreciated the danger of using the pavement by their act in leaving it and moving to a place of safety when they saw the approach of a car from the opposite direction, the children would either proceed on their way on the unpaved portion of the highway, or, if desiring or intending to return to the pavement, would, before doing so, take the precaution to ascertain whether, at that time, any motor vehicle was in sight and approaching them from either direction. And the evidence shows that all the children remained in the place of safety to which they had taken refuge until the deceased, when the car was within so short a distance from her that it could not be stopped, save, as it clearly appears, in the manner employed by the defendant, suddenly ran onto the pavement. Under these circumstances, with which the defendant was familiar before the accident happened, we cannot say that he was not justified in assuming that the children would remain on the unpaved portion of the highway.

[9, 10] We agree that it would have been the safer, and, indeed, a highly proper course, for the defendant to have sounded his horn and slackened his speed, as he was approaching the children, so that he could have stopped his car in time to prevent an accident in case the children or any of them suddenly returned to the pavement, but we cannot, under the circumstances of this case, hold, as a matter of law, that it was negligence for him not to have done so. As stated, he had the right to assume that the children left the paved portion of the highway because they regarded it safer to walk along the unpaved portion and that they would not return to the pavement without exercising such reasonable care as would assure them that no motor vehicle was approaching and in near proximity to them. There is no presumption which the operator of an automobile is required to indulge, when driving over the public highways, that persons using the highway in front of him, whether pedestrians or motorists, will not exercise the care requisite to their own safety, or that such persons are without intelligence and discretion enough to do so. While the contrary presumption may not be indulged by such operator or driver of an automobile, he, nevertheless, if he be not at the time himself negligent in the use of the highway, has the legal right to assume that such motorists or pedestrians using the highway and in front of him, going either in the same or an opposite direction, are intelligent enough to know that it is their duty while so using the highway to exercise the amount of care necessary to their own safety, and that they will do so. Such an assumption follows from the probability that a thing which naturally ought to be done in circumstances peculiarly common to a particular situation will be done by a person of average intelligence when surrounded or enveloped by such circumstances.

[11] Nor can this court, without arbitrarily exercising the power of review to which it is limited in instances such as this, hold, as a matter of law, unless the speed limit is specifically fixed by statute, or unless, in the absence of a provision of law specifically limiting the rate of speed at which an automobile may be driven over the public highways, the evidence in a particular case unquestionably shows that the operator of the car has driven it at an outrageously high rate of speed over a highway where the intrinsic or other conditions of the thoroughfare render such speed abnormally dangerous to other persons traveling over such highway, that a particular rate of speed is unlawful per se or constitutes negligence on the part of the driver. Traveling at a speed of 25 miles an hour over a highway under certain conditions might justly be found to constitute a rate of speed amounting to gross negligence. On the other hand, a rate of speed in excess of 25 miles an hour might not under other conditions, subject other persons using the highway at the same time to unusual hazards or perils and, therefore, not amount to negligence. The law regulatory of automotive traffic in force at the time the accident involved herein occurred fixed no definite speed limit at which automobiles might be operated over the public highways of the state. Section 113 of the state Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 553) provided:

"Any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any person."

In Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller, etc., Co., supra, the Supreme Court said that the language of the above section, to wit:

"'Careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper,' is relative and contemplates the peculiar circumstances and conditions under which a car may be operated over a public highway at a particular time—whether it be after nightfall and dark or in the daytime and light, the width of the highway and whether it is one which, by reason of its connections, is or may naturally be expected to be at all times subject to a heavy or light traffic. In other words, said section requires the exercise of that amount of care in driving a motor vehicle over the highways which the circumstances or conditions of the particular occasion exact, having in view the character of the highway and the use to which it is then being put."

not constitute negligence. This question, upon the record before us, was for the court to decide upon all the testimony revealing the circumstances under which the misfortune happened—the circumstance that the accident happened in the broad light of day, the traffic conditions existing on the highway immediately preceding and at the time of the accident, and the general situation characterizing the highway with respect to the rate of speed at which a car might safely be driven just preceding the moment of time at which the fatal injuries were received by the child.

[13] While thus we have considered, from the several viewpoints from which it has been here presented, the proposition that it was the defendant's negligence which was the proximate or efficient cause of the accident and its regrettable consequences, nevertheless, we again emphasize our conclusion that the trial court's finding that the direct cause of the fatal injuries received by the child was her own negligence is sufficiently fortified to preclude interference therewith by a court of appeal. The consideration of that point and the conclusion following therefrom, as above indicated, would have sufficed for the disposition of this appeal, but counsel for the plaintiff, in their briefs, have presented the case to this court as we have herein considered it, and, we may add without impropriety, in an able and exhaustive fashion, and for that reason we conceived that they were entitled to have the cause reviewed from all the several angles of their argument.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing discussion, the judgment is affirmed.

DENIKE v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. et al. (Civ. 5403.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 1, 1927.

1. Insurance ⚡587—Where life policy specifically reserves right to change beneficiary, insured can make such change without consent of beneficiary named in policy.

Where policy of life insurance specifically reserves to insured the right to change beneficiary, he has right to change beneficiary without securing consent of beneficiary named in policy, since such beneficiary has no vested right in policy.

2. Insurance ⚡587—Where life policy does not reserve right to change beneficiary, insured cannot change beneficiary without consent of beneficiary named in policy.

In ordinary life insurance policy, which contains no reservation authorizing insured to change beneficiary, insured has no power to change beneficiary without securing consent of beneficiary named in policy, since such beneficiary has vested right in policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action on life insurance policy brought by Josephine Denike against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company and Isabelle Denike. From a judgment in favor of the last-named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. Kincaid and Jos. R. Fitzpatrick, both of Redwood City, for appellants.

W. P. Caubu, of San Francisco, for respondent Isabelle Denike.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment against the beneficiary named in an endowment policy of insurance which contained no provision for substitution of beneficiaries. The judgment was rendered on the theory that the interest of the beneficiary had been assigned and relinquished, which is without support in the record.

July 19, 1906, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company of New York issued a 20-year endowment policy of insurance for the payment of $500 on the life of Willitt Denike, naming his mother, Josephine Denike, as beneficiary thereof. The policy contained no provision for changing the beneficiary at the option of the insured, except in the event of the death of the beneficiary. The policy provided that, if the insured should die within the period of 20 years, the policy would be paid to the plaintiff, Josephine Denike, "if living, or otherwise to the beneficiary designated by the insured, after her death." The only other provision of the policy with reference to the changing of the beneficiary was the condition that:

"If the beneficiary under this policy shall die previous to the death of the insured * * * this policy shall revert to the insured * * * who may subsequently designate another beneficiary. * * *"

The insured was 19 years of age, and was living with his mother at the time this policy was issued. She retained possession of the policy for 10 years, paying the premiums thereon. June 2, 1917, the insured married the respondent, Isabelle Denike, and subsequently removed his personal belongings from his mother's home, including the policy, which had been kept among her private papers. August 22, 1917, he signed a written request for the insurance company to pay the proceeds of said policy, in the event of his death, to his wife, Isabelle Denike. This request was accompanied with a signed acceptance on the part of his wife. Upon forwarding this request to the insurance company, the proposed change of beneficiaries was refused by the company upon the ground that it was necessary for the insured to first procure the consent of the beneficiary named in the policy. This consent the beneficiary refused to grant, and it was never obtained. August 16, 1922, the insured was committed to the Napa State Hospital for the Insane, where he remained as an inmate until his death, which occurred March 6, 1924.

Demand was subsequently made upon the insurance company by the respective claimants for the payment of the policy, upon the refusal of which this action was commenced to determine the ownership of the proceeds of the policy. By consent of respective parties the proceeds of this policy was paid to the clerk subject to final disposition by the court, and the action was then dismissed against the insurance company. Upon trial, the court found that the plaintiff had "assigned, transferred, surrendered, and relinquished all her right, title, and interest in the policy," and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, Isabelle Denike. There is no evidence to support an assignment of the beneficiary's interest in the policy.

The sole question involved in this appeal is whether, under an ordinary life insurance policy which contains no reservation of right to change the beneficiary, a substitution may be made by the insured without the consent of the beneficiary named in the policy. This question is scarcely open to controversy.

[1, 2] If the insurance policy specifically reserves to the insured the right to change the beneficiary, this may be done without the consent of the beneficiary named in the policy, for under such circumstances the beneficiary secures no vested rights. Estate of Castagnola, 68 Cal. App. 732, 230 P. 188; 14 R. C. L. 1388, § 554; 4 Cooley's Insurance Briefs, 3755.

But in an ordinary life insurance policy which contains no reservation authorizing the insured to substitute beneficiaries, this may not be done without the consent of the beneficiary named in the policy, who, by the very designation as beneficiary, acquires a vested right in the policy. Yore v. Booth, 110 Cal. 238, 42 P. 808, 52 Am. St. Rep. 81; Simmons v. Miller, 171 Cal. 23, 151 P. 545; Griffith v. New York Life Ins. Co., 101 Cal. 627, 36 P. 113, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96; 14 R. C. L. 1388, § 554; 4 Cooley's Insurance Briefs, 1355, 1359; 7 Cooley's Insurance Briefs (supplement) 1355-1359; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Swett (C. C. A.) 222 F. 200, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 298; In re Drenth (D. C.) 221 F. 796. In the case of Yore v. Booth, supra, Mr. Justice Beatty says:

"The decided weight of authority * * * [holds that] a person who procures a policy upon his own life, payable to a designated beneficiary, although he pays the premiums himself and keeps the policy in his exclusive possession, has no power to change the beneficiary, unless the policy itself, or the charter of the insurance company, so provides. * * * The beneficiary named in the policy, although he has parted with nothing, and is simply the object of another's bounty, has acquired a vested and irrevocable interest in the policy."

In the instant case, the appellant acquired both a legal and an equitable interest in the policy; first, by virtue of having been originally named by the insured as beneficiary, and, second, by the subsequent payment of premiums for a period of 10 years. Since the policy made no provision for changing the beneficiary, appellant could not be divested of her interest in the policy without her consent.

Respondent relies upon the case of Jory v. Supreme Council A. L. H., 105 Cal. 20, 38 P. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17. This case involved a mere certificate of a mutual benefit society, and not a standard policy of a regular insurance company. The by-laws of the mutual society specifically provided that a member in good standing might surrender his certificate at any time, and have a new one issued, payable to any beneficiary whom he desired to designate. In the opinion, Mr. Justice Garoutte said:

"For the purpose of changing the beneficiary, the insured complied in detail with every rule of the society, save the single one of surrendering the certificate, and this she was unable to do after using due diligence to that end."

An entirely different rule prevails with respect to the right of an insured to change his beneficiary under the provisions of a regular standard life insurance policy and a mere certificate in a mutual benefit society. In the former the beneficiary immediately acquires vested rights, while in the latter such rights accrue only upon the death of the insured.

In 4 Cooley's Insurance Briefs, 3758, it is said:

"The interest of a beneficiary in the certificate on the life of a member of a beneficial society is a mere expectancy, which becomes vested only on the death of the insured."

Likewise, in 14 R. C. L. 1388, it is said:

"A different rule (from that covered by an ordinary life insurance policy) applies in practically every jurisdiction with reference to the certificates of benefit societies. Owing to the fact that the beneficiary in such a certificate has no vested right therein, it is the general rule that a member of such a society may change the beneficiary in the absence of some restriction in the certificate or laws of the society, and of course a member's rights are clear where the right to change the beneficiary is reserved."

In the Jory Case, above cited, the by-laws authorized the change of beneficiary, while in the instant case no such right was reserved in the policy, or otherwise.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

UNION TERMINAL WAREHOUSE CO. v. ROBERTI et al. (Civ. 5961.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Trover and conversion §40(4)—Testimony held to support judgment that defendants converted plaintiff's cotton stolen by witness.

In action for conversion of 26 bales of cotton, testimony of thief, who stole cotton from plaintiff's yard adjacent to its cotton compress, that he sold 22 bales to defendant, though containing contradictions and uncertainties, held to sustain judgment that defendant converted plaintiff's cotton.

2. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Appellate court cannot disregard trial court's findings, which are sustained by evidence.

The appellate court cannot disregard findings of trial court, which are sustained by evidence.

3. Trover and conversion §40(4)—Finding defendants converted plaintiff's cotton, on contradictory and uncertain evidence, held not abuse of discretion.

In suit for conversion of cotton, trial court's finding that defendants converted 22 bales of plaintiff's cotton, on evidence of thief that contained contradictions and uncertainties, and on evidence that cotton stolen was long staple, whereas defendants' evidence showed cotton purchased from thief was not long staple, held not abuse of discretion, since reviewing court could assume that all matters of evidence were fully argued to and considered by trial court.

4. Estoppel §72—Evidence not showing that plaintiff was negligent, rule that, where innocent must suffer, he who is negligent must be sufferer, was inapplicable (Civ. Code, § 3543).

In action for conversion of cotton, which was stolen from plaintiff's yard and sold by the thief to defendants, since evidence did not show that plaintiff was negligent, rule of Civ. Code, § 3543, that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by act of third, he by whose negligence it happened must be sufferer, was inapplicable.

5. Trover and conversion §40(2)—Evidence of identification of cotton converted held sufficient.

In action for conversion of cotton stolen from plaintiff's yard and sold by the thief to defendants, evidence of thief that he took 22 bales of cotton from plaintiff and delivered them to defendants held sufficient evidence of identification.

6. Trover and conversion §40(6)—Judgment for cotton converted at average of 483 pounds per bale held, under evidence, favorable to defendants.

In action for conversion of cotton stolen from plaintiff's yard and sold by thief to defendants, awarding judgment for plaintiff at average of 483 pounds per bale held favorable to defendants, where weight of cotton received by defendants averaged 560 pounds per bale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Union Terminal Warehouse Company against Edward I. Roberti and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. F. Gerecht, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Le Roy M. Edwards and O. C. Sattinger, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants asking damages for the conversion of 26 bales of cotton. The defendants appeared and answered, and the action was tried in the trial court, before the court sitting without a jury. Findings in favor of the plaintiff were filed, and a judgment was entered thereon in its favor. From that judgment the defendants have appealed, under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The plaintiff is a corporation conducting a warehouse at San Pedro. During the latter part of 1922 it had on storage several thousand bales of cotton. The cotton was stored one bale high in tiers and rows in a yard adjacent to a cotton compress. The yard was not fenced, and on one side a highway was not far removed. The plaintiff had a watchman on duty to watch the yard. Roberti Bros., the defendants, were engaged in the manufacture of mattresses, and had a place of business in Los Angeles. During the months of November and December, 1922, a negro, E. L. McAllister, commenced a series of thefts. Later, after certain investigations had been made, he was arrested for stealing 26 bales of the plaintiff's cotton. He pleaded guilty to a charge of grand larceny and was sent to Requa. While there his deposition was taken by the plaintiff. At times he hesitated about answering questions, but after long conferences with the plaintiff's attorney he consented to proceed.

In the deposition he testified that at times he drove a Ford truck, and at times he drove a Republic truck; that in the nighttime he would time the plaintiff's watchman, and when the watchman would be at a distant point McAllister would proceed to take a load of cotton, 4 or 8 bales at a time, and then drive to the neighborhood of the defendants' place of business. At that point he would remain until the defendants opened their doors, and then he would enter, negotiate his sale, weigh the load, get a receiving slip, and immediately thereafter a check in payment for the load. In this manner he took from the plaintiff 26 or 27 bales. In this manner he sold and delivered to the defendants all except 4 bales which he sold to another house. He testified that in the beginning he informed the defendants that he was a dealer in cotton at Imperial. He gave the defendants his name as E. L. Richardson. Thereafter all business was transacted with the defendants under that assumed name. He testified that each bale that he took had a tag attached to it; that he tore off one tag and read what was on it, but that he did not tear off any other tags. He testified that the defendants made no request of him for any personal identification, but paid him 22 or 23 cents a pound for the cotton. There was evidence given by other witnesses that the market price of cotton at that time was as high as 28 cents. On the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced in evidence the receiving slips and paid checks, each and all confirming the testimony of McAllister. The plaintiff introduced evidence from its own records as to its weights of the 26 bales of cotton. The receiving slips showed the weights as weighed by the defendants.

There was testimony to the effect that cotton produced in dry climates, and brought to the coast and stored in the coast climate, would take on weight. The evidence showed a variance in weights, so that the weights of the bales as shown by the records of the plaintiff did not tally with the weights of the bales as shown by the records of the defendants; but there was no evidence introduced in the record from which this court can identify any particular bale and in that manner compare the weights.

During the period that the thefts were being committed, the plaintiff commenced to surmise that some of the cotton was being stolen. It thereupon caused a check to be taken, thus verifying its suspicions. Later it employed detectives, who proceeded to investigate the case. When the investigation had been completed, it was ascertained what bales had been stolen and what owners had deposited in the warehouse each of the stolen bales. Before the action was commenced, the plaintiff paid the detectives and paid each owner the market price of the cotton stolen. After all of the proof was adduced, the trial court awarded the plaintiff judgment as for 22 bales, and not 26 bales. This was done, because McAllister, whether truly or falsely, testified that only 22 bales, so stolen from the plaintiff, were by him sold to the defendants.

[1, 2] The first point made by the defendants is that there was no evidence before the trial court that in any way sustains the judgment of that court in holding that the defendants had converted 22 bales of cotton belonging to the plaintiff. The point is without merit. E. L. McAllister fully testified to all of the facts. Even though, as contended by the defendants, his testimony contained contradictions or uncertainties, or came from one convicted of a felony and then serving his time, those infirmities were addressed to the trial court. The trial court having made its finding against the defendants, this court is not at liberty to disregard the finding.

[3] That finding is not broken down because one of plaintiff's officers testified that the cotton stolen from it was "long staple," whereas the defendants offered evidence that the cotton which they purchased from McAllister was not "long staple." The fact that the weights did not agree is another feature that is not conclusive against the plaintiff. We may assume that all of these matters were fully argued to the trial court and were duly considered by it. Evidently the trial court did not consider them as being persuasive. We do not mean to state that we disagree with the trial court. However, we are clearly of the opinion that it may not be said that the trial court abused its discretion.

[4] The defendants cite and rely on section 3543 of the Civil Code. The section has no application to the facts. The evidence does not disclose that the plaintiff was negligent. The evidence, therefore, does not justify a ruling against the plaintiff based on its alleged negligence.

[5] The defendants earnestly contend that there is no evidence identifying the 22 bales. There is no evidence in the nature of marks, brands, etc.; but, as recited above, McAllister testified that he took 22 bales from the possession of the plaintiff and delivered them into the possession of the defendants. This was certainly pointed identification.

[6] In making up its judgment the trial court awarded judgment in favor of the plaintiff for 10,630 pounds; that is, an average of 483 pounds per bale. The receiving slips show the delivery to the defendants by McAllister of 10 bales cotton, low grade lint, and again 12 bales linters. The plaintiff's testimony was that it did not have any linters in storage. The slips show five loads of 4, 4, 4, 8, and 3 bales respectively—23 bales in all—which are not marked linters, but are marked staple, long staple, etc. The total weight of the 23 bales was 12,363 pounds; that is, 560 pounds per bale. In whatever way the trial court made up its figures, it is manifest that they were favorable to the defendants rather than to the plaintiff. As to the price per pound, the trial court followed the testimony of Mr.

Munson, one of the officers of the plaintiff, and the only witness who gave testimony on market values.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

WICKSTROM v. McGRATH. (Civ. 5317.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 10, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 9, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(1)—Notice to pay rent or deliver up possession meant that landlord had exercised option to terminate lease unless rent was paid (Civ. Code, § 791; Code Civ. Proc. § 1161).

Landlord's notice, that within 3 days after service of notice tenant was required to pay rent in certain amount or to deliver up possession within 3 days, or landlord would institute legal proceedings, required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, meant that landlord had exercised option to terminate, given in lease, unless rent was paid, so that tenant, failing to pay rent, did not hold possession with permission of landlord at time action, under Civ. Code, § 791, to recover possession of premises was commenced.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨290(1)—Lessee's unlawful detention of premises did not cease when receiver was appointed, where lessee was collecting rentals through tenant in possession without paying rent.

Lessee's unlawful detention of premises did not cease on July 1 when receiver was appointed, where lessee had abandoned premises about June 1 and was collecting rentals through tenant left in possession without making any payments on rent.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(2)—Deposit given as security for payment of rent should have been applied in satisfaction of judgment, in unlawful detainer action.

Where court's finding that deposit of certain fund was given as security for payment of rent was supported by provisions of lease, such deposit should have been applied in satisfaction of judgment, in unlawful detainer action.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(17)—Where lessee was guilty of unlawful detainer after default in payment of rent, judgment should have declared forfeiture of lease (Code Civ. Proc. § 1174).

Where lessee was guilty of unlawful detainer after default in payment of rent, judgment in unlawful detainer action should have declared forfeiture of lease, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1174.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by Anna Wickstrom against Kathryne McGrath. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed, as modified.

Edgar L. Martin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. P. Hatch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an action in unlawful detainer. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into a written lease whereby the plaintiff leased to defendant a certain apartment building for the term of 10 years, beginning November 1, 1923, at a total rental of $97,920, payable in monthly installments of $816 each. The lease contained the following provisions:

"Receipt is hereby acknowledged of the sum of $3,264, being in payment of the first, and last three months' rents under this lease, of which said sum the amount of $2,448, being the amount of rent owing for the said last three months' rental, shall be held without interest, for at least one year and a half from this date, and said second party shall have the right thereafter, of drawing down said cash deposit of $2,448 when said second party can give to first party a good and sufficient first lien chattel mortgage on the furniture and furnishings in said building in the sum of $10,000 and in any event said mortgage must be given to lessor within three years.

"It is expressly understood and agreed that the fact that the said first party holds security does not impair or affect, in any manner, the right of said lessor, in the event of default on the part of the said second party, to terminate this lease and re-enter and take possession of the said premises as hereinbefore provided, or to maintain an action at law, for the recovery of any rent that may be due or unpaid under this lease. Should any of the rents herein reserved be due and unpaid, or should the parties of the second part be in default in any of the other obligations herein undertaken by the party of the second part, the party of the first part may, at her option, terminate this lease forthwith and re-enter and take possession of the premises and remove all persons therefrom.

"And it is understood and agreed that the fulfillment and due observance of the various terms, provisions, promises, agreements, covenants, and conditions of this lease constitute the condition on which the continuance of this lease shall depend, at the option of the party of the first part."

On June 1, 1925, and prior to the commencement of this action, defendant left the apartment house in charge of one Mrs. E. Ruhl. At the trial it was stipulated that no rent was paid by the defendant for the month of June or thereafter. It was also stipulated that a notice to pay rent or deliver possession of the premises within three days from the service of said notice, a copy of which was attached to the complaint, was served upon Mrs. Ruhl, who was managing the apartment house, on June 13, 1925, before the filing of the action. On July 1, 1925, a receiver was appointed on the application of the plaintiff. At the time the judgment and findings were signed by the court there was due and owing by the defendant, under the terms of the lease, rental for the months of June, July, August, and September, 1925, and judgment was rendered in the sum of $3,264, together with $34.90 accrued interest. The findings provided that the defendant was entitled to have the judgment satisfied by the plaintiff from the said sum of $2,448, paid by the defendant to plaintiff at the time of the execution of said lease as security for the faithful performance thereof by the defendant as lessee, to the extent that the same might be adequate therefor.

Appellant urges that the findings and decision that the defendant unlawfully continued in possession of the premises in default in the payment of rent, without permission of the plaintiff, are not justified by the evidence. It is contended that the right of re-entry given in the lease does not accrue upon default in the payment of rent, but accrues to the lessor only when the lessor has elected to terminate the lease by giving the tenant notice indicating an election of the option to terminate the lease. Section 791 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

"Whenever the right of re-entry is given to a grantor or lessor in any grant or lease, or otherwise, such re-entry may be made at any time after the right has accrued, upon three days' notice, as provided in sections eleven hundred and sixty-one and eleven hundred and sixty-two, Code of Civil Procedure."

[1] The lease herein expressly provides that, should any rents be due and unpaid, "the party of the first part may, at her option, terminate this lease forthwith and re-enter and take possession of the premises and remove all persons therefrom." According to the evidence, the lessee was in default in the payment of rent, and we believe the lessor did terminate the lease forthwith by serving the notice to pay the rent or deliver possession, as required by section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The terms of this notice necessarily meant that the plaintiff had exercised the option to terminate the lease unless the rent was paid, and that the defendant was not remaining in possession with the permission of the plaintiff unless such rent was paid within three days after service of the notice to quit possession. The notice read:

"Within three days after the service on you of this notice, you are hereby required to pay the rent of the premises hereinafter described, * * * amounting to the sum of $816, * * * or you are hereby required to deliver up possession of the herein described premises within the said three days after service on you of this notice, * * * or I shall institute legal proceedings against you to recover possession of the said premises."

This notice was both a demand to pay the rent and a notice to quit possession in the event of failure to pay the rent, or legal proceedings would be instituted. Section 793 of the Civil Code authorizes the maintenance of Cal.Rep. 261-263 P.—3 an action for the possession of real property leased or granted with the right of re-entry, at any time after the right to re-enter has accrued, without the notice described in section 791 of the Civil Code. The case of Mossi v. Fairbanks, 19 Cal. App. 355, 125 P. 1071, relied upon by appellant, goes no further than to hold as a general rule that a demand for unpaid rent is a condition precedent to any action to enforce a forfeiture of a lease for such nonpayment, and that section 793 of the Civil Code simply makes clear by statute that if the landlord does not desire to avail himself of the summary proceeding provided by the Code, it will not be necessary for him to serve three days' notice, but it does not relieve him from the necessity of making a demand, verbal or otherwise, for the rent, unless the lease dispensed with a demand or that the lessee has waived the same. That case was alleged to have been brought under section 793 of the Civil Code, and no demand was alleged. The present case is brought under section 791 of the Civil Code, and demand is both alleged and proved. We conclude that appellant's contention that the possession of the lessee was with the permission of the lessor at the time the action was commenced is without merit.

[2] Likewise the argument of appellant that the unlawful detention of the premises by the defendant ceased on July 1, 1925, when the receiver was appointed, must fail, since the record shows that the defendant had abandoned the premises about June 1 and was collecting the rentals through a tenant left in possession, without making any payments on the rent or on the furniture installments.

Appellant's objection that the court erred in its rulings are necessarily disposed of by the foregoing conclusions.

[3] Appellant's contention that the judgment is not authorized by the findings should be sustained. An allowance or credit was not given in the judgment for the sum of $2,448, as provided in the findings. The finding that the deposit was given as security is well supported by the provisions of the lease, and the amount should have been applied in satisfaction of the judgment, in accordance with the decision. Rez v. Summers, 34 Cal. App. 529, 168 P. 156; Burke v. Norton, 42 Cal. App. 705, 184 P. 45; Parish v. Studebaker, 50 Cal. App. 719, 195 P. 721; City Investment Co. v. Pringle, 73 Cal. App. 782, 239 P. 302.

[4] Appellant's contention that the judgment should declare a forfeiture of the lease should also be sustained. Section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that if the defendant is guilty of unlawful detainer after default in the payment of rent, a judgment shall be entered for the restitution of the premises, and "the judgment shall also declare the forfeiture of such lease or agreement."

In accordance with the foregoing it is ordered that the judgment be modified by adding to paragraph 2 thereof the following words:

"But that the defendant is entitled to have the judgment herein satisfied by the plaintiff from the sum of $2,448 deposited with plaintiff by the defendant as security for the faithful performance of the lease of said premises entered into between the parties thereto, to the extent that the same may be adequate therefor. Upon full satisfaction of said judgment, and upon the plaintiff being restored to the possession of said premises by the defendant, it is ordered that said lease be forfeited."

The judgment is affirmed as modified.

PILGER v. CITY OF PARIS DRY GOODS CO. (Civ. 6000.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨330(1)—One suing corporation had burden of establishing negligent chiropodist was its servant.

One suing department store corporation for negligence of chiropodist, on ground that it was employer of chiropodist at time of injury, had burden of establishing existence of relation of employer and employee.

2. Master and servant ⇨301(1)—Relation of "master and servant" exists when master can control work and direct manner of doing it; "employer and employee" (Civ. Code, § 2009).

Relation of "master and servant" or "employer and employee" exists whenever one claimed to be master stands in such relation to another that he can control work of latter and direct the manner in which it shall be done, and it is essential that he shall have the direction and control of all of its details, under Civ. Code, § 2009.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employer; Second Series, Master and Servant.]

3. Evidence ⇨65—Patient of chiropodist was chargeable with knowledge that under statute corporation had no power to practice chiropody (St. 1913, p. 722, as amended; St. 1921, p. 995).

Court was bound to hold that patient of chiropodist knew the law, and therefore knew that under St. 1913, p. 722, as amended, and St. 1921, p. 995, department store corporation had no power to practice chiropody.

4. Master and servant ⇨301(1)—Corporation cannot be master over chiropodist concerning whose acts it could have no power of supervision (St. 1913, p. 722, as amended; St. 1921, p. 995).

Since corporation cannot be licensed to practice chiropody under St. 1913, p. 722, as amended, and St. 1921, p. 995, it cannot in contemplation of law be a master over a servant concerning whose acts it could have no power of supervision.

5. Master and servant ⇨332(1)—Evidence on issue whether negligent chiropodist was employed by store held insufficient for jury.

Evidence that chiropodist for whose negligence in treating plaintiff's feet department store was sought to be held liable, merely showing chiropodist had an office in the store, and that fees for services rendered were charged on books of store at plaintiff's request and for her convenience, held insufficient for jury on question whether chiropodist was in employ of store.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Lucy Pilger against The City of Paris Dry Goods Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wal J. Tuska, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment based upon a motion for nonsuit made by defendant at the close of plaintiff's case.

The facts disclosed by the evidence are as follows: The respondent the City of Paris, a corporation, is a retail store in the city of San Francisco, dealing in dry goods and various kinds of merchandise, and having different departments. In the month of September, 1923, appellant, Lucy Pilger, employed the services of Dr. Robbins, a chiropodist who had an office in the store of respondent corporation, and whose office adjoined the beauty parlor conducted on the second floor of the building occupied by respondent for the sale of merchandise and commodities. The name of the chiropodist and the location in the building where the office of the chiropodist was located were unknown to appellant, she being directed to the chiropodist's office by one of the salesmen employed in the store. Appellant went to the place to which she had been directed, and, after waiting there a little time while the chiropodist was finishing some work for another lady, was treated by the chiropodist, which consisted of trimming the nails and trimming callous off the soles of appellant's feet. In the course of the treatment the chiropodist discovered that there was callous on the bottom of the little toe of appellant's left foot, and proceeded to remove it, but, while so attempting to remove the callous, the knife or other instrument the chiropodist was using entered the flesh of the little toe of appellant's left foot, causing a flow of blood, and, as described by appellant, causing severe pain. The chiropodist immediately bandaged the bleeding foot, later removing the bandage, and, putting on some medicine submitted the foot to violet ray, and again bandaged it; appellant in the meantime, according to her testimony, suffering acute pain. The chiropodist tried different methods at different times to heal the wound and to alleviate the pain and suffering; she sprayed the wound, used an antiseptic, probed the wound, and squeezed out pus. As stated by appellant, the pains continued from September, 1923, until the middle of the following January, when a regular medical practitioner was called in. The physician, Dr. Marston, after examining the foot found it infected, that mortification had set in, and determined, after consultation with another physician, to amputate the little toe of the left foot to prevent the poison from spreading, and the toe was accordingly amputated. Appellant testified that she endured months of suffering following the chiropodist's treatment. Prior to that time appellant had no disease in either of her feet, and did not suffer from any disease at the time she had her nails trimmed and the callous removed from her left foot and toe, and her blood was in good condition. According to the testimony of appellant, she had been buying goods at defendant's store for a number of years, and maintained a charge account there, and that, when the chiropodist first treated her, she told the chiropodist that she had a charge account at the store, and requested the chiropodist to have the charges for the treatment charged to her on the books of the store and to have the charges put on her bill. Accordingly, when appellant received her next bill from respondent, there appeared upon the bill, among various items for goods sold appellant, the following items: September 7th, 1 chiropody treatment, $2; September 17th, 1 chiropody treatment, $2; December 12th, 1 chiropody treatment, $2.50; December 22d, 1 chiropody treatment, $1.

Appellant has assigned twelve specifications of proof made under the heading "Appellant has made a clear case and produced sufficient evidence to go to the jury," all of which are covered by specification 12—"that sufficient evidence was produced as to the injury, neglect, carelessness, and responsibility of the respondent to require explanation and evidence on the part of respondent to offset the case made by appellant," and we shall therefore address ourselves to this specification.

[1, 2] In order to hold respondent liable for the negligence of the chiropodist it must be made to appear from the evidence that the relation of master and servant existed at the time of the alleged negligence, and the burden of establishing this relationship is upon the party asserting it. There is no evidence in the record to show that respondent operated the chiropody department, or that the chiropodist was in any way employed by respondent, or that the entries of the charges for such service on the books of respondent corporation were otherwise than at the request of, and for the convenience of, appellant. "A servant is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master." Civ. Code, § 2009.

[3] The relation of master and servant or employer and employee exists whenever one person stands in such relation to another that the master or employer may control the work of the servant or employee and direct the manner in which it shall be done (Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 345; McCulligan v. Penn. R. Co., 214 Pa. 229, 63 A. 792, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 544, 112 Am. St. Rep. 739; Hand v. Cale, 88 Tenn. 400, 12 S. W. 922, 7 L. R. A. 96), and the essential elements are that the master or employer shall have control and direction, not only to the employment to which the contract of employment relates, but of all its details. (McCoy v. Griffith, 196 Ky. 406, 244 S. W. 871; Flaherty v. Helfont, 123 Me. 134, 122 A. 180). "It is well settled that, in order to hold the master responsible for the negligence of a servant, he must have the power of supervision of the servant's conduct. Indeed, the words master and servant imply such power." Cotter v. Lindgren, 106 Cal. 607, 39 P. 950, 46 Am. St. Rep. 255. There is no evidence that respondent in any manner controlled the work of the chiropodist's business. As a matter of law, appellant could not direct or control such work, not being a licensed chiropodist as required under the law of this state, which expressly requires a chiropodist to be licensed after having passed an examination and having pursued a course of study, and which law does not authorize the licensing of a corporation to practice chiropody. Stats. 1913, p. 722, as amended; Stats. 1921, p. 995. Appellant must be held to have known the law, and therefore to have known that a department store could not practice chiropody.

[4, 5] The statute cited, after creating a board of medical examiners, provides "for the purpose of this act chiropody shall be held to be the medical, mechanical or surgical treatment of the human feet," and defines surgical treatment as follows:

"Surgical treatment shall be held to mean the surgical treatment of abnormal nails, corns, callosities, bunions, and other minor foot ailments, not involving the bony structure."

The same statute provides that a person, in order to obtain a license as a chiropodist, must have pursued a course of study, and also that any person practicing medicine in this state without at the time possessing a license issued in accordance with the act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

A corporation cannot be licensed to practice chiropody, and therefore cannot in contemplation of law be a master over a servant concerning whose acts it could have no power of supervision. Cotter v. Lindgren, supra.

The statute requiring an examination as to the qualifications and knowledge of an applicant to practice chiropody and requiring a license from the state board places him, in so far as the question of master and servant is concerned, in the same category with lawyers, doctors, and dentists, and the authorities seem to be uniform that a corporation can neither practice nor hire lawyers, doctors, or dentists to practice for it. "A corporation can neither practice law nor hire lawyers to carry on the business of practicing law for it any more than it can practice medicine or dentistry by hiring doctors or dentists to act for it. People v. Woodbury Dermatological Institute, 192 N. Y. 454, 85 N. E. 697; Hannon v. Siegel-Cooper Co., 167 N. Y. 244, 246, 60 N. E. 597, 52 L. R. A. 429. The Legislature in authorizing the formation of corporations to carry on 'any lawful business' did not intend to include the work of the learned professions. Such an innovation with the evil results that might follow would require the use of specific language clearly indicating the intention. Recent legislation simply emphasizes and protects the established policy of the state and although ex post facto tends to show that no such object was in contemplation when the general term 'lawful business' was used in the statute to authorize the formation of business corporations. * * * Business in its ordinary sense was aimed at, not the business or calling of members of the great professions, which for time out of mind have been given exclusive rights and subjected to peculiar responsibilities." In re Co-operative Law Co., 198 N. Y. 479, 92 N. E. 15, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 55, 139 Am. St. Rep. 839, 19 Ann. Cas. 879. No action for malpractice can be maintained against a corporation because of contract of employment of a physician. As is said in Youngstown Park & Falls St. R. Co. v. Kessler, 84 Ohio St. 74, 95 N. E. 509, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 50, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 933:

"A contract to perform medical or surgical services by a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing, owning and operating a street railway, is not only ultra vires but is in direct conflict with the laws of this state regulating the practice of medicine and surgery and is, therefore, void. Such a corporation cannot be directly liable for damages for malpractice of medicine or surgery."

Counsel for appellant concedes the law to be as stated, but argues that it is not applicable here, stating in his reply brief:

"The cases cited by counsel for respondent and the law quoted by him may undoubtedly govern actions by duly accredited physicians, whether or no they have been licensed by the state to practice their profession, the mere state's license for a certain fee per certificate does not create or give him the ability of a physician or surgeon. He must possess the ability and must have passed a prescribed examination before a license is issued to him to practice."

That is precisely the case with the chiropodist. Adopting appellant's language, "he must possess the ability and must have passed a prescribed examination before a license is issued to him to practice"; that is, he must be found by the examining board issuing his license to possess the requisite qualifications concerning the "medical, mechanical or surgical treatment of the human feet," as a dentist must possess the requisite qualifications to clean and extract teeth, repair them, when diseased, by artificial ones, and perform surgical operations upon the teeth and jaw and incidental thereto upon the flesh connected therewith. People v. De France, 104 Mich. 563, 62 N. W. 709, 28 L. R. A. 139; State v. Beck, 21 R. I. 288, 43 A. 366, 45 L. R. A. 269.

A corporation cannot be held liable upon the theory of master and servant in the case where injury results to a patient treated by a chiropodist through his negligence any more than it can where the injury results from the negligence of a lawyer or a physician or surgeon, as the chiropodist—like those of the learned professions mentioned—is certified by the state board as having acquired the requisite knowledge to practice, and which knowledge the corporation does not possess, and, consequently, cannot have the power of supervision over the chiropodist's conduct, which is essential to establish the relation of master and servant. Cotter v. Lindgren, supra.

There can be no doubt that a corporation may undertake to furnish the services of a competent physician or the services of a competent chiropodist, and that it may under certain circumstances be liable in damages—as, for instance, the person employed was not authorized to practice; that he was incompetent, and the corporation had knowledge of his incompetency, or in the exercise of due care could have obtained such knowledge, etc. No such case, however, is presented here. Neither the complaint nor the evidence supports such a theory.

This seems to be a case of first impression, not only in this state, but the question has not, so far as we are advised, been directly passed upon in any jurisdiction.

In our opinion the evidence presented by appellant is not sufficient to support a finding that the chiropodist was in the employ of respondent corporation—the evidence merely showing that the chiropodist had an office in respondent's department store, and that the fees for the service rendered were charged on the books of respondent corporation at appellant's request and for appellant's convenience, and, further, that the relation of master and servant under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence did not exist.

The motion for a nonsuit was properly granted, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

CONNELL v. BROWNSTEIN-LOUIS CO.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 8, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨152(4)—Cost of attempt to remove painted sign held not occasioned by ordinary wear and tear within exception to tenant's covenant to keep in repair.

Cost of short attempt to remove advertising sign, painted on side of building by tenant, held not occasioned by ordinary wear and tear within exception to tenant's covenant to keep in repair and yield up premises in good condition and repair.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨152(4)—Cost of patching plaster, repairing elevators, tinting walls, and painting metal work, etc., held not occasioned by ordinary wear and tear within exception to tenant's covenant to keep in repair (Civ. Code, §§ 1644, 1928, 1929).

Cost of patching plaster broken by tenant's careless removal of shelving, repairing elevators operated without sufficient lubrication, tinting walls discolored partly by shelving removed, and painting metal work, sills, and pipes and tanks of sprinkling system, which were never painted during tenant's 10 years' occupancy, held not occasioned by ordinary wear and tear within exception to tenant's covenant to keep in repair and yield up premises in good condition and repair, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1644, 1928, 1929.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨37—Words of leases, as of other contracts, must be understood in ordinary popular sense (Civ. Code, § 1644).

Leases should be interpreted no more technically than other contracts, words of which are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, rather than their strict legal meaning, under Civ. Code, § 1644.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨150(1)—Tenant, allowing metal parts of building to decay for lack of repainting for 10 years, is not using ordinary care for its preservation (Civ. Code, §§ 1928, 1929).

A tenant, allowing metal parts of building to decay for lack of renewal coat of paint for 10 years, is not using ordinary care for its preservation, within Civ. Code, §§ 1928, 1929.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨152(4)—Exception of ordinary wear and tear in tenant's covenant to keep in repair contemplates deterioration in spite of ordinary care (Civ. Code, §§ 1928, 1929).

Exception of ordinary wear and tear in tenant's covenant to keep in repair and yield up premises in good condition and repair contemplates deterioration by reason of time and use, in spite of ordinary care, required by Civ. Code, §§ 1928, 1929, for their preservation.

6. Accord and satisfaction ⇨26(3)—Finding of no accord and satisfaction held based on conflicting evidence and hence not unsupported.

In action for damages by tenant's breach of covenant to keep and yield up premises in good repair, finding of no accord and satisfaction by leaving electric wiring equipment installed by tenant and other personality in leased premises when yielding possession at end of term held based on conflicting evidence as to whether they were to remain as matter of right or pursuant to claimed accord and satisfaction, and hence not unsupported.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by M. J. Connell against the Brownstein-Louis Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for damages for breach of a covenant of a 10-year lease by which defendant agreed to keep the leased premises in good repair and to yield up said premises upon the termination of the lease in good condition and repair, loss by fire and ordinary wear and tear excepted. The court found in response to the issues presented that:

"Said defendant has allowed said building and premises to become and remain in a condition of impair, waste, and deterioration by reason of the failure of said defendant to paint said building and the fire escapes thereon and to paint out signs placed by the defendant upon said building, and the failure to paint the sprinkling pipes located within and the water tanks connected therewith located upon said buildings, and the failure of said defendant to paint the walls within said buildings and to repair the floors of said buildings, and upon the termination of said lease the failure of the defendant to remove iron pipes and iron pins protruding from the surface of the cement floors of said buildings, and the failure of the defendant to cover or fill in holes cut by the defendant in the concrete floors of said buildings; by the defendant removing and failing to replace window sashes in said buildings, and by breaking and failing to replace window glass in the windows of said buildings, and by breaking and otherwise destroying and failing to repair the plaster broken and destroyed upon and in the walls, ceilings, and columns within said buildings; by failing to repair boilers, elevators, and parts of the boilers and elevators located in and forming a part of said demised premises."

The precise clause of the lease involved here is as follows:

"And that said party of the second part will keep said premises in good repair, replacing all broken glass with glass of the same size and quality of that broken, and will keep said premises and appurtenances and all things connected therewith, including the adjacent alleys, in a clean and healthy condition and good repair according to the city ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, and the direction of the proper public officers during the term of this lease at their own expense; and upon the termination of this lease, in any way, will yield up said premises to said party of the first part in good condition and repair, loss by fire and ordinary wear and tear excepted."

Appellant assumes that this clause is to be treated as one covenant, and not as two distinct ones separated by the semicolon. Assuming this to be true, without so holding, then "ordinary wear and tear excepted" is a qualification of the tenant's covenant to "keep in repair" as well as of his covenant to "yield up in good condition and repair."

It is appellant's contention that certain of the items charged to it by the judgment appealed from have the effect of making it responsible for repairs made necessary only by ordinary wear and tear. These items are: (1) Item of $40, cost of a short attempt to remove the tenant's advertising sign painted upon the side of the leased building. (2) Patching plaster where broken from interior of building, $39.35. (3) Repairing two elevators, $120 and $226.32, respectively. (4) Tinting discolored walls, $488. (5) Painting metal work and sills on front of building, $190. (6) Scraping and painting pipes and tanks of sprinkling system, $648. In order to get a sense of proportion, it should be stated that the rent reserved was 6 per cent. per annum upon the cost of the buildings ($160,000), and 5 per cent. per annum upon the agreed valuation of the land ($85,000), making $13,850 per year.

[1, 2] The first item can hardly be said to have been occasioned by ordinary wear and tear, as the sign was put there by the tenant. As to the second and third items, there was evidence tending to show that the state of impair was caused by the abuse and neglect of the tenant by removing shelving from the plastered walls in a careless manner and by operating the machinery of the elevator without sufficient lubrication. This evidence, so far as concerns the elevators, is not so clear as to amount to demonstration, but our examination of it convinces us that the court's finding in this respect is not unwarranted by the evidence. As to the fourth item, there was evidence that the walls were "badly stained," "quite discolored," "needed calcimining," but no especial cause of this is pointed out by either respondent or appellant except that at least part of the discoloring was caused by the lines of shelving used by the tenant and removed by it when surrendering. As to the fifth and sixth items, the evidence was that these metal parts had never been painted during the 10 years of the tenant's occupancy; that they were covered with rust and scale and badly in need of painting, not merely for decorative purposes, but for the purpose of properly protecting and preserving the metal. There was testimony that the metal parts on the outside of the building should be painted at least every 4 or 5 years. Do these repairs fall to the duty of the tenant, or are they excepted by the clause ordinary wear and tear? The few authorities cited in the briefs seem to us to fall short of giving any satisfactory test for determining the question. Our examination for authorities has disclosed several comprehensive collections of authorities. They are 95 Am. Dec. 115, at page 121, under Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416; 64 L. R. A. 648, and 45 A. L. R. 12.

All of the items of repair here are within the tenant's duty under a general covenant to keep in repair without qualification, according to the earlier decisions. Polack v. Pioche, supra; Egan v. Dodd, 32 Cal. App. 706, 164 P. 17. With respect to painting, a distinction has sometimes been made between painting for decoration and painting for protection and preservation of the building. The latter has uniformly been held to be the tenant's duty, and the former only when the painting is reasonably necessary to make the building tenantable, having regard to the purpose for which it is to be used, its location, and the usual requirements of the class of tenants using such premises. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 401.

[3] Many of the early decisions interpreting covenants of leases applied such a strict legal meaning to the language used that unexpected hardships often resulted. In the case of Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea, 184 Cal. 565, 575, 194 P. 1024, it was held that leases should be interpreted no more technically than other contracts; that more attention should be given to the rule of interpretation of contracts declared in Civil Code, § 1644, which states that words of a contract are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, rather than according to their strict legal meaning.

[4, 5] Applying this rule of interpretation, together with other Code provisions applicable to the question now before us, we reach the conclusion that the items of repair charged against the tenant by the trial court properly fall within the duty of the tenant under the terms of the lease. The hirer of a thing must use ordinary care for its preservation in safety and good condition (Civ. Code, § 1928) and repair injuries and deteriorations caused by his failure to do so (Civ. Code, § 1929). The buildings here leased were new—built expressly for the tenant. The term of the lease was 10 years. A tenant who sits by for 10 years and allows the metal parts of the building to decay for lack of a renewal coat of paint is not using ordinary care for its preservation. The exception of ordinary wear and tear contemplates that deterioration will occur by reason of time and use in spite of ordinary care for its preservation.

Herboth v. American Radiator Co., 145 Mo. App. 484, 123 S. W. 533, relied on by appellant, did not contain, as here, a covenant to keep in good repair. The part of the covenant there held to be binding upon the lessee under a 2-year renewal of an old lease was to repair any damage done to the buildings by negligence of its employees, careless usage, or any other cause. The phrase "any other cause" was interpreted in connection with the surrender clause as excepting "natural wear and decay." The rusted guttering and leaky roof there mentioned apparently were of a nature which required reconstruction rather than protection, and were not of such a nature as to have been caused by neglect during the 2-year renewal lease to which period the defendants' responsibility was confined by other principles considered in the decision.

[6] The court also found against the special defense of accord and satisfaction pleaded in the answer. By this plea defendant claimed that the plaintiff had agreed to waive his claim for damages in return for the defendant's leaving in and on the leased premises, when yielding possession at the end of the term, certain personal property as agreed compensation for such damages. Appellant also claims this finding is unsupported by the evidence. Toward the end of the lease term plaintiff voiced his claim for damages. Defendant disputed some of the claim and admitted parts of it. Defendant several times offered to leave on and in the premises for the plaintiff certain property, particularly certain electric wiring equipment installed by defendant in the building, in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim for damages. This offer was apparently never flatly and directly rejected by the plaintiff. His reply was that such personal property constituted a part of the realty and therefore could not be removed by the tenant either legally, or, on account of the method of its installation, profitably. Plaintiff also replied that he did not want such personal property and that the new tenant would install his own. Finally, towards the very end of the term, on December 27 or 28, 1921, according to the testimony of Mr. Brownstein of the defendant company, a Mr. McKee, an employee of the plaintiff, in response to Brownstein's request for a final answer, stated that he had seen the plaintiff and, without reporting what the plaintiff had said, told Brownstein "to leave the personal property there and that the proposition would be all right as outlined by me (Brownstein)." Although this Mr. McKee was a witness at the trial, he was not asked the direct question whether he had made this statement to Brownstein and, on objection of counsel for defendant, was not permitted to state what the plaintiff had told him to report to the defendant. He did, however, testify to conversations with Brownstein. One of these was evidently the same one as that said by Brownstein to have occurred on December 27 or 28, although McKee said it occurred on January 5, 1922. It follows:

"I said, 'Mr. Brownstein, I have just seen Mr. Connell, and we do not want you to take the material that you referred to out of the building,' and he said that he would not."

Appellant claims the above does not present a conflict of evidence.

There was also testimony that defendant during the last week of the term was endeavoring to sell this personal property to one of the new tenants and to several others. Brownstein testified that he ceased trying to sell after receiving word from McKee as above stated. That date, according to his testimony, was December 27 or 28, 1921. One of the new tenants testified that certain conduit, drops, wiring, and fixtures were purchased by him from the defendant for $262.50 on January 7, 1922, together with other personal property, aggregating $771.25. Brownstein denied selling any. There was also testimony that Brownstein, on being presented on March, 1922, with a bill for damages claimed by plaintiff, declined to pay, stating only that the material left by defendant practically offset all the claims. Brownstein denied hearing anything about the bill for damages from December 27 or 28, 1921, until February, 1923.

There are, therefore, very sharp conflicts in the testimony in some of the important details of the matters testified to by Brownstein. The trial court evidently did not believe Brownstein's statement that McKee had said to him that "the proposition would be all right," but evidently believed that McKee had only said not to take the material out of the building—meaning thereby that the plaintiff insisted that defendant had no right to take it out. We hold, therefore, that the finding of no accord and satisfaction is based upon conflicting evidence and is not unsupported within the meaning of familiar rules binding upon appellate courts.

The evidence that plaintiff's engineer told the new tenant that certain wiring and conduits would remain is emphasized by appellant, but this testimony is just as consistent with plaintiff's claim that they must remain as a matter of right as with defendant's claim that they were to remain pursuant to the claimed accord and satisfaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

TIBURNE et ux. v. BURTON. (Civ. 5963.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨930(4)—Appellate court must presume that jury, returning verdict against truck driver, found him negligent.

Jury having returned a verdict against driver of truck, in action against him and owner for damages from collision with plaintiffs' automobile, appellate court must presume that jury found driver negligent.

2. Master and servant ⇨301(1)—Respondent superior doctrine applies only when relation of master and servant exists at time and in respect to thing causing injury arose.

The doctrine of respondent superior applies only when the relation of master and servant exists between the wrongdoer and person sought to be charged for result of some neglect or wrong at very time and in respect to very thing from which injury arose.

3. Master and servant ⇨332(1)—Whether city or contractor had exclusive control of driver of truck colliding with automobile held for jury.

Whether city or one contracting to furnish it trucks with drivers to collect refuse from streets had right, either express or implied, to exercise exclusive direction and control of driver's conduct while truck was in transit, held for jury on conflicting evidence in action for damages from collision between truck and plaintiffs' automobile.

4. Appeal and error ⇨882(12)—Instruction to find for defendant owner, if truck's operation and route at time of collision was under city's direction, held not prejudicial in view of instruction given at plaintiffs' request.

In action for damages from collision between plaintiffs' automobile and defendant's truck, rented to city for collection of refuse on streets, instruction to find for defendant, if driver turned truck to wrong side of street by direction of city and its agents and operation and route of truck was under their direction at time, held not prejudicial to plaintiffs, in view of instruction, given at plaintiffs' request, leaving question of direction and control with jury in practically the same language.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Edward O. Tiburne and wife against James R. C. Burton, doing business under the firm name and style of the Burton Transfer & Storage Company, and another. From a judgment for defendant Burton, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Mark L. Herron and Russell Graham, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Randall, Bartlett & White and C. W. Byrner, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued for damages arising from a collision between an automobile operated by plaintiffs and a truck operated by defendant Gepperd, who, plaintiffs contended, was an agent and employee of defendant Burton. The cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in verdict in favor of plaintiffs against defendant Gepperd and against the plaintiffs as to defendant Burton. The plaintiffs appeal from the portion of the resulting judgment adverse to them. The appeal is presented on a bill of exceptions.

At the time of the collision the truck was owned by defendant Burton, but was rented by him to the city of Los Angeles under a written contract whereby Burton undertook to furnish the city seven trucks with drivers for the collection of refuse. The proposal and specifications under which the contract with the city was made (offered in evidence by defendant as a part of the agreement) called upon the defendant to furnish the machines and provide drivers for them, to furnish all fuel and supplies, to make all necessary repairs, and to provide garage. Every driver was required to perform his work in a satisfactory manner, and as may be specified by the city engineer, and "any driver whose services are not satisfactory to the city engineer shall be discharged by the contractor" (defendant). Payment was to be made at the rate of $10.85 per day for each truck and driver. The contractor had the power to employ and discharge the driver, and was alone responsible for the fixing and payment of his wages. He was also required to carry indemnity insurance "covering his full liability of compensation under said act (Workmen's Compensation Act [St. 1917, p. 831 as amended]) for any person injured while performing any work" under the contract.

The city undertook to direct the routes the drivers should cover in collecting the rubbish, and general directions were given by the city's representative to all drivers that they should zigzag from the right-hand side of the road to the left and back again to pick up the rubbish as they found it. The defendant Burton testified that he satisfied himself that this particular driver was a competent and courteous driver, and that he instructed all his drivers to be careful and prudent, and that he would discharge them if they were reckless.

There is some conflict in the evidence as to what was the actual cause of the collision. The witnesses for the plaintiffs testified that the truck was proceeding slowly near the middle of the highway; that, as plaintiffs appeared from the rear they sounded their horn, and attempted to pass to the left of the truck, but that the truck swerved suddenly to the left as plaintiffs were about midway, and caught the rear wheel of plaintiffs' car, causing it to upset. The driver of the truck did not appear as a witness, but two "swampers" who were riding with him at the time testified that the truck had gone to the left-hand curb about 200 feet back of the place where the collision occurred, and they had there picked up a barrel of rubbish; that it continued slowly along the left-hand side of the highway, the left wheels running in the dirt to the left of the pavement; and that plaintiffs endeavored to pass the truck while traveling at a high rate of speed, and without giving any warning signal.

[1] The jury having returned a verdict against the driver of the truck, we must presume on this appeal that it found him negligent. The only point raised by appellants on their appeal is whether the jury was properly instructed as to the liability of the respondent Burton. The only instruction which the appellants complain of reads:

"If you find that defendant Gepperd did turn his truck to the wrong side of the street, but that he did so by direction of the city of Los Angeles and its agents, and that at the time he did so the defendant Burton had no control of direction over the route or direction of the truck, but that the operation and route of the truck was under the direction of said city of Los Angeles and its agents, then I instruct you that you should find a verdict in favor of the defendant James R. C. Burton."

[2, 3] The issue was drawn bringing forth the inquiry whether the driver continued liable to the direction and control of his original master or became subject to that of the city to which his services were let. 26 Cyc. 1522. The "doctrine of respondeat superior applies only when the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged for the result of some neglect or wrong at the very time and in respect to the very thing out of which the injury arose." Billig v. S. P. Co., 189 Cal. 477, 483, 209 P. 241, 243. Evidence had been offered to show that the city had full power to direct the course of the drivers during the period of employment; that it had the power to direct the contractor to discharge any of them if his work was unsatisfactory; and that it had given special directions for them to zigzag across the highway to pick up the rubbish. It was for the jury to determine whether, under these circumstances, the city or the contractor "possessed the right, either express or implied, to exercise exclusive direction and control of the conduct of [the driver] * * * while [the truck] was in transit." Billig v. S. P. Co., supra.

[4] The jury had been instructed at the request of the plaintiffs that, if they found that the "driver was not employed by Burton, or was not subject to his orders and control as to the manner in which he operated the truck, * * * he (Burton) would not in that event be liable." And, also, that, if they found that the driver "was selected and employed by the defendant, James R. C. Burton, and that his qualifications to drive that truck were passed upon by the defendant, Burton, or those acting for him, and further that at the time of the acts constituting the negligence the truck driver was governed by or subject to the orders and control of the defendant, Burton, as to the manner in which he operated the truck * * * then the defendant, Burton, is responsible as such employer for such negligence." These instructions, taken with the one complained of, left with the jury the determination of the question who was the master of the driver, and as such responsible for his conduct at the time of the collision. If the court had been asked to determine this relation as a matter of law, as was done in the Billig Case, the correctness of the ruling in view of the conflicting evidence in this case would present a difficult problem. But, in view of the fact that the instruction requested by the plaintiffs and given by the court left the question of direction and control with the jury in practically the same language as is found in the instruction complained of, the plaintiffs could not have been prejudiced by this latter instruction.

It is said in Stewart v. California Improvement Co. et al., 131 Cal. 125, 131, 63 P. 177, 179 (52 L. R. A. 205):

"The test in all these cases is, Who conducts and supervises the particular work, the doing of which, or the careless and negligent doing of which, causes the injury or damage?"

Both the Stewart and Billig Cases have been cited by appellants. In both cases the general employer was held responsible for the negligence of the employee on the undisputed evidence that the hirer had no power of direction or control over the conduct of the servant, and no power to discharge if his work proved unsatisfactory. Here the evidence of the power of direction and control was conflicting, and the city retained the right to demand the discharge of the servant if his work proved unsatisfactory, and the contractor agreed to comply with this demand.

Judgment affirmed.

GAIRAUD v. SILVA. (Civ. 5866.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 12, 1927.

Brokers — 8(3)—Evidence held to sustain findings that owner did not execute written contract for broker's commission, relying on confidential relationship without knowing terms.

In action by real estate broker for commission, evidence held to sustain findings that broker and owner did not, prior to execution of written contract, make an oral agreement that no commission should be due unless exchange of lands was completed, and that owner did not execute written contract in reliance upon confidential relationship existing between parties without knowing that the contract provided for payment of commission upon broker securing written acceptance of owner's offer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action on written contract for services as real estate broker by L. Louis Gairaud against Joseph A. Silva. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. McGinnis, of San Jose (George W. Patterson, of San Jose, of counsel), for appellant.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued upon a written contract whereby the defendant promised to pay for services rendered by the plaintiff as a real estate broker. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant has appealed upon a type-written transcript.

The complaint alleged that the defendant employed plaintiff to negotiate the exchange of certain land owned by the defendant and promised to pay to the plaintiff a commission for such services when the latter had procured an acceptance in writing of defendant's offer of exchange; that the plaintiff procured such acceptance and defendant accepted all the terms and conditions of the proposed exchange. The answer set up special defenses pleading the confidential relationship between the plaintiff and defendant running over a period of years. It was alleged that prior to the execution of the written agreement the plaintiff and defendant had orally agreed that no commission would be due from defendant to the plaintiff unless the exchange of the lands was completed; that defendant, who was unable to read or write, relying upon the confidential relationship between the parties, did not ask to have the written contract read to him, but executed the same by inscribing his mark thereto at the special request of the plaintiff, and without knowing that the writing called upon him to pay the commission upon the plaintiff's procuring a written acceptance of his offer.

The trial court found that all the allegations covering these special defenses were untrue, and the only question upon this appeal is whether these findings are supported by the evidence. The defendant and appellant admitted upon the witness stand that no prior oral negotiations covering the payment of a commission were had. He testified that the respondent explained the terms of the agreement to him, and for that reason he did not request that the written instrument be read to him. Three witnesses called by the respondent testified that the written agreement was read to the appellant word for word before the appellant signed it, and that the matter of the payment of the commission was fully explained to him. There is no merit in the appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

LAGOMARSINO v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.
et al. (S. F. 11645.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Damages ☞131(4)—$5,120.25 for concussion of brain and cranial fracture, producing eight months' deafness and dizziness, and for impaired strength, held not excessive.

$5,120.25 damages for injuries causing severe cut, concussion of brain, cranial fracture, and deafness and dizziness for eight months' period, and loss of strength, from which plaintiff had not recovered at time of trial, held not so excessive as to show passion or prejudice of jury.

2. Street railroads ☞114(5, 13)—Finding of negligence and freedom from contributory negligence sustained by evidence as to injuries to occupant of truck colliding with street car.

In action by occupant in truck against street railroad for injuries resulting from collision with street car, claimed to be due to motorman's failure to keep lookout, jury's implied findings of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence held sustained by evidence.

3. Negligence ☞136(10)—Contributory negligence is for jury on conflicting evidence.

Issue of contributory negligence is for jury, when evidence thereon is conflicting.

4. Negligence ☞89(4)—Truck driver's negligence is not imputed to fellow servant riding with him.

Negligence of truck driver colliding with street car is not imputed to fellow servant riding with him.

5. Trial ☞233(2)—That jury did not hear complaint read does not establish that they were not aware of material issues alleged therein.

Fact that jury did not hear complaint read does not conclusively show that jury were not aware of material issues alleged therein.

6. Damages ☞143—In action for injuries, complaint alleging damages generally, except as to hospital and medical care, held sufficient.

Allegation of damages in complaint in general terms, except as to hospital and medical care, held sufficient in action for injuries.

7. Street railroads ☞113(2)—Ordinance requiring equipment of motor cars with sand boxes to facilitate stopping cars held admissible against street railroad.

In action against street railroad for injuries at crossing after hailstorm, admission in evidence of city ordinance requiring equipment of motor cars with sand boxes for use in stopping cars held not prejudicial, inasmuch as failure to equip particular car with boxes or to use sand therefrom in case equipment was furnished would tend to prove negligence.

8. Street railroads ☞113(5)—Permitting examination of motorman as to possible speed of street car held not error.

Where, in action against street railroad for injuries, it was claimed that motorman had violated speed limit as fixed by city ordinance, permitting lengthy examination of motorman as to speed which it was possible for similar street car to attain, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by J. L. Lagomarsino against the Market Street Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Walter H. Linforth, all of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, and Ralph H. Lachmund, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. [1, 2] This appeal is from a judgment in the sum of $5,120.25 entered upon the verdict of a jury trying said cause against appellants and in favor of respondent on account of injuries and damages sustained by respondent as the proximate result of a collision between a heavy automobile truck owned and operated by the Shell Company of California, and upon which respondent, while engaged in the course of his employment, was seated by the side of the driver of said truck, and a street car operated by defendant corporation, which was in charge of appellant Harpe, the motorman.

The collision occurred at the intersection of Ninth avenue and Clement street, in the city and county of San Francisco, at about the hour of 11 o'clock a. m. on November 8, 1922. It was rather a dark day, and hail had fallen but a short time before the collision occurred. The street car was eastbound on Clement street, and the truck was northbound on Ninth avenue. The street car came to a stop at the Eleventh avenue intersection, but made no other interstreet stop, and at the time it reached the middle of the block bounded by Tenth and Ninth avenues, where it was first observed by plaintiff, it was moving at a rate of speed variously estimated from 17 to 30 miles an hour. It was the testimony of the plaintiff that the motorman was not looking ahead of the car, but was engaged in conversing with a person, standing by his side. The driver of the truck, upon observing the peril of the situation at a time when the street car was some distance from the point where the truck was crossing Clement street, blew a shrill whistle to engage the motorman's attention, but the motorman failed to arrest the momentum of said street car, and it struck the truck with violent force a few feet past its midsection, throwing both occupants of the truck to the ground with such force that respondent suffered concussion of the brain, sustained a cranial fracture 4 inches in length on the right side of the head, and received a severe cut on the left ear. He was incapacitated for several months, and suffered from temporary deafness, dizziness, and loss of general strength for something like eight months. He had not at the time of the trial regained his former vigor, and, while given lighter work by his employer at the same salary which he formerly received, he was not fully restored to his former robust health. We have given consideration to the objection made to the amount of damages awarded, but we are not able to say as a matter of law that the verdict in that respect is the result of passion or prejudice. There is some evidence that respondent has suffered from recurrent headaches, dizziness, and other ailments since his injuries, which did not distress him before the collision. Under this state of the record we cannot disturb the jury's implied findings.

[3, 4] If it could be said that the driver of the truck was guilty of contributory negligence, and this we are not permitted to say in view of conflicting evidence on the point, the negligence of the fellow servant was not attributable to respondent. Neither do we find any error in the instructions which could have prejudiced the rights of appellants. The instructions fairly state the law of the case, and the jury must have believed appellants guilty of actionable negligence upon the evidence adduced upon the trial, and was not misled to its prejudice by any claimed uncertainty, or want of clarity, or incorrect statement of the law by the trial court.

[5-8] We think there is no substantial merit in the point that the jury was not informed as to the issues of the case. The fact that the jury did not hear the complaint read, as stated by the court in its offer to permit the jury to take into the jury room certain papers and exhibits, is not conclusive of the assumed fact that the jury was not aware of the material issues alleged therein. The court in its instructions sufficiently informed the jury as to the issues presented by the case. The complaint alleged damages, except as to hospital and medical care, in general terms. This is a sufficient pleading under the authorities in this class of cases. 8 Cal. Jur. 885 et seq. The admission in evidence of the ordinance of the city requiring motor cars to be equipped with a sand box containing sand at each end of the car, and so arranged as to release sand upon the rails as weather conditions required, was without prejudice under any phase of the case. If the car was equipped with sand appliances, and they were not used in bringing the car to a stop, such a failure might tend to establish negligence. On the other hand, if there were no such appliances, and the city ordinance required them, that, too, would be a circumstance for the jury to consider with reference to the ability of the motorman to stop his car on a wet track within reasonable distances. We find no error in permitting a rather lengthy examination of the motorman as to the speed which it was possible for a car such as was in his charge to attain. One of the principal questions in the case was whether or not the motorman had violated the speed limit as fixed by the city ordinance, and the capability of the car, or a similar car to acquire speed had some relevancy to the position assumed by appellants on that issue. We find no reversible error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

FORD MOTOR CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 12503.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 18, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1927.

1. Master and servant ☞385(11)—In computing percentage of permanent disability caused by second injury, disability caused by first may not be deducted (Workmen's Compensation Insurance & Safety Act 1917, § 9[b] 2[10]).

Percentage of permanent disability caused by second compensable injury must be computed by Industrial Accident Commission without reference to previous injury or permanent disability caused thereby, and without deducting percentage of disability resulting from previous injury, under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 839) § 9(b) 2(10).

2. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Industrial Accident Commission's finding of percentage of permanent disability is conclusive, if justified by any evidence.

Computation of percentage of permanent disability resulting from injury is matter within exclusive jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission, and its finding thereon may not be disturbed by Supreme Court, if there was any evidence before the Commission to justify it.

3. Master and servant ☞385(11)—"Average annual earnings" of employee sustaining second injury must be based on earning capacity in labor market, and not on wages received (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance & Safety Act 1917, § 9[b] 2[7], and §§ 11[f], 12).

In determining average annual earnings of employee sustaining second compensable injury for purpose of ascertaining proper compensation, average annual earnings at time of injury must be fixed at such sum as will reasonably represent his earning capacity if he were forced to compete in an open labor market, and it was improper to determine average annual earnings by amount of wages actually received when wages received exceeded this by generosity of employer under Workmen's Compensation, In-insurance & Safety Act (St. 1917, pp. 837, 842) § 9(b) 2(7), and §§ 11(f) and 12.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance & Safety Act of 1917 by William Shortall, employee, opposed by the Ford Motor Company, employer, and the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, insurer, and others. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, the employer and the insurer apply for certiorari. Award annulled, and case remanded.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent commission.

William F. Humphrey, of San Francisco, and Morgan J. Doyle, of Washington, D. C., for respondent William Shortall.

CURTIS, J. Proceedings in certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of William Shortall, who was employed as a mechanic by the Ford Motor Company. While so employed, and on the 29th day of July, 1921, he sustained an injury to his back. This injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, and consisted of a fracture of the spine, with a series of sprained ligaments and membranes about the spine at or near its juncture with the sacrum. In proceedings instituted before the Industrial Accident Commission for an award for compensation for the injury thus sustained said commission found that he was permanently disabled as a result of said injury, and fixed the percentage of his disability at 80¾ per cent. Upon this finding an award against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, the insurer of the Ford Motor Company, was made in favor of William Shortall in the sum of $5,000, payable at the rate of $20.83 per week from the date of the injury, exclusive of the waiting period, for the period of 240 weeks and thereafter the additional sum of $6.55 per week during his lifetime. After sustaining this injury, he returned to the employ of the Ford Motor Company wearing a steel jacket to sustain his spine. His main work after his return was passing out tools over the counter. This was light work which he was able to perform in his disabled condition. The Ford Company, following a rule of re-employing its disabled employees, paid Shortall for these services after his return to its employ the same wages that it had paid him as a mechanic before his injury. On September 16, 1924, and during his employment after his return following the first injury, he sustained a second injury to his spine. This injury was caused by his attempt to move a counter, and resulted in again straining his spine at the point of its first injury. Thereupon he filed a second application before the commission, and upon the hearing thereof the commission found:

"1. Applicant, William Shortall, on the 16th day of September, 1924, at San Francisco, California, while in the employ of the defendant, Ford Motor Company, at which time the employer was insured against liability under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, by the defendant, General Accident, Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Ltd., sustained an injury arising out of and in the course of said employment, consisting of a strain of the back. * * *

"3. The employee had, prior to said injury, sustained a strain of the back, while in the employ of said defendant Ford Motor Company, on the 29th day of July, 1921, resulting in permanent disability amounting to 80¾ per cent. of total disability, for which, in proceeding numbered 11176 before this commission, an award was entered against the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. As a combined result of said injuries, the employee now has a permanent disability, * * * amounting to 95¼ per cent. total disability, and entitling him to compensation from the defendant General Accident, Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Ltd., at the rate of $20.83 per week, for a period of 240 weeks, beginning with the eighth day after said injury of September 16, 1924, and thereafter at the rate of $11.30 per week, during the remainder of the employee's life; amount accrued to January 25, 1927 (122 weeks), exclusive of the waiting period of seven days, is $2,541.26; payments on account, $280.30; balance due as of said date $2,260.96. The foregoing benefit is based upon the maximum wage permitted by law as a basis for compensation."

This award was against the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, the insurer of the Ford Motor Company at the date of the second injury. The Ford Motor Company and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, the insurer at the time of the first injury, were made parties to the second proceeding, as well as the first, but were relieved of all liability under the second award. After a denial of a petition for a rehearing by the commission, the Ford Motor Company and the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation have by these proceedings brought the record of the commission to this court for review. Just what standing the Ford Motor Company has in this proceeding is not apparent, as the commission by its award relieved it of all liability thereunder. This fact is not of material importance, however, as all the questions pertinent to the issues here can be, and have been, raised by the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, who is a proper party hereto.

[1] Petitioners assail said award upon various grounds, the principal one being that the award is contrary to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The proper designation of this act is "Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917" (Laws of 1917, p. 831). We will refer to it herein as the Workmen's Compensation Act. It is contended by petitioners that the commission found that Shortall, as a result of the two injuries, suffered a permanent disability amounting to 95¼ per cent. of total disability, and that, as it had previously found as a result of the first injury his permanent disability was 80¼ per cent. of total disability, the commission in effect awarded Shortall compensation based upon a 176 per cent. total disability. Petitioners further contend that Shortall as a result of the second injury, only sustained a 14½ per cent total disability, and that the commission should have taken this percentage of total disability as a basis, and, in connection with the wages he was receiving at the time of sustaining this second injury, made an award of compensation due him as a result of this second injury. As we understand the Workmen's Compensation Act, the commission was right in computing the percentage of total disability caused by the second injury without reference to any injury previously suffered or any permanent disability caused by the previous injury. We are in doubt, however, as to the correctness of the action of the commission in taking the wages Shortall was receiving at the time he sustained the second injury as a basis for awarding compensation for the latter injury. The sections of the Workmen's Compensation Act governing this matter are as follows:

Section 9(b) 2(7): "In determining the percentages of permanent disability, account shall be taken of the nature of the physical injury or disfigurement, the occupation of the injured employee, and his age at the time of such injury, consideration being given to the diminished ability of such injured employee to compete in an open labor market."

Section 9(b) 2(10): "The percentage of permanent disability caused by any injury shall be so computed as to cover the permanent disability caused by that particular injury without reference to any injury previously suffered or any permanent disability caused thereby."

Section 11 (f): "The fact that an employee has suffered a previous disability, or receives compensation therefor, shall not preclude him from compensation for a later injury, or his dependents from compensation for death resulting therefrom, but in determining compensation for the later injury, or death resulting therefrom, his average annual earnings shall be fixed at such sum as will reasonably represent his annual earning capacity at the time of the later injury."

[2] Section 9 (b) 2 (7), it is apparent, sets forth the matters to be taken into account and considered by the commission in determining generally the percentage of permanent disability caused by an injury without reference to whether such injury is the first or a subsequent injury. Section 9 (b) 2 (10), on the other hand, contains a direction for computing the percentage of permanent disability caused by an injury after an injury previously suffered. By this provision the commission is directed to compute the percentage of permanent disability caused by any particular injury without reference to any injury previously suffered by said employee or without reference to any permanent disability caused by said previous injury. It would be a direct violation of said section of the statute, as construed by this court in Liptak v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 251 P. 635, for the commission in computing the percentage of permanent disability caused by the second injury to take into consideration any former injury of said employee and to deduct the percentage of disability caused thereby from the disability found to exist in the injured employee after sustaining the second injury. The commission, therefore, acted in accordance with the requirements of the Workmen's Compensation Act in computing the percentage of permanent disability sustained by reason of the second injury without reference to any former injury. In making this computation the commission fixed the percentage of permanent disability sustained by Shortall at 95¼ per cent. of total disability. This was a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the commission, and this court has no power to disturb such action provided there was any evidence before the commission to justify such a finding. It is not claimed by the petitioner that the evidence was insufficient if the above construction is given to section 9 (b) 2 (10).

[3] The commission, however, after fixing the percentage of permanent disability sustained by the employee after receiving the second injury, based the amount of compensation he was entitled to receive on account of such injury upon the wages he was receiving at the time of his second injury. That is, the commission took the amount of wages he was receiving at the time he received the second injury as a basis under section 12 of the act in determining his average annual earnings at that time. The evidence shows that both before and after the first injury the employee was receiving $6.96 per day for six days per week, or $41.76 per week. The commission on each occasion took the highest average weekly earnings, that is, $31.05, permitted by section 12, in computing the average annual earnings of the employee. The evidence shows without conflict that the Ford Motor Company, the employer, in keeping with a rule adopted by it, had employed the injured employee after his first injury, and was employing him to do light work which he was able to perform in his injured state, and was paying him the same wages he received as a mechanic before he was injured on the first occasion. The commission, as we have seen, took the wages the injured employee was receiving at the time of his second injury as a basis for determining his compensation for the second injury. Ordinarily the compensation awarded to an injured employee would be computed with reference to the average weekly wages the injured employee was receiving at the time of sustaining an injury within the limitation fixed by section 12, but in our opinion the provisions of section 11 (f) must be taken into consideration by the commission in fixing the compensation for a second injury. This section prescribes the rule for fixing compensation in such cases. It is there provided that:

"The fact that an employee has suffered a previous disability, or receives compensation therefor, shall not preclude him from compensation for a later injury, or his dependents from compensation for death resulting therefrom, but in determining compensation for the later injury, or death resulting therefrom, his average annual earnings shall be fixed at such sum as will reasonably represent his annual earning capacity at the time of the later injury."

In determining the meaning of the words "annual earning capacity," as used in this section, reference must be made to section 9 (b) 2 (7), wherein it is provided that "consideration being given to the diminished ability of such injured employee to compete in an open labor market." Reading these two sections together, the meaning of section 11 (f) we think, is clear. Upon receiving a second injury, the injured employee's average annual earnings at the time he received such injury is to be fixed at such a sum as will reasonably represent his annual earning capacity as he is forced to compete in an open labor market after sustaining his first injury. As a rule, the commission may safely take the amount of wages which the injured employee was receiving at the time of sustaining his second injury as a basis for determining his annual earning capacity at that time. The facts produced before the commission, however, in this proceeding show that the commission should not have followed that course in fixing the compensation of the injured employee herein. The earnings received by Shortall at the time he received the second injury were not based upon his earning capacity in competition in an open labor market, but upon the wages paid him by a generous employer in compliance with its policy to re-employ and pay to its injured employees the same wages after an injury as were paid before said injury. In such a case, before the commission can determine the amount of compensation to which such an injured employee would be entitled, it must first comply with the provisions of section 11 (f) and fix his average annual earnings by the method provided therein. While the commission in computing the percentage of permanent disability caused by an injury must do so without reference to any previous injury, yet in determining the compensation for a later injury no such restrictions are placed upon the commission. On the other hand, by section 11 (f) the commission is expressly directed to fix such compensation for a later injury upon the earning capacity of the injured employee at the time of such injury. After ascertaining his earnings by this process, and having determined the percentage of permanent disability in the manner in which we have already indicated, it is then merely a matter of mathematical computation to determine in conformity with other provisions of the act the amount of compensation the injured employee is entitled to receive for his second or later injury. Instead of adopting this method, the commission, after correctly determining the percentage of permanent disability, sustained by the injured employee by reason of his second injury, took the amount of wages the employee was receiving at the time as the basis of fixing the compensation for this injury. These wages, as we have already observed, were not paid on the basis of his earning capacity, but in compliance with a policy of his employer to re-employ injured employees at the same wages received by them before the injury. It is obvious that an employee who has sustained an injury causing a percentage of disability amounting to 80% per cent. of total disability has not, as a general rule, the same earning capacity after sustaining such an injury as he had before he was so injured. That is what we would expect generally. Of course, if the injured employee had rehabilitated himself after his injury so that his earning capacity after the injury was equal to that before the injury, then a different question would be presented. For illustration, if any employee was a machinist at the time of his first injury and as such was receiving machinist's wages, and compensation had been awarded him for such injury, but after such injury, he had made himself proficient as a telegrapher, and as a telegrapher he was able to command a salary equal to the wages he received before his injury, such an employee on receiving a second injury resulting in permanent disability would be entitled to receive compensation based upon the salary he received as a telegrapher within the limits fixed by section 12 of the act, if the commission should find that his earning capacity at the time of the second injury was equal to the salary received at that time. But we have no such a condition before us in the present proceeding. There is no showing that the injured employee had rehabilitated himself to any extent whatever after the first injury. In fact, all the evidence in the record is against any such inference. It became the duty, therefore, of the commission before awarding him compensation for his second injury, to fix his average annual earnings based upon his annual earning capacity at the time of the second injury, and not upon the wages he was then receiving, and, upon the sum so fixed, and the percentage of permanent disability determined, compute the compensation due for the later injury. This the commission failed to do, and for this reason the award is illegal.

The award is annulled, and the case is remanded for further proceedings before the commission not inconsistent with this opinion.

In re BACIGALUPI'S ESTATE.

ARATA v. CANALE et al. (S. F. 11964.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 18, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1927.

1. Wills ⇨55(10)—Purpose of former testaments to distribute property equitably is of much weight on issue of disposing mind, where final will makes similar disposition.

Fact that dispositions in testatrix's final will showed continuity of purpose, running through all her former testaments, to distribute her property among numerous relations according to needs and claims of each on her bounty, is entitled to much weight in determining whether she was in possession of disposing mind in making final bequests.

2. Wills ⇨50—Final will, devising to principal beneficiaries same properties as prior wills, and differing therefrom only in joining additional residuary legatee, subject to precatory suggestions, held not void for mental unsoundness.

Final will, devising to testatrix's niece, as principal beneficiary, and her immediate family, same properties as by prior wills, and containing residuary clause differing from such wills only in joining close friend of testatrix and her deceased husband with such niece's son as legatee, subject to precatory suggestions as to use of properties bequeathed, held not void for mental unsoundness, though testatrix was old, feeble, and afflicted by fatal disorder at time of executing it.

3. Wills ⇨159—Will devising to principal beneficiary, attending testatrix in last years, less than former wills held not void for undue influence.

Will devising to testatrix's niece, who ministered to testatrix in her last helpless years, a lesser amount of estate than that given her by former wills, though more than shares of other relatives of same degree, held not void for undue influence by such niece.

4. Wills ⇨163(2)—Testatrix's friend held not to occupy confidential relation, raising presumption of undue influence.

An old and trusted friend of testatrix and her deceased husband held not to occupy such confidential relation toward her as to raise presumption of undue influence over her mind and purposes in making final will, joining him with son of testatrix's niece as residuary legatee.

5. Wills ⇨166(4)—Residuary legatee's procurement of his attorney to draw will held not to show undue influence.

That attorney, procured by one of two residuary legatees to draw final will, had acted as such legatee's attorney, held not to show undue influence over testatrix, where he was lawyer of high character, known to testatrix for 25 years, was not engaged in any substantial business for such legatee at time, and acted with scrupulous regard to testatrix's wishes, without slightest suggestion touching such legatee's interest.

6. Wills ⇨166(1)—Will joining 76 year old friend and niece's 24 year old son as residuary legatees, with precatory suggestion for distribution of fund, held not void for undue influence by such friend.

Will naming 76 year old man, who had been friend of testatrix and her deceased husband for many years, as joint residuary legatee with 24 year old son of testatrix's niece, subject to precatory suggestions, contained in abbreviated form in prior wills, that residuum be distributed among members of testatrix's family in need of relief at any future time, until exhaustion of fund, held not void for undue influence by such friend.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Petition by Lino Arata to revoke the will of Angiola Bacigalupi, deceased, opposed by Dionisio Canale and others, proponents. From a judgment of nonsuit, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert P. Welch, W. H. Morrissey, of San Francisco, and P. B. Lynch, of Vallejo (Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

W. W. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit upon the trial of a contest of the last will and testament of Angiola Bacigalupi, deceased. The contest of said will was instituted by Lino Arata, one of the nephews and heirs at law of said decedent, in the form of a petition to revoke the said will of the decedent, which had theretofore been admitted to probate. The contestant in his petition presented five grounds of contest: (1) That the instrument was a forged and pretended will. This ground was abandoned at the trial.

(2) That the testatrix was of unsound mind at the time of the making and execution of her said will. (3) That the will was not legally executed. This ground has been abandoned upon this appeal.

(4) That the will was the result of undue influence exercised over the testatrix by Antonio Nardini and Vittoria Canale, two of the beneficiaries under said will. (5) That the residuary clause in said will was void for certain alleged reasons affecting the precautionary trust provisions thereof. This ground of contest was withdrawn upon demurrer to said petition. The only two remaining grounds of contest urged upon the trial and upon this appeal were those of unsoundness of mind and undue influence.

Angiola Bacigalupi was a native of Italy, but came to California when a girl, and, marrying, lived in this state with her husband, Theodore Bacigalupi, for many years. Her husband died in the year 1915, leaving a considerable amount of community property to his widow, and which constituted her estate at the time of her death, in March, 1924, at the age of 74 years. Her children had died in infancy, and her surviving relatives consisted of an aged sister, since deceased, who lived in Italy; another sister, who was an inmate of the Stockton hospital for the insane; three children of her deceased sister Catharine De Martini; and eight children and grandchildren of her deceased sister Mary Arata. The contestant, her nephew, was one of the sons of the last-named sister of the testatrix. Practically all of the foregoing relatives or the families of them were mentioned by name and remembered in the aforesaid last will of the decedent. Angiola Bacigalupi had made and executed four wills since the death of her husband in 1915; one on April 4, 1916; one on April 10, 1919; one on January 12, 1922; and, lastly, the will under review, on December 10, 1923—all of which wills are embodied in the record upon this appeal. Each of the first three of these wills was prepared under her direction by W. W. Sanderson, Esq., who appears herein as the attorney of record for the respondents, and who also appeared and testified as a witness herein. The last of said wills was drawn by Joseph Cavagnaro, Esq., an Italian attorney of this city, whose standing at the bar and in public repute will hereinafter be adverted to. These four wills of the decedent were before the trial court, and the circumstances under which the first three of the decedent's said wills were drawn and the contents of each of these doubtless influenced in a large measure its conclusion in upholding the fourth and last will. In each of the three former wills of the decedent, drawn under her direction, and when she was unquestionably of sound and disposing mind, and when it is not pretended with any show of reason that she was acting under undue influence, she displayed the same general purpose to distribute equitably her estate among her relatives which was evinced as the chief object of her last testament. A comparison of these several wills discloses the fact that, while different dispositions are made of portions of the testatrix's property to this or that one of her relatives, the families of these relatives share with quite remarkable equality in the properties or moneys directed to be distributed among them, or to particular members of them, by the terms of these several testaments. After the death of her husband, in the year 1915, and her succession to the common property of each, Mrs. Bacigalupi continued to reside in the family home at Union and Jones streets, in San Francisco. Her household consisted of her niece, Vittoria Canale, and one Antonio Nardini, who was, as it appears, an old friend of her husband and herself, a fellow countryman who had known them both intimately for half a century, and who had come to occupy their home with them in about the year 1906, after the earthquake and fire.

[1, 2] While the evidence discloses the fact that from time to time in the management of her considerable properties after the death of her husband she consulted and advised with Mr. Nardini, there is no evidence in the record that he exercised, or attempted to exercise, any influence whatever, and assuredly no undue influence, over her mind or purposes in the making of the first three of her several wills; nor is there any evidence whatever tending in any degree to show that the niece of Mrs. Bacigalupi, Vittoria Canale, exercised, or attempted to exercise, any such influence affecting the action or purposes of her aunt in the dispositions of her three former wills, except for the single fact that Vittoria Canale and her family were bequeathed a larger share in the estate of Mrs. Bacigalupi than were other members of the several families which were numbered among the latter's relatives, and this may be fully accounted for by the fact, as abundantly shown by the evidence, that it was Vittoria Canale who devoted herself to ministering to the personal needs and growing infirmities of her aunt as she approached the close of her life. During her later years Mrs. Bacigalupi had become much affected with that chronic malady known as Bright's disease, and which was finally the cause of her death. During the year 1923 she had become almost, if not entirely, blind (this being one of the effects of that disorder), and had come to realize that her end was near. It was while thus affected, and within about four months of her death, that the final will was drawn and executed; and it was out of the circumstances coincident with her growing infirmities, and particularly those immediately attending the drafting and execution of her final will, that the contestant herein has evoked the evidence upon which he relies to sustain his contest of that will. His remaining grounds of contest are two; First, that of the testatrix's unsoundness of mind at the time of the execution of her said last will; second, that of the undue influence exerted over her by her niece, Vittoria Canale, and by her lifelong friend, Antonio Nardini. As to the first of these grounds of contest, we do not deem it necessary to review in anything of detail the evidence educed on behalf of the contestant. That this evidence shows that the testatrix was old and feeble and afflicted by her fatal disorder and its growing infirmities may be conceded; but a careful review of the evidence presented on behalf of the contestant shows no more, but, on the contrary, discloses that for a person in her blind and afflicted condition the testatrix exhibited a knowledge, not only of her own properties and affairs, but a familiarity with the affairs and conditions of her numerous relatives, entirely incompatible with any such a degree of mental incapacity as would serve to sustain a contest of her will upon that ground. The fact that her final will showed as to its dispositions a continuity of purpose running through all of her former testaments, and indicating a settled intent to distribute her property among her numerous relations according to the needs and claims of each upon her bounty, is entitled to much weight in determining whether or not the testatrix was in possession of a disposing mind in making her final bequests. Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 708, 235 P. 45; Estate of Shay, 196 Cal. 355, 364, 237 P. 1079. This conclusion has especial significance when the fact is noted that it is against the clauses in said will wherein Vittoria Canale, the niece of the testatrix, is devised a larger and more valuable share of her aunt's estate than is given to others of her relatives of the same degree that this contest is directed. In that regard each of the four wills of the decedent manifest a settled purpose to bestow upon Vittoria Canale or her immediate family the very properties willed to her or them by the decedent's final testament; while as to the residuary clauses in the decedent's final will these only differ from the residuary clauses of the first will of the testatrix executed in the year 1916, in the fact that Antonio Nardini is in the last will joined with the son of Vittoria Canale in the bequests thereof, subject to the precatory suggestions of the giver as to the uses to be made of the properties embraced in said residuary bequest. We dismiss, therefore, without further comment, the charge of mental unsoundness in approving the ruling of the trial court upon this ground of contest.

[3] The second ground of contest, to wit, the ground of the undue influence of Vittoria Canale and Antonio Nardini, we regard as equally without merit. As to Vittoria Can-ale, it may be stated without recapitulation of the evidence that by the terms of the decedent's last will she is to receive a lesser amount of the testatrix's estate than that accorded her by the provisions of the former wills and it is difficult, therefore, to perceive how her influence over the final purposes of the testatrix producing that result could be held to be either controlling or undue; this without regard to the utter flimsiness and lack of substance of the evidence of the contestant in attributing an evil motive to the ministrations of this faithful attendant upon the testatrix in her last helpless and afflicted years.

[4-6] As to the contestant's evidence touching the alleged undue influence of Antonio Nardini over the mind and purposes of the testatrix in the making of her final will, it should be noted that Antonio Nardini, though an old and trusted friend of both Angiola Bacigalupi and her deceased husband, does not come within the category of those who, by virtue of their relationship to a donor of property by deed or will, are held to occupy such a confidential relation which in and of itself would raise the presumption of undue influence. Frantz v. Porter, 132 Cal. 49, 64 P. 92; Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 452, 221 P. 361; Estate of Hinde (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 561. The evidence which the contestant offered in support of his claim of undue influence on the part of Antonio Nardini was almost wholly confined to the acts and conduct of Nardini in procuring the attendance upon Mrs. Bacigalupi of the attorney who prepared her final will. It is the claim of the contestant that in the procurement of the attorney in question to advise the former as to the terms of her will and to draw and bring about the execution thereof, Nardini was providing his attorney, who would act as such, and not as Mrs. Bacigalupi's independent legal advisor in connection with the making and execution of said will. The evidence utterly fails to sustain this contention. Mr. Joseph Cavagnaro was the attorney whose services were thus enlisted. Mr. Cavagnaro was and is an Italian attorney and counsellor at law of many years' practice in the city of San Francisco, and is admittedly a lawyer of high character, and held in much esteem among the people of his own nationality in said city. He had known, and doubtless been known by, Mrs. Bacigalupi for a quarter of a century. He had in other years acted for Mr. Nardini as his attorney, but was not engaged in any substantial business for him at the time his services were sought to draw the final will of Mrs. Bacigalupi; and no inference arises from the fact that he was so sought by Mr. Nardini, that in so acting he was acting as Nardini's attorney. On the contrary, the undisputed evidence in the case shows beyond any serious question that Mr. Cavagnaro acted as the attorney and consellor of his client, Mrs. Bacigalupi, in the preparation and execution of her final will, and that in so doing he acted with scrupulous regard to the wishes of said client in the performance of his professional duties, and without the slightest suggestion touching the interest of Mr. Nardini in the premises. We therefore acquit Mr. Cavagnaro of any disloyalty to his client, Mrs. Bacigalupi, in the making and execution of her final will, and in so doing also acquit Mr. Nardini of the charge of undue influence in supplying the testatrix with a skillful and faithful legal advisor. But, aside from this contention, the case of the contestant completely breaks down when we come to consider the provisions of the decedent's will relating to the bequest to Mr. Nardini. By the residuary clause of the decedent's last will Antonio Nardini is not for the first time named as a beneficiary of the testatrix's bounty, since by the terms of the decedent's third will, executed in January, 1922, the residuum of her estate was bequeathed to the joint ownership of Nicolas Canale, son of Vittoria Canale, and Antonio Nardini, or to the survivor of them; and the final will of said deceased differs from this former will only in the greater particularity with which the precatory suggestions accompanying the bequest are set forth in the final will.

When the residuary clause in the decedent's final will is considered in the light of her three former wills, the striking fact is disclosed that the decedent's purpose in so disposing of the residuum of her estate was to provide a fund which would be available for distribution among members of her family who might be in need of relief at any future time and until the fund was exhausted. The first will of the decedent in giving the residuum to Vittoria Canale contained this precatory provision in abbreviated form; the second will varied its bequest, but retained its essential purpose; the third will returned to the substantial restatement of the terms of the first will in the foregoing regard, except that Nicolas Canale and Antonio Nardini were substituted for Vittoria Canale as the subjects of its benefit and burden. The fourth and last will further amplified the terms of the bequest, but did not change either its beneficiaries or its essential nature. The amount of property which would fall into this residuum varied under these several wills, and with reasons appearing for such variation which the contestant herein is in no position to criticize; but the substantial value of the residuum did not materially vary, nor did it constitute more than a minor portion of the decedent's estate. The main property which was left in this residuum by the decedent's final will was a piece of so-called "oil land" in Kern county, of doubtful value, because of the fact that no oil has as yet been sought for or found therein. The claim of the contestant that Antonio Nardini's undue influence over the mind and action of the testatrix in making him a beneficiary of this bequest in the testatrix's final will is reduced to a minimum when it is found to be a substantial repetition of the like bequest in a former will, but it reaches the point of absurdity when two other facts indisputably appear. The first of these is the fact that the bequest is coupled with a precatory suggestion with relation to the disposition of this residuum which, while it does not amount to a trust, lays a moral obligation upon the donees which would, if fulfilled, render it more of a burden than a blessing, and with respect to which there is not a semblance of showing in this case that the donees will not fulfill. The relation of friendship, unbroken through many years, between Antonio Nardini and the testatrix and her predeceased husband, and apparently justified by his character, the relationship of blood existing between the testatrix and the other recipient in a co-ownership with Nardini of this donation, forbid the inference either that Nardini would prove faithless to the moral duty accompanying this residuary bequest or that he would be permitted to do so, even were he so minded, by Nicolas Canale, his co-owner therein, and without whose consent any breach of the precatory obligation would be impossible. Finally, the fact that Nardini was at the time of the making of this will of the age of 76 years or over, while his co-owner in the bequest is or was of about the age of 24, and will in all human probability in a short while at most be his survivor, renders impossible of conception the idea that Antonio Nardini would have engaged himself in the exercise of undue influence over the mind and will of the testatrix with the foregoing results in view. We are impelled from a reading of this entire record to the conclusion that the contestant's case at the close of his showing in support thereof had entirely failed in showing any substantial or even reasonable grounds of contest, and hence that the order of the trial court in granting the motion for a nonsuit was fully justified by the state of the evidence educed by the contestant himself.

The judgment, based upon such order, is therefore affirmed.

TASKER v. WARMER, Judge. (L. A. 9995.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 15, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨657(1)—Appellate court, during pendency of appeal, may authorize temporary withdrawal of record for correction and amendment.

Appellate court, having jurisdiction of a record regularly on file, may properly authorize temporary withdrawal thereof at any time during pendency of appeal, so that same might be corrected and amended in conformity to direction of appellate court.

2. Appeal and error ⇨657(1)—Trial judge's refusal to permit correction of transcript which appellate court had permitted to be withdrawn for such purpose held erroneous.

Refusal of trial judge to grant motion for correction and certification of transcript, temporary withdrawal of which appellate court had authorized for such purpose, held improper.

3. Appeal and error ⇨607(1)—Insufficiency of request for transcript is not defect jurisdictional to appeal (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a-953c).

Insufficiency of application for transcript, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a-953c, is not a defect which is jurisdictional to the appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⇨657(1)—One seeking amendment and certification of transcript cannot be held guilty of laches, where appellate court authorized withdrawal for such purpose.

Parties seeking amendment and certification of transcript cannot be held guilty of laches, where appellate court, during pendency of appeal, directed withdrawal and amendment of transcript.

5. Mandamus ⇨57(1)—Mandamus held proper to compel trial judge to permit amendment and certification of transcript which appellate court had permitted to be withdrawn for such purpose.

Where appellate court permitted temporary withdrawal of transcript for purpose of amendment and certification, trial judge was without discretion to refuse such certification and amendment on request, and mandamus may be properly issued to compel him to permit such amendment and certification.

In Bank.

Application by Barbara A. Tasker for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to Benjamin F. Warmer, as Judge of the Superior Court of San Bernardino County, to require respondent to permit amendment of transcript and to further certify same. Writ granted.

Loewenthal, Lissner, Roth & Gunter, of Los Angeles, and Raymond E. Hodge, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

W. F. Lewis and Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This mandamus proceeding arose out of an action entitled Tasker v. Cochrane, wherein the petitioner, as plaintiff and assignee of a law firm, sought to recover attorney's fees for services alleged to have been rendered by her assignor. After trial of said action, the jury returned a verdict in favor of petitioner, and judgment was accordingly entered thereon. Upon motion duly made the respondent judge, who presided at the trial of said action, made an order granting to the defendant therein a new trial. From the order granting such new trial the petitioner in this proceeding prosecuted an appeal to this court. In her request for a transcript to be used upon said appeal it was asked "that a transcript of all pleadings in said action, and the testimony offered or taken, exhibits and evidence introduced, offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts, or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate, be made up and prepared in accordance with section 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure of California." Thereafter the clerk of the lower court prepared a transcript containing certain papers, and the reporter prepared a transcript of the proceedings upon the trial. The clerk's transcript was certified by the clerk, and the reporter's transcript was certified by both the reporter and the trial judge, and the same were thereupon filed in this court. Petitioner, as appellant, seasonably filed her opening brief upon the appeal, and the respondent therein filed her reply brief, wherein for the first time it was contended that certain of the papers included in the clerk's transcript were improperly placed therein, and were not, therefore, properly authenticated. Upon such objection being made, the appellant (petitioner) moved this court for an order allowing the withdrawal of the transcript to permit of its amendment so as to cause the matters erroneously set forth in the clerk's transcript to be inserted in the reporter's transcript and for a proper certification of the same as amended. The motion was granted, and it was ordered that the transcript might be withdrawn from the files of this court and returned to the clerk of the lower court for correction and proper certification. In accordance therewith, the transcript was withdrawn, and petitioner moved the respondent judge for an order directing the transfer of the papers erroneously included in the clerk's transcript to the reporter's transcript, and further moved said judge to certify to the latter transcript as amended. The respondent, upon the appeal, objected to the granting of said motion upon the ground that the original request for a transcript had not complied with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that it was not sufficiently specific in its enumeration of the documents to be included therein. After hearing upon the motion, the trial court refused to cause the transfer of said papers to the proper transcript, or to further certify to the same. This proceeding in mandamus was thereupon instituted to compel such action upon the part of the lower court.

In support of the order refusing to cause the amendment and certification, as amended, of the reporter's transcript and in opposition to the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate herein, the respondent judge urges that the time within which the trial court could have granted relief had expired; it being contended that a trial court is without power to cause the amendment of a record subsequent to the expiration of the six months' period prescribed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] We have recently decided in the case of McMahon v. Hamilton, 260 P. 793, that an appellate court, having jurisdiction of a record regularly on file, may properly authorize the temporary withdrawal thereof at any time during the pendency of the appeal so that the same might be corrected and amended in conformity to the direction of the appellate court. It is therein pointed out that:

"In such a case we are not confronted with a want of power or jurisdiction in the trial court, assuming the six months' period to have expired, but rather with the inherent power of an appellate court to cause the amendment of a record before it so that the same might speak the truth. The trial court in such a case receives its power to act in the premises from the order of the appellate court."

Further, the opinion indicates that:

"It has repeatedly been held by this court that technical objections are not favored and that a record may and will, when necessary, be corrected unless a right of the adverse party is injuriously affected thereby. * * * Moreover, this court looks with favor upon an amendment the effect of which 'is simply to enable this court to review the decision of the lower court, in view of all the facts which that court had before it when it made such decision.' * * *"

The holding in the case referred to, in our opinion, offers the solution to the question presented in this proceeding, for this court, under the doctrine therein announced, could with propriety authorize and direct the withdrawal and amendment of the transcript here concerned. In view of this court's order, the trial judge, respondent here, should have granted the petitioner's motion for correction and certification of said transcript, and his refusal to do so was improper. To hold otherwise would be to nullify this inherent power of an appellate court to direct the amendment of a record at any time pending the determination of an appeal prosecuted in good faith.

[3-5] Respondent, in support of his refusal to cause the amendment and certification of the transcript, also urges that petitioner's request therefor was insufficient, and that such defect is jurisdictional to the appeal. We cannot accede to this position. Petitioner's application to the clerk of the lower court for a transcript comprehensively requested that all of the proceedings had before the trial court be included therein. Any defects in this request for transcript cannot be said to be jurisdictional to the appeal. Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 287, 128 P. 1023, 1026. In denying a hearing in that case this court declared that the purpose of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c—

"is to provide a method of preparing the record or transcript to be filed in the proper appellate court in support of the appeal. None of the proceedings there prescribed are jurisdictional to the appeal.

"The appeal may be taken either in the manner provided by sections 940 and 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or in that provided by sections 941a, 941b and 941c of the Code of Civil Procedure. When properly taken by either method, the appellate court to which it is taken has jurisdiction of the appeal, even if no transcript on appeal is ever filed to support it. It may dismiss such appeal for delay in filing the transcript. But such dismissal will be a dismissal for want of diligence in prosecuting it, and not a dismissal for lack of jurisdiction of the appeal."

This court, having acquired jurisdiction of the appeal in the case of Tasker v. Cochrane, could at any time pending determination thereof properly direct the withdrawal and amendment of the transcript on file therein so that the same might present for review "the decision of the lower court in view of all the facts which that court had before it when it made such decision." This conclusion, of necessity, disposes of the respondent's further contention that petitioner herein "has been guilty of laches." Nor can we accept the contention of respondent to the effect "that the discretionary power of the trial court in the matter of the certification of transcripts cannot be controlled by mandamus." Under the circumstances here presented the respondent was without discretion in the premises, for it was incumbent upon him to give effect to the order of this court by causing the amendment and certification of the transcript as requested. Moreover, mandamus is available to require the judge below to certify to the correctness of the reporter's transcript. Brown v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 141, 165 P. 429; Going v. Guy, 166 Cal. 279, 135 P. 1128; 2 Cal. Jur. 634, § 352.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

MARTELLO v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 4, 1927.

1. Constitutional law ☞24—Judge pro tempore plan held amended out of Constitution by omitting it therefrom (Const. art. 6, § 8).

The judge pro tempore plan of Const. art. 6, § 8, and legislation in pursuance thereof (St. 1925, p. 1369), providing that parties to a controversy might select an attorney to hear and act upon their controversy, held amended out of the Constitution by ex industria omitting it therefrom upon amendment of such section.

2. Constitutional law ☞24—Amending judge pro tempore plan out of Constitution repealed, eo instante, statute based thereon, although repeal was not express (Const. art. 1, § 22; art. 6, § 8; art. 22, § 1; Code Civ. Proc. § 72).

Amending out of Const. art. 6, § 8, the judge pro tempore plan, providing for the selection by parties to a controversy of an attorney to hear their controversy as a judge, had the effect of repealing, eo instante, Code Civ. Proc. § 72, based upon the former constitutional provision and relative to the same subject, although the repeal was not express, in view of Const. art. 22, § 1, and article 1, § 22.

3. Constitutional law ☞140(1)—Rights of judge pro tempore and litigants held not contractual so as to make abolition of office an unconstitutional impairment of obligation (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10; Const. Cal. art. 6, § 8).

Rights of a judge pro tempore and the parties to a controversy, who had, in pursuance of Const. Cal. art. 6, § 8, appointed an attorney to act as judge in their controversy, held not contract rights within the meaning of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, so as to make the abolition of the office of judge pro tempore by a state constitutional amendment an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation of a contract as to such judge and parties litigant.

4. Judges ☞25(2)—Judge pro tempore lost jurisdiction of cause submitted under parties' agreement when provision establishing office was repealed, and hence could not lawfully proceed to determine controversy (Const. art. 6, § 8; Code Civ. Proc. § 72).

Where the parties to a controversy had, in pursuance of Code Civ. Proc. § 72, enacted as permitted by Const. art. 6, § 8, selected an attorney to act as judge in their controversy, but such judge had not completed his work by serving defendant in such cause with the proposed findings of fact, conclusions of law, and proposed decision of the court prior to the amendment of Const. art. 6, § 8, abolishing judge pro tempore office (St. 1925, p. 1369), held that the instant the provision establishing the office was repealed such judge lost his jurisdiction of the cause, and hence could not lawfully proceed to determine the controversy.

5. Officers ☞4—Sovereign power creating public office may abolish it, although incumbent's tenure is thereby affected, in absence of constitutional restriction.

The sovereign power, which has created a public office, may abolish it, even though the tenure of an incumbent is affected thereby, unless restricted by the Constitution.

Application by Dave Martello for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and others. Writ granted.

Superseding opinion of the District Court of Appeal, 254 P. 658.

Faucett & Ring, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and John De Ferie, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

SEAWELL, J. This proceeding comes to us for decision by reason of an order made by this court granting petitioner a hearing herein after decision rendered by the District Court of Appeal denying petitioner's application for a peremptory writ of prohibition.

Prior to the adoption by the people, at the general election held in this state on November 2, 1926, of the constitutional amendments proposed by the state Legislature at its forty-sixth session relative to the judicial department (chapter 48, Stats. 1925, p. 1369), amending the state Constitution by adding to article 6 a new section, to be numbered 1a (creating a judicial council), and sections 6, 7, and 8, of said article, there was pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles an action entitled John A. Ranney, Plaintiff, v. Dave Martello et al., Defendants. By the stipulation of the parties to the action, R. E. Abbott, Esq., a duly and regularly licensed attorney at law, fully qualified to engage in the practice of the law in all the courts of this state, was named and agreed upon by said parties as a judge pro tempore to try said cause, and his action therein was to have the same effect as if he was a judge of said superior court. The stipulation was approved by an order duly made and entered by a judge of said superior court. The trial progressed to a stage whereupon, on October 19, 1926, said judge pro tempore directed respondent clerk of said superior court to make a minute entry in the records of said cause to the effect that judgment go for plaintiff in the sum of $5,940 and for costs of suit. Nothing further was done than the entry of said minute order until December 4, 1926, on which day the attorneys for petitioner were served with proposed findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the proposed decision of respondent court. It will be noted that the act creating a judicial council and adopting the constitutional amendments, whereby it is claimed all acts providing for the trial of causes by judges pro tempore were repealed, was ratified prior to the day upon which service of the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and proposed judgment was made upon petitioner's attorneys. If, therefore, an irreconcilable conflict arose as between said act and said amendments and any unrepealed statute which would have been sufficient authority for a continuance of the proceedings to a finality by the judge pro tempore but for said conflict, the constitutional amendments must prevail, provided they do not impair the obligation of a contract or deprive either of the parties litigant in the court below of property without due process of law or otherwise infringe upon some right protected by the federal Constitution.

To prevent said judge pro tempore from entering judgment as above indicated, petitioner prayed for the issuance of a peremptory writ of prohibition directed against said court and the judge and clerk of said court, claiming that said amendments, when ratified, eo instante abolished the office of judge pro tempore and withdrew from the judge the judicial authority which the law invested him with prior to the adoption of said amendments to the Constitution.

[1] The adoption of the judicial council plan introduced into our judicial system a new method of disposing of the judicial business of the state, which, in the language of the act creating it, was adopted "in the interest of uniformity and the expedition of business." (Italics ours.) One of its main purposes was to create an administrative judicial council or committee, of which the Chief Justice of the state Supreme Court is at the head, vested with authority to marshal the judicial forces of the state into a unified form in the interest of "improving the administration of justice." The old practice of a judge of the superior court of one county holding court for a judge of the superior court of another county at the request of the former was in practice a matter largely resting in judicial comity, and therefore was lacking in administrative cohesiveness which is essential for the accomplishment of a higher degree of efficiency. As a second and third part of the former plan, section 8, art. 6, before the amendments of 1926, provided that upon the request of the Governor of the state it became the duty of a judge of the superior court of any county to hold a superior court session for and in place of the duly elected judge in and for any other county of the state, and, finally, it was made permissible for parties litigant or their attorneys to stipulate that a cause in the superior court be tried by a judge pro tempore, who must be a member of the bar, approved by the court. It is very clear that the former plan of judicial assignments, if it can be thus characterized, has been superseded by the judicial council plan. In fact, not a vestige of the old plan is to be found in the new. The former method of selecting judges pro tempore upon stipulation of parties litigant was patently repugnant both to the letter and spirit of the comprehensive plan devised by the Judicial Council Act for the assignment or rotation of judges to the several courts of the state as the judicial business of the state may require. This being so, one or the other must fall, and, under the well-recognized rule of construction, the latest expression of the people upon the subject must prevail. Clearly the provisions of section 72, Code of Civil Procedure, which are but a verbatim repetition of the permissive language of the Constitution as to the selection of judges pro tempore, cannot be harmonized with the evident purpose of the people as shown by the adoption of the more recent elaborate system for the expedition of judicial business. If the intent of the people to abolish the judge pro tempore plan could be said to be in doubt, by reason of a failure to abolish said plan by express language, such doubt is dispelled by the fact that section 8, art. 6, state Constitution, before amendment, contained the judge pro tempore provision, but no reference whatever was made to the trial of causes by a judge pro tempore in said amended section 8, art. 6. In short, the judge pro tempore plan was amended out of the Constitution by ex industria omitting it therefrom. The express provisions for trial of causes by a judge pro tempore in section 8 before amendment and its absence in the amendment, taken in connection with the object to be effectuated, leave no room to doubt that it was excluded ex industria by the framers of the constitutional amendments. People v. Ah Chung, 5 Cal. 103.

[2] It is urged as an argument entitled to grave consideration that, although the amendments to the Constitution omitted to re-establish judges pro tempore as a part of our judicial system, nevertheless the Legislature of 1927 did not repeal section 72, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for the selection of judges pro tempore precisely as the Constitution did before its amendment, and hence we have a Code section authorizing the continuance of trial of causes by judges pro tempore. We think there is no argumentative force in this circumstance, in view of the rule of construction in case of conflicts that may arise as between statutory and constitutional authority. The supremacy of the Constitution over legislative enactments is expressed in general terms in article 22, § 1 thereof, wherein it is provided that "all laws which are inconsistent with this Constitution shall cease upon the adoption thereof," etc., and of course all amendments made to the Constitution become a part of that instrument. If respondents' construction be the correct one, article 1, § 22, state Constitution, which provides that the provisions of the Constitution are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise, must be held, contrary to the rule of construction announced in the well-considered case of People v. Wells, 2 Cal. 198, and many others that have followed it, to have no application to the creation of our judicial department of government.

As to the application of the rules of express mention and implied exclusion, Mr. Sutherland (Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction [2d Ed.] vol. 1, § 249) said:

"In the grants [of powers] and in the regulation of the mode of exercise, there is an implied negative; an implication that no other than the expressly granted power passes by the grant; that it is to be exercised only in the prescribed mode. Affirmative words may and often do imply a negative, not only of what is not affirmed, but of what has been previously affirmed, and as strongly as if expressed. An affirmative enactment of a new rule implies a negative of whatever is not included, or is different; and, if by the language used, a thing is limited to be done in a particular form or manner, it includes a negative that it shall not be done otherwise. An intention will not be ascribed to the lawmaking power to establish conflicting and hostile systems upon the same subject, or to leave in force provisions of law by which the later will of the Legislature may be thwarted and overthrown."

The circumstance that section 72, Code of Civil Procedure, remains unrepealed by express mention is without persuasive force since the language of the Constitution reforming our judicial system is clear and positive and its object manifest. Three, and only three, distinct methods are provided for the investment of judicial authority, to wit, by election, appointment, and assignment. Authorization by stipulation is not included in any one of the methods or systems above provided. "In construing a Constitution, resort may be had to the well-recognized rule of interpretation contained in the maxim, Expressio unius, exclusio alterius est; therefore the expression of one thing in a Constitution may necessarily involve the exclusion of other things not expressed." 5 Cal. Jur. 587. The fact that section 72, Code of Civil Procedure, was not expressly repealed by the Legislature is more consistent with the theory that it escaped the attention of the Legislature rather than that it was supposed to retain legislative life.

[3] We now come to the argument in support of the claim that, if the Judicial Council Act and said amendments of 1926 operated to terminate the powers of the judge pro tempore who had been selected and who had entered upon the discharge of his duties prior to the adoption of said act and amendments, they are unconstitutional to the extent that they affect the parties litigant and the judge pro tempore as being violative of the Constitution of the United States (art. 1, § 10) which forbids the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts. This claim is based upon the proposition that the stipulation, which was but one of the necessary preliminary acts in the process of conferring jurisdiction upon or investing the person selected to try the cause with judicial authority, is a contract in the sense and meaning of contracts which vest property rights in the citizen and which are protected by constitutional guaranties. There is no ground to support the claim that any property right whatsoever inhered or vested in the judge or parties litigant by reason of their mutual participation in the formation of a tribunal which, but for the repealing constitutional provisions, would have had powers equal to those of a regularly constituted court in deciding the case proposed to be submitted to it. As was said in Deupree v. Payne, 197 Cal. 529, 241 P. 869, and supported by an ample array of cases decided by this court:

"It is well settled that there is no vested right in an incumbent to an office, nor any property right therein paramount to the public interest."

It must follow that the judge of a court specially created for public convenience holds his office by no firmer tenure nor has he any greater rights than one who is inducted into office by the usual and ordinary methods provided by law. Graziani v. Denny, 174 Cal. 176, 162 P. 397. For reasons equally cogent, resting upon considerations of public welfare, a party litigant can have no vested right to have his case tried and determined by any particular judge or court, howsoever constituted. The creation of courts of law is an affair of government, and may not be subordinated to private convenience or interest.

[4] In view of what has been said, section 72, Code of Civil Procedure, was repealed eo instante by necessary implication by the adoption of the Judicial Council Act and said constitutional amendments, and, inasmuch as no final judgment had then been rendered or entered by the judge pro tempore in the cause which he held under submission, he was divested of jurisdiction to thereafter render a judgment. The rule is thus stated in Ball v. Tolman, 135 Cal. 375, 67 P. 339, 87 Am. St. Rep. 110:

"It does not follow that jurisdiction once acquired always remains. A court or judge may have authority at one time to proceed, and his authority may afterwards be divested by statute. 'In all cases where a court is rendered incompetent to proceed, its proceedings during such incompetency are as invalid as though it had never possessed jurisdiction' (Freeman on Void Sales, § 7; Freeman on Judgments, § 121); and this incompetency may arise from being deprived of jurisdiction of the subject-matter as well as of the person. * * * As all the proceedings subsequent to the repeal of the statute were without authority, execution was without authority, and all proceedings under it were void. Freeman on Judgments, § 117. * * *

Connolly v. Ashworth, 98 Cal. 205, 33 P. 60, announces a rule of law that has application to the instant case. In that case the trial court gave its written, signed decision, which was not filed with the clerk of the court until after the term of office of the judge had expired. In disposing of the question as to the validity of the judgment this court said:

"* * * It is clear that the trial of a cause by the court is not concluded until the decision is filed with the clerk; and, when the term of office of the judge who tried the case expires before such decision is filed, the fact that it was signed by him and ordered by his successor in office to be filed with the clerk, and was so filed, is not sufficient to sustain the judgment entered thereon. Hastings v. Hastings, 31 Cal. 95; Van Court v. Winterson, 61 Cal. 615; 2 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, §§ 237, 246; Warring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 56 [28 P. 115]; Comstock Q. M. Co. v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 625; Polhemus v. Carpenter, 42 Cal. 384; Anglo-Cal. Bank v. Mahoney [Mining Co.], 2 Pac. C. L. J. 128, U. S. Cir. Ct.; Mace v. O'Reilly, 70 Cal. 231 [11 P. 721]."

[5] It is well settled that the sovereign power which creates a public office may abolish it or change the tenure thereof, even though the tenure of an incumbent is affected thereby, unless restricted by the Constitution. Such offices are not held by contract or grant. Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 P. 813. If the office be a constitutional office, as in the instant case, the constitutional power which created it may likewise, in the exercise of its sovereign power, abolish it. Every person who accepts an office does so with that implied understanding.

The office of judge pro tempore was made available to litigants by conforming to a prescribed procedure as a part of the judicial system of the state. The law was remedial in its operation. Persons who desired to avail themselves of the method of trying cases under the form provided by law were permitted to do so with the understanding that the sovereign power reserved to itself the right to amend or repeal the law at will in the interest of the general welfare.

The hardship and inconvenience which respondent may suffer by the unfortunate intervening circumstance of the instant case, while regrettable, are but incidents to the administration of the law under our system of government.

The office of judge pro tempore in the instant case having been abolished before the completion of the trial of the cause which he had been authorized to try and determine, he is therefore divested of jurisdiction to further proceed in the trial and determination thereof.

The peremptory writ will therefore issue.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 5, 1928.

1. Poisons ⇨9—Evidence held to sustain conviction of fruit vendor under Poison Act, § 8.

In prosecution for violation of state Poison Act (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5994, § 8), regulating sale of poisons, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of fruit vendor in lining of whose coat package was found containing can of morphine.

2. Poisons ⇨9—Evidence as to work done by fruit vendor, in whose coat morphine was found, held admissible (Poison Act, § 8).

In prosecution under state Poison Act (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5994, § 8), regulating sale of poisons, evidence that fruit vendor, in lining of whose coat morphine was found, did manual labor in his store, made deliveries, and carried keys to particular house held admissible.

3. Witnesses ⇨277(4)—Cross-examination of defendant, who testified that he wore same coat on arrest as at trial, as to residence, doing of manual labor, and cleaning of clothes, held not error (Poison Act).

In prosecution under state Poison Act (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5994) of fruit vendor, in lining of whose coat morphine can was found, cross-examination of defendant as to where he resided, whether he had his clothes cleaned, and did manual labor in his store, and as to number of deliveries made, and his presence at place of arrest, held not error, where defendant testified as to where he was going at time of arrest, and that coat which he wore at time of trial was same coat which he wore on night of arrest and at all times thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James L. Allen, Judge.

Gee Don Yow was convicted of violation of the Poison Act, § 8, amended by St. 1919, p. 1276, and he appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Hanley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant, charging him with having violated section 8 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the sale of poisons in the state of California and providing a penalty for the violation thereof." Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5994. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and in the trial court a trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict against the defendant, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and the defendant appealed from the judgment and order.

In the presentation of its case the prosecution called as witnesses a detective sergeant and two patrolmen, and by their testimony it produced evidence to the effect that in San Francisco, at about 11:30 p. m. on the night of the 28th day of January, 1927, on Jackson street, a short distance below the northeast corner of Trenton and Jackson, the police officers arrested the defendant; that at that place and immediately after the arrest they searched the defendant, and that in searching him they found between the outside and the lining of his coat, at a point near the middle of the back, a new original package containing a can of morphine. The officers retained the can and placed the defendant under arrest. The officers testified that just before the arrest they saw the defendant come out of Trenton and turn down Jackson on the north side.

After the prosecution had rested, the defendant took the stand in his own behalf. He testified that he was one of the partners operating a fruit store at 622 Jackson, that would be approximately three blocks lower down Jackson on the same side of the street on which he was arrested. He claimed that just before the arrest he had taken a package of fruit to deliver to a customer at 1013 Powell street; that on his return he was accompanied by two of his cousins; that as they proceeded along Powell to Pacific the defendant found the can of morphine which he thought to be pepper or mustard, and that he picked it up and put it in the pocket of his sweater and continued on his way; that on Pacific street the friends separated, and the defendant went to call on his friend Wong, who resided on the south line of Pacific, between Powell and Trenton; that he continued his trip by passing through Trenton, and turned down Jackson, when he was arrested.

At the time of his arrest he had in his pocket a bunch of keys. One of the keys fitted the lock at 134A Trenton. The defendant at the time of the trial testified that he never opened up the lining of his coat and afterwards sewed it up, and took off his coat and offered it in evidence and exhibited to the jury. He further testified that it was made to order for him, and exhibited the tag, "Brilliant Tailor Company, San Francisco, January 14, 1927." He did not, on his direct examination, testify as to where he resided. On cross-examination, over the objection and exception of the defendant, he was asked and required to answer questions: (1) Where did he reside? (2) Did he have keys to a house at 134A Trenton street in San Francisco? (3) Did he ever send a suit of clothes to the cleaners? (4) Did he do manual labor in his store? (5) How many deliveries per day did he make? (6) Why was he on Jackson street on the night of his arrest? (7) What personal property of his, if any, was kept at 134A Trenton street?

[1] The defendant earnestly contends that the prosecution was bound to plead and prove a "conscious possession." He contends that the evidence does not show such a possession. If the evidence given by the police officers was believed by the jury, it is perfectly clear that the jury was entitled to infer that the defendant's possession was quite conscious indeed.

[2] The record does not directly disclose that after his arrest the defendant was admitted to bail. However, it does disclose the fact that on the 10th day of May, several months after his arrest, and two months before the date of the trial, the defendant, two policemen, and Jung Shee were present. The jury might properly infer from that fact that the defendant was out on bail and continuing to transact the business of a fruit vendor. There was no reason to believe that the defendant necessarily wore all his wardrobe at the time of his arrest. It is but natural to believe that one's surplus clothes are at the place where he resides. If one does manual labor about a fruit store, that fact is certainly pertinent, as showing whether clothes have been soiled or otherwise. The number of deliveries which a vendor makes in person is pertinent to the same issue. If one has a key to a certain residence it is some evidence as to where his domicile is.

[3] Finally, all of these matters are pertinent as cross-examination, where a defendant, as did this defendant, testifies that he wore the same coat, which he had on his back at the time of the trial, on the night of his arrest and at all times thereafter until the date of the trial. In other words, all of the questions propounded to him and to which objection is now made were pertinent on the issue tendered by the defendant that he did not open the lining of his coat, and did not carry the can of morphine in the manner testified to by the police officers.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

WRIGHT v. FOREMAN et al. (Civ. 5975.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 5, 1927.

1. Evidence ⚡588—Jury determines truth of conflicting testimony.

Jury may accept evidence as true, though there is other testimony in case in absolute conflict therewith.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡706(5)—Jury's finding of automobile driver's negligence and pedestrian's freedom from contributory negligence held supported by evidence.

In action for injuries to pedestrian crossing at street intersection, evidence held to support jury's findings that automobile driver, driving in center or wrong side of street, was negligent, and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡705(10)—Pedestrian, looking until reaching center of street, was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to continue to look for vehicles.

Where pedestrian, immediately before starting to cross congested city street, looked to left to observe approaching vehicles, and continued to do so until she reached center of street, failure to continue to look to left thereafter was not contributory negligence, precluding recovery for injuries sustained when automobile driven from left proceeded along center or wrong side of street.

4. Municipal corporations ⚡705(10)—Pedestrian, crossing at intersection, is not required to anticipate automobile driver will overlap center and proceed on wrong side of street.

Under ordinary circumstances, pedestrian, crossing street at intersection, is not required to anticipate that driver of automobile over congested city street will overlap center of street and proceed upon wrong side of street, but has right to assume that driver under such circumstances will conform to customary traffic laws.

5. Trial ⚡191(7)—Explanation referring to instruction that plaintiff was not contributorily negligent in failing to look to left after reaching center of street held not erroneous as assuming disputed fact.

In automobile accident case, explanation that instruction on pedestrian's duty to protect herself from injury by approaching vehicles should be construed with previous instruction "that it was not contributory negligence not to look to her left after she reached the center of the street," held not erroneous as declaration that plaintiff had in fact reached center of street.

6. Appeal and error ⚡928(1)—Judgment will not be reversed on strained construction of court's charge.

Strained construction of court's charge will not be indulged to reverse judgment.

7. Appeal and error ⚡930(2)—Jury is presumed to have understood and followed instructions as whole.

It must be assumed that the jury understood and followed the instructions as a whole.

8. Trial ⚡285—Explanation reconciling preceding instructions held not to constitute part of court's charge.

In automobile accident case, explanation that instruction with regard to pedestrian's duties should be taken in connection with previous instruction, relieving pedestrian from contributory negligence in failing to look to left after reaching center of street, held not in itself to constitute part of court's charge.

9. Trial ⚡243—Explanation that instruction on pedestrian's duty to keep lookout should be construed with instruction relieving her from duty to look to left after crossing middle of street held not inconsistent with another instruction.

In automobile accident case, court's explanation that instruction relative to pedestrian's duty to protect herself from injuries by approaching vehicles while she was in position which might be perilous should be considered in connection with previous instruction, relieving pedestrian from looking to left after crossing middle of street, if explanation is considered as part of court's charge, held, nevertheless, not inconsistent with preceding instruction.

10. Appeal and error ⚡1033(5)—Appellant may not complain of conflict created by erroneous instruction which is favorable to him.

Where conflict in instructions is created by erroneous instruction favorable to appellant, appellant is not in position to complain of conflict.

11. Municipal corporations ⚡706(8)—Instruction that pedestrian, crossing intersection, must look for approaching vehicles while in position which might be perilous, held proper.

In action for injuries to pedestrian struck by automobile while crossing street intersection, instruction that duty to look for approaching vehicles was incumbent on plaintiff while she was in position which might be one of peril held merely to require that pedestrian look in direction whence peril may reasonably be expected, and therefore instruction was not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by Florence Wright against L. O. Foreman and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Black, Hammack & Black, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a verdict awarding respondent $1,500 damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of being struck by an automobile while walking across Eighth street in Los Angeles. Appellants claim that prejudicial error occurred in giving a certain instruction.

Respondent was employed as a saleswoman by the New York Cloak and Suit House at Seventh street and Grand avenue in Los Angeles. At 5:15 o'clock p. m., August 9, 1922, she left her place of business, walking southerly along the easterly side of Grand avenue until she reached the nearest curb at Eighth street, which crossed Grand avenue at right angles. Here she stopped, looking easterly, to her left, for approaching machines. Double car tracks extend along Eighth street at this point. This street often contained heavy traffic with two or three machines sometimes traveling abreast. At this time, however, the nearest machines which were approaching on her side were half a block distant. She thereupon started directly across Eighth street in the usual pathway reserved for pedestrians. Upon reaching the center of the street she stopped, and looked to her right for approaching machines on the southerly side of the street. Just as she turned to look to her right, appellants' car, which was attempting to pass two other machines traveling westerly in the same direction, struck and knocked her down. She became senseless from the impact, and was carried to the sidewalk. Upon reviving she was taken in appellants' car to the hospital for treatment. Respondent was a heavy woman, weighing 180 pounds, and was greatly injured by her fall. While the car did not pass over her, she received numerous bruises and contusions about the hips, limbs, and body; her leg and back were injured. As a result, she was confined to her bed for several weeks in great pain, and was prevented from attending to her employment for a period of three months. She then returned to her work, and, after a brief service, was again compelled to lose several weeks on account of her injuries.

There was a sharp conflict as to whether appellants' machine struck the respondent at all. Two witnesses testified that it did not strike her, but that she stumbled on the car track and fell. However, respondent and one disinterested witness testified positively that the car did strike and knock her down.

It becomes important, in view of the giving of the challenged instruction, to consider whether the record furnishes evidence as to the exact position in the street which was occupied by the respondent at the time she was struck.

The respondent testified in part:

"I was walking on the east side of Grand avenue. When I got to the intersection, I looked to the east, which was my left. I didn't see any machine so close but that I could go over in safety. But, when I got to the center of the street, I looked to my right. * * * When I got to the center of the street, I was struck on the left side and knocked down. * * * When I was struck, I was in the center between the two car tracks. * * * I don't remember any of the cars. * * * There were cars coming from the east. * * * When I regained consciousness, there was a car partly across the street, on the center between the tracks.

There was an automobile that was across the tracks. * * * I don't say it was clear across on this side; it was half way across the street. I crossed right from the sidewalk, and it was half way across the street when it stopped. I know that the machine did not pass over me. I do not know how it got to that point. It was right in the center when I was struck. I was going south. * * * I know that the ordinary condition of that traffic is always two, and sometimes three, machines abreast. On this particular evening there were machines in sight, but not right close; they were a safe distance away. I couldn't say how far they were away; they were not quite half a block. * * * I stepped off the curbstone and walked right straight across. I saw these machines coming up there. I looked when I got to the center of the track; I looked to my right. I couldn't say how far these machines coming from the west were from me. I was watching them. I saw they were half a block away. * * * I saw two of them abreast, running side by side. * * * When I fell in the street, I was at the center between the car tracks. At the time I was struck, I was in motion. Just as I turned, I was struck. * * * Well, it (the machine) was across the crossing. * * * I was right opposite the sidewalk. * * * The machine was not sitting straight between the car tracks, either; it was sitting cross-ways—not exactly cross-ways, across the track—the front of it was across the tracks. Q. Was any portion of the automobile across this southerly car track? A. It was, at the center; and when I came to it was here (indicating)."

Myron Johnson testified:

"I was standing about 20 feet—when I saw these two cars coming abreast, and this third car whipped around endeavoring to pass the two cars, * * * and it hit her and knocked her down. * * * These two cars I speak of were traveling west on Eighth street. At the time I first saw Foreman's car strike Mrs. Wright, it was right here (indicating); the left wheel being in the center of the south car track. I mean the left front wheel was in the center of the south car track, passing over half of the intersection of the street. It stopped about five feet after they hit her. The car stayed here until they placed Mrs. Wright in the car to get her to a doctor. * * * The car hit her on the left side. She spun around and fell to the pavement. She did not stumble in any way. I did have a conversation with Mrs. Foreman; she said, 'This is a bad accident,' I said, 'Yes; if you had not tried to whip around on the south side of the track it would not have happened; you should not have been in such a hurry.' * * * I saw those two cars abreast. When she was struck, they were about eight or ten feet away from her. * * * The cars were traveling two abreast; the third car whipped around out to pass them."

[1, 2] The jury was entitled to accept this evidence as true, although there was testimony in absolute conflict therewith. This evidence therefore furnishes substantial proof to the effect that, after due precaution on the part of respondent, she crossed to the center of the street where she looked to her right for approaching cars on the opposite side over which she was about to pass; and that, while appellants were endeavoring to pass upon the left of two other machines which were traveling abreast in the same direction, the left front wheel of their automobile crossed the center line of the street upon the wrong side, and was traveling about the center of the south car track, when respondent was struck and injured. In other words, there is substantial evidence that a portion of appellants' car was on the wrong side of the street at the time of the accident. Appellants denied negligence on their part, and relied upon alleged contributory negligence as a defense. Both of these issues were determined adversely to them by the jury. The evidence is ample to support these findings of the jury on both issues.

Among other instructions the court gave the following, which for the purpose of reference will be designated as (a), (b), and (c), the last of which is challenged by the appellants as erroneous:

(a) "You are further instructed that, if you should find from the evidence that the plaintiff, immediately before she started to cross the street, looked to her left to observe whether there were approaching vehicles, and continued looking to her left until she reached the center of the street, and if you further find that she had reached a place on the street where, if the defendant operated his machine in accordance with the provisions of the law, she would have been out of the danger zone, then the failure of plaintiff to continue to look to the left would not preclude a recovery, because of her right to rely upon the use of the street by the defendant Naron in a lawful manner, and of her right to expect the automobile to be at a place where under the law it had a right to be."

(b) "You are instructed that the duty of a pedestrian to look both ways upon a street does not necessarily cease when he or she steps from the curb to the street, but such duty was incumbent upon her in this case at all times while she was in a position which might be one of peril from vehicles approaching from either side, and this duty continued upon her until she was completely across the street. Therefore you are instructed that, if the plaintiff in this case entered upon the public street in question, and walked across said street from north to south thereof, it was her duty, while thus walking, to protect herself by maintaining a lookout to her right and to her left, to ascertain whether or not vehicles were approaching from either direction."

"This was a continual duty on her part to protect herself from injury by approaching vehicles, and, if she failed to exercise such care as above outlined, such failure on her part would be negligence, and, if this negligence contributed directly or proximately to the happening of the accident in any degree however slight, the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict will be for the defendants, notwithstanding the fact you may believe the defendants themselves were guilty of negligence."

ligence on her part, that the defendant would not be approaching on the wrong side of the street; that is, that it was not contributory negligence on her part not to look to her left after she reached the center of the street. That instruction, I say, is to be taken in connection with this one."

Appellants contend that this final paragraph, designated (c), is erroneous, because (1) it is contradictory of the preceding instruction, and (2) that it invades the province of the jury by assuming that the respondent was struck by the automobile of the defendants while it was traveling on the wrong side of the street.

[5-8] The appellants do not complain of any of the instructions given, except the explanatory paragraph above designated as (c). This does not purport to charge the jury as to the law, but the sole purpose of this explanation was to identify the former instruction (a), which, the court declared, must be read in connection with the instruction (b). In order to identify this instruction, the court said:

"This instruction is to be taken in connection with the one heretofore given, that the plaintiff, after she reached the center of the street, might assume," etc.

This is not a declaration that the plaintiff had in fact reached the center of the street. It may be reasonably construed to charge the jury that, if they should find that she had reached the center of the street, then plaintiff might assume "that the defendant would not be approaching on the wrong side of the street." A strained construction of the court's charge will not be indulged to upset a judgment. It must be assumed that the jury understood and followed the instructions as a whole. They had been previously directed that "the court cannot determine the facts, nor aid you in arriving at them. * * * You are the sole judges of the effect and value of the evidence." They were also specifically instructed as to the application of the traffic laws and the burden of proof. This explanatory paragraph should not be construed as a part of the court's charge. Nor can it reasonably be said to infer that the respondent had in fact passed the center of the street at the time she was struck by appellants' automobile.

[9-11] Even though paragraph (c) be considered a part of the court's instructions, it is not inconsistent with the preceding instruction. In paragraph (b) the court had charged the jury that in crossing a street it was "the duty of a pedestrian to look both ways. * * * This (duty) does not necessarily cease when she steps from the curb to the street, but such duty was incumbent upon her in this case at all times while she was in a position which might be one of peril from vehicles approaching from either side, and this duty continued upon her until she was completely across the street. * * *" This was a mere declaration of the principle that in crossing a street a pedestrian must use due vigilance, even to the extent of looking both ways while she is in a position of peril. If this instruction is construed to mean that, regardless of the state of traffic, or the circumstances and conditions under which a pedestrian attempts to cross a street, she will be guilty of contributory negligence unless she constantly looks both right and left to anticipate the approach of vehicles traveling on the wrong side of the street, then it is not the law. Appellants may not complain of a conflict created by an erroneous instruction which is favorable to them. Strictly construed, however, this instruction means that a pedestrian must be vigilant and watchful, continuing to look in the direction whence peril may reasonably be expected. This is precisely what is said in the case of Moss v. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 P. 631, upon which appellants rely. It was there said:

"It was a duty devolving upon plaintiff, as the act of an ordinarily prudent man, immediately before placing himself in a position of danger, to look in the direction from which danger was to be anticipated. This was a continuing duty, and was not met by looking once and then looking away again."

Nor is there anything in conflict with this declaration in the opinion of the court in the case of Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174, which is cited by appellants. It is there said:

"When traffic upon the intersection above described was heavy (plaintiff), walked out upon the crossing looking straight ahead, without glancing to either side, and was absolutely oblivious to the proximity of the automobile right up to the moment of the impact, at which time he had traversed about three-quarters of the distance across the street. Plaintiff was bound to do more than to ascertain whether or not there was any obstruction in his immediate path. He was required to be alert and watchful, and to look up and down the street in order to know whether approaching vehicles were likely to intercept his line of travel."

It does not appear from the facts in the Mayer Case, supra, that the plaintiff was struck by an automobile which was traveling in violation of the traffic laws on the wrong side of the street. Nor is it there asserted that a pedestrian must constantly look up and down a street regardless of conditions or location upon the thoroughfare, nor that he will be guilty of contributory negligence if he fails to anticipate the approach of machines on the wrong side of the street.

In the instant case, it appears that the respondent stopped before she attempted to cross Eighth street looking for approaching machines, when she observed that the nearest ones were half a block distant, she crossed to the center, looking to her left. Upon reaching the center of the street, she looked to her right for vehicles. This appears to have been a reasonable exercise of prudence on her part. Under full and fair instructions the jury so found.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

SYRETT v. STRICKLAND et ux.
(Civ. 5968.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 195(1)—Where lessees, having paid rent to certain date, abandoned lease and premises, lessor had no further claim until that date.

Lessor's rights under lease for total of $4,500 for five years, of which first month and last month were paid in advance, were measured by his contract, and, where lessees, having paid rent in advance up to November 15, 1924, repudiated and abandoned lease and premises, lessor had no further claim against lessees until November 15, 1924, and could not maintain action under complaint filed October 25, 1924, alleging that $2,625 of total rent was yet unpaid.

2. Arrest $\S$ 35—Attachment $\S$ 119—Where complaint for damages for breach of lease was not good, writ of attachment and order for arrest fell with complaint.

Where complaint for damages for breach of lease contract alleging that defendants had abandoned lease and premises and were about to leave state was not good, writ of attachment and order for arrest fell with complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Guy R. Crump, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Syrett against J. C. Strickland and wife for damages for breach of lease contract. From a judgment dismissing plaintiff's action and from an order vacating an order of arrest of defendants and an order dissolving an attachment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred C. Bigby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Getz, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KING, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from:

(1) A judgment sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend and dismissing the action.

(2) An order of the court, made as a special order after final judgment, vacating an order of arrest of the defendant J. C. Strickland.

(3) An order of the court dissolving an attachment.

The amended complaint states: That plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing whereby plaintiff leased to defendants certain premises under which defendants entered into possession. The lease is set out in full. That plaintiff made expensive alterations to the property which were suited to the purposes of the lease, but otherwise valueless. That prior to its termination defendants repudiated and abandoned the lease and premises, declaring they would not be bound by the lease, and that they would not pay the unpaid balance to become due nor keep possession of the premises, but avowed their intention of leaving the state and abandoning the lease and premises. That defendants had disposed of and concealed their property and were about to leave the state with intent to defraud the plaintiff out of his claim against them. That by reason of the breach of said lease plaintiff had been damaged.

The prayer is for damages in the amount yet unpaid on the lease and that defendant J. C. Strickland be adjudged guilty of fraud and held for bail for satisfaction of the judgment.

The lease is for a total of $4,500 for 5 years, of which the first month and the last month were paid in advance. The complaint, filed October 25, 1924, alleges that $2,625 of the total rental was yet unpaid, being payable at $75 per month on the 15th of each month. It is apparent then that 25 months' rental had been paid, including the last month paid in advance, so that the rent was paid up to November 15, 1924.

[1] To this amended complaint the defendants demurred generally, and also on the ground of uncertainty, "in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether or not there is any rent now due and unpaid, and also that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether or not defendants are now in the possession of the premises or in what manner they abandoned the same, or who is now in possession of said premises." The complaint is also charged to be ambiguous and unintelligible for the same reasons.

The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment of dismissal given. The court also rendered its orders vacating the arrest of the defendant J. C. Strickland and discharging certain property which had been attached.

Plaintiff's rights are measured by his contract with defendants. After receiving the last payment of $75 which paid the rent up to November 15, 1924, he had no further claim against them till this date.

In the case of Respini v. Porta, 89 Cal. at page 466, 26 P. 967 (23 Am. St. Rep. 488), the court uses this language:

"We cannot support him (the plaintiff) in his contention that, because the defendant, against his (plaintiff's) wishes and without right, abandoned the property, he is entitled to recover the full amount provided for by the terms of the lease to defendant."

The decision then quotes section 3300, Civil Code, and continues:

"We think plaintiff's rights are measured by the provisions of this section, and not by section 3302 of the Civil Code."

In that case the conditions were quite similar to the case here. When plaintiff demanded payment of rent for an ensuing quarter as provided by the lease, "defendant replied that he had no more money, could not pay the rent, and was going to leave the place and give up everything."

Our Supreme Court says, in Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. at page 513, 27 P. 371 (25 Am. St. Rep. 145):

"The term is an estate in lands. The tenant, subject to the covenants of his lease, is the owner for the term. If he leaves the demised premises vacant, and avows his intention not to be bound by his lease, his title still continues, unless the landlord has accepted the offer of surrender. The landlord has no more right to the possession or to lease than a stranger. * * * The tenant cannot abandon his title; and, notwithstanding he has gone out, unless the surrender is accepted, that continues. It is his right to resume possession at any time during his term."

In the case of Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 123 P. 797, the court defines the rights of a landlord under similar conditions, saying:

"Where a lease is repudiated and the premises abandoned, the landlord may pursue one of two courses: He may rest upon his contract and sue his tenant as each installment of rent, or the whole thereof, becomes due; or he may take possession of the premises and recover damages, which damages will be the difference between what he may be able to rent the premises for and the price agreed to be paid under the lease. Where he sues for damages, he cannot in advance recover the full price to be paid for the unexpired term, but the amount of his recovery is limited as just indicated"—citing cases.

The affidavit for attachment which is before the court illustrates plaintiff's claim more fully. It recites:

"That the defendants herein are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,625 * * * upon a written contract for the direct payment of money, to wit, rentals for leased lands under written lease," etc.

Similarly the affidavit for the arrest of one of the defendants states:

"The said defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,625, * * * an unpaid balance on a written lease for premises of the plaintiff."

[2] Neither statement is true. The superior court correctly sustained the general demurrer and dismissed the action. The writ of attachment and the order for arrest fell with the complaint.

The judgment and accompanying orders are affirmed.

PIGG v. INTERNATIONAL INDEMNITY CO.
(Civ. 5966.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 14, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1928.

1. Insurance ⚡591½—Under statutory provision that injured person's personal representatives might sue Indemnity company after judgment against insured, insolvency of insured held unnecessary, notwithstanding policy read "insolvent" instead of "insured" (St. 1919, p. 776).

Under provision of indemnity insurance policy, required by St. 1919, p. 776, that the personal representatives of a person injured by a motor vehicle might bring action against the indemnity insurer after obtaining judgment against the insured, proof of insolvency of insured held unnecessary, notwithstanding policy read, "in case judgment shall be secured against such insolvent," instead of "against the insured," as statute required, since statutory provision was part of policy, and another policy provision incorporated any statutory provision at variance with any condition of the policy.

2. Insurance ⚡52(3)—Statute, requiring provision in indemnity policy enabling injured person's personal representatives to sue insurer after judgment against insured, held part of policy (St. 1919, p. 776).

St. 1919, p. 776, requiring provision in indemnity insurance policy enabling personal representatives of persons injured by motor vehicles to bring action against insurer after obtaining judgment against insured, held part of indemnity policy, and hence uncertainty in policy provision was resolved in favor of statutory requirements.

3. Executors and administrators ⚡49—Right to sue indemnity insurer after obtaining judgment against insured held property, which passed to injured person's executrix (St. 1919, p. 776).

Right of person injured by motor vehicle to bring action against indemnity insurer under St. 1919, p. 776, after obtaining judgment against the insured, held a property right, which passed to his executrix as an incident to the judgment.

4. Insurance ⚡665(3)—In action by injured person's executrix against indemnity insurer, evidence supported finding insured had not violated policy provisions requiring aid in defending suits (St. 1919, p. 776).

In action under St. 1919, p. 776, by executrix of person injured by motor vehicle against indemnity insurer, evidence held to support trial court's finding that the insured had not violated provision in the policy requiring that the insured should aid in securing information, evidence, and attendance of witnesses and co-operate in defending any claim or suit whenever required by the company.

5. Insurance ⚡530—Under Indemnity policy providing that Insurance company would pay $5,000, costs, and interest, liability held not limited to $5,000.

Under indemnity insurance policy providing that the company's liability should not exceed $5,000 for damages for injuries to any one person, but also providing that company would pay all taxed costs and all interest accruing upon such part of such damages awarded by judgment as should not be in excess of $5,000, company's liability held not limited to $5,000, and judgment not exceeding $5,000, plus costs plus interest, was authorized.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Josephine C. Pigg, executrix of the estate of William R. Pigg, deceased, against International Indemnity Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, and Lasher B. Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. [1, 2] The deceased, William R. Pigg, was injured by a motor vehicle driven by T. Kunitake. The latter was insured against liability by the defendant and appellant. William R. Pigg recovered judgment against Kunitake for his injuries, and, the judgment remaining unpaid after the death of said Pigg, his executrix brought this action against the appellant under one of the provisions of the liability insurance policy sold to Kunitake. This provision was made in pursuance of an act of the Legislature. Stats. 1919, c. 367, p. 776. This statute requires such a liability policy to state that insolvency of the insured shall not release the insurance carrier, and to state that, "in case judgment shall be secured against the insured * * * then an action may be brought against the company. * * *" In Marple v. American Automobile Insurance Co. (Cal. App.) 255 P. 260, we held that insolvency of the insured was not a condition to such action against the company, but that it was only necessary to obtain a judgment against the insured. In view of this authority, it is unnecessary for us to consider the appellant's claim that the evidence did not support the trial court's finding of the insolvency of the insured, based upon the return of an execution nulla bona.

The statute requires said policy to state, "in case judgment shall be secured against the insured * * * an action may be brought. * * *" The policy here used the expression, "in case judgment shall be secured against such insolvent" instead of against the insured. Whatever uncertainty this gives rise to must be resolved in favor of the statutory requirement because: First, another provision of the policy (section 14) expressly incorporates into the policy any specific statutory provision at variance with any condition of the policy; and, second, the statutory provision is a part of the policy. Malmgren v. Southwestern Automobile Ins. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 512.

[3] Appellant also contends that, conceding an action might have been maintained by the injured person himself against the company upon the judgment, the language of the statute and policy upon this subject is such that an action could not be brought by his executrix—that this cause of action given by the policy and the statute is confined to those specifically named therein. The statute requires a provision "stating that in case judgment shall be secured against the insured in an action brought by the injured person or his heirs or personal representatives, in case death resulted from the accident, then an action may be brought against the company, on the policy and subject to its terms and limitations, by such injured person, his heirs or personal representatives as the case may be, to recover on said judgment." Appellant's argument seeks to confine this right of action to those directly injured; i. e., the one personally injured, or, in case of his death (caused by the injury insured against), then by his heirs or representatives as in an action for wrongful death. William Pigg's cause of action for personal injuries abated upon his death, but before his death he had obtained a judgment. At the time he obtained this judgment he also acquired, by the force of the statute and the policy, the right to bring an action against the insurance carrier. This right of action was an action upon a judgment—a contract, and not such a cause of action as abated upon his death. This cause of action was property. This property passed to his personal representative like any other property or final judgment. The right to sue the insurance carrier upon the judgment was an incident to the judgment and passed along with that judgment to his estate as an asset thereof.

[4] Now this cause of action by the policy and the statute is said to be "subject to its (the policy's) terms and limitations." Appellant claimed and pleaded as a defense that the assured Kunitake violated section 6 of the policy. That section reads:

"Whenever required by the company, the insured shall aid in securing information and evidence and the attendance of witnesses, and shall co-operate with the company (except in a pecuniary way) in all matters which the company may deem necessary in the defense of any claim or suit or in the prosecution of any appeal."

The trial court, in finding No. 9, found this defense to be untrue. Appellant claims this finding to be unsupported by the evidence. This defense was based upon the information that the assured had gone to Japan and was not available at the time of the trial. He made a statement of the accident, however, to the insurance company's attorneys, delivered to them the summons and complaint, and verified the answer in the action. His statement included the statement that there were no witnesses. On March 24, 1921, the cause was set for trial for June 28, 1921. Appellant's attorneys made no effort to get in touch with the assured (defendant) until June 24, 1921; at that time and subsequently they mailed letters and notices to him which he did not receive. On the date set for trial, June 28, 1921, defendant's counsel (counsel for appellant here) appeared in court. He did not move for a continuance, but stated that he wished to withdraw from the case. This request was apparently allowed without notice to the defendant. The cause was then continued and transferred to another department of the court for a later hearing as upon default. Plaintiff's counsel served notice on defendant by leaving notice with the county clerk of the withdrawal of his attorney and the resetting of the cause for trial. All the intendments of the evidence are in favor of the finding of fact made by the trial court against this defense. We may not say that under this evidence the court was not justified in concluding that the assured was not sufficiently advised by those whom the insurance carrier had employed to make his defense; that his going to Japan was in ignorance of any necessity for his remaining here until the trial, or in ignorance of the date set for the trial, or due to failure of counsel to advise him that it was necessary to keep in touch with the attorneys.

of the policy exceed $5,000. The judgment against Kunitake was filed July 14, 1921, and was for $6,592.50 and $32.90 costs. The judgment in this action was filed December 18, 1924, and was for $6,229.20 and $23.70 costs. This does not exceed $5,000 of the original judgment, plus $32.90 costs, plus interest on $5,000 at 7 per cent. We think this is the correct amount under the terms of the policy. The company agreed to indemnify the insured up to an amount not exceeding $10,000 for one accident—

"provided, however, that the company's liability shall in no event exceed $5,000 for damages for such injuries to any one person. And will in addition (1) defend (certain suits); (2) pay (certain expenses)—(b) pay all taxed costs; (c) pay all interest accruing upon such part of such damages awarded by judgment as is not in excess of the company's limit of indemnity as above defined."

It is apparent from reading the foregoing excerpt from the policy that the company assumed a greater liability than $5,000, for it is said that in addition to paying $5,000 for damages for injuries it would pay costs and also interest on so much of the judgment for damages as did not exceed $5,000.

The judgment is affirmed.

PENILLA et al. v. GERSTENKORN
(Civ. 3362.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 12, 1927.

1. Specific performance ⇨97(1)—Tenant was excused from formal tender of rent as condition precedent to specific performance, where it would have been refused.

Where facts showed that, if tenant had made tender of first six months to be paid at commencement of renewal term of lease, landlords would have refused it, tenant was excused from making a formal tender as condition precedent to an action for specific performance of renewal agreement of lease.

2. Specific performance ⇨28(2)—General covenant giving tenants right to renew lease held sufficiently certain to be enforceable.

Although covenant in lease for four years gave lessee right of renewing lease was general, it was sufficiently certain to be enforceable.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨88(2)—General covenant to extend or renew implies additional term equal to first term on same terms except as to renewal.

A general covenant to extend or renew a lease implies additional term equal to first term and on same terms, including that of rent, except a covenant to renew.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨85—Right of renewal constitutes part of tenant's interest, and, in absence of contrary covenant, may be assigned and enforced by assignee.

Right of renewing a lease by tenant constitutes part of his interest in land, and, in absence of covenant to contrary, may be sold and assigned by him, and benefit of such right may be enforced by his assignee.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨86(1)—Where tenant had right to renew lease, fact that rental value of property had increased since time of first lease was immaterial.

Where covenant of lease for four years gave tenant right to renew lease, fact that rental value of premises had increased since time lease was executed was immaterial, since sufficiency of consideration for contract was determinable from facts existing when contract was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Constance M. Goytino Penilla and another against H. A. Gerstenkorn, for restitution of premises, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint for specific performance of lease contract. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. C. Noleman, of Los Angeles, and A. C. McCall, of Alhambra, for appellants.

Griffith Jones and John J. Craig, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. February 20, 1919, the plaintiffs leased to M. A. Laffey and F. P. Casey, for the term of four years from that date, two vacant lots in the city of Los Angeles on which to maintain and operate an oil and gasoline service station. The lease, which contained no covenant against assignment, gave the lessees "the right of renewing this lease" at the end of the four years. During the year 1922 the defendant acquired the interests of the lessees under the lease and thereafter held possession of the property and conducted a service station thereon up to the time of the trial of this action. The plaintiffs, however, at all times refused to recognize the defendant as a tenant, and they accepted no rent from him. On their refusal to accept payment of rent from him, the defendant regularly, on the 20th of each month as provided in the lease, deposited the monthly rental in a Los Angeles bank to the credit of the plaintiffs. February 14, 1923, the defendant made demand upon the plaintiffs for a renewal of the lease for an additional term of four years. The plaintiffs refused to renew the lease, and on March 1, 1923, they commenced this action to recover possession of the premises. The defendant answered, setting up the foregoing facts as a defense, and, by way of cross-complaint for specific performance, he alleged the same facts and also that at the time the lease was executed the reasonable rental value of the premises was not in excess of $2.50 per month, and that the consideration for the lease was "fair and adequate" and "as to said plaintiffs just and reasonable." The court found the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint to be true, and entered judgment thereon requiring the plaintiffs to "make, execute, and deliver to the defendant * * * a lease of the property" for a term of four years from February 20, 1923, and containing the same terms as the original lease, except the provision for renewal, and that for the payment of the rent for the first six months at the time of the execution of the lease.

[1] The original lease provided for payment of rent at the rate of $15 a month, that for the first six months to be paid at the commencement of the term. At the time the defendant demanded a renewal of the lease, he did not tender payment of rent in advance for the first six months of the new term. Appellants contend that, because of failure to make such tender, the defendant was not entitled to judgment for specific performance. It is apparent from the facts stated that such a tender would have been refused by the plaintiffs. For more than five months prior to the defendant's demand for a renewal of the lease they had refused to recognize him as a tenant or to accept payment of rent from him. This conduct excused him from making a formal tender as a condition precedent to an action for specific performance. Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 678, 200 P. 610. The defendant continued to deposit the monthly installments of rent, as they became due, to the plaintiffs' credit up to the time judgment was entered, more than fifteen months after the end of the original term. The judgment requires that the amount of these deposits be applied in payment of the accrued rent. It thus appears that any tender of rent to the plaintiffs at the time of the demand for a renewal would have been an idle act, and that no different judgment could have been given if the rent in advance for the first six months of the new term had been tendered.

[2-5] While the covenant to renew is general, it is sufficiently certain to be enforceable. It does not, as appellants contend, purport to create a perpetuity, and the right of renewal, vested in the original lessees, was assignable. "A general covenant to extend or renew implies an additional term equal to the first, and upon the same terms, including that of rent, except the covenant to renew; to include which would make the lease perpetual." Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 332; 16 R. C. L. 887. "The right of renewal constitutes a part of the tenant's interest in the land, and, in the absence of a covenant to the contrary, may be sold and assigned by him, and the benefits of this right may be enforced by the assignee." Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 332; Standard Oil Co. v. Slye, 164 Cal. 435, 442, 129 P. 589. There is testimony to the effect that at the time the lease was executed the reasonable rental value of the premises for a term of four years, with the privilege of a renewal for an additional term of four years, was $15 a month, and the court so found. The rental value of the property has greatly increased since that time, but that fact is immaterial. "The sufficiency of consideration for a contract must be determined from the facts as they existed when the contract was made rather than by subsequent developments." 23 Cal. Jur. 444.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County;
W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action on a conditional sales agreement by E. A. Ferguson against Fred Koch. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.
A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff, appellant herein, by written contract, sold to the defendant, respondent here, a Reo auto truck. The machine had been "made over" from an old Reo automobile of the touring car type. In the contract, however, the machine was not denominated a truck, but was referred to as a "Reo chassis." Before making the agreement of sale and purchase, the defendant made two examinations of the truck. One was made at plaintiff's place of business, and while the machine was stored there, and one examination was made after the car had been towed to defendant's place of business, some 40 miles distant. Upon the second examination, some parts of the engine were removed and the cylinders were examined. Thereupon a written agreement of sale and purchase was made out by the seller, and the same was signed by both parties to this action. This written agreement was in the following language:

"Robbins, Sutter Co., Dec. 14, 1925. This is to certify that E. A. Ferguson agrees to sell to Fred Koch, the following described property: One Reo chassis, year model 1916, as is. E. A. Ferguson, the sole legal owner of said Reo for several years past, agrees to give a clear title to said Reo, to Fred Koch, the buyer. The Reo chassis is sold as is, due to the fact that certain parts belonging to chassis are not attached thereto. E. A. Ferguson guarantees that a license for said Reo can be obtained. E. A. Ferguson, to the best of his knowledge, states that the motor of said Reo is in very good condition. [Here follow terms of sale, which are immaterial to this discussion.]

"[Signed] E. A. Ferguson.

"Fred Koch.

"Witness: J. Ponne."

The defendant failed to make the payments required by the agreement, and this suit followed.

Defendant by his answer alleged that the plaintiff made certain false and fraudulent representations to defendant, as to certain qualities of the truck. It is averred that the following representations were made: First, that the truck was a "Reo speed wagon"; second, that it was a 2½-ton truck, and would carry that weight; and, third, that it had the same motor in it that the Reo Company was then putting in the new cars for the year 1925.

Defendant further alleged that these represented qualities were the inducements that caused him to enter into the agreement of purchase; that soon thereafter defendant found that the said representations so made to him by plaintiff were false and untrue, and thereupon he immediately offered to return the truck to the plaintiff. Plaintiff denied these allegations of fraud.

Upon a trial of the issues thus presented, the court found the allegations of defendant's answer to be true, and gave judgment for the defendant.

Appellant contends that the decision of the lower court was erroneous for several reasons.

First. It is claimed that if the defendant, a man admittedly familiar with trucks generally, was given full and free opportunity to make an independent examination of the truck, and that if he did in fact make a full examination, and thereafter accepted the machine, he did so under the caveat emptor doctrine.

Secondly. Appellant contends that, as the machine was a "made-over" truck, reconstructed from an already used or secondhand car, it would have no warranties or warranties by implication, and that, if the contract of sale did express certain warranties, these warranties must be taken as the only warranties attending the sale. In this connection it is further claimed that, as the written agreement had therein the words "as is," referring to the condition of the car when sold, it must be interpreted as meaning that the buyer takes the truck with all its faults and imperfections.

The questions presented on this appeal are not easy of solution, owing to the fact that, as stated in many decisions and text-books, the decided cases are not easily harmonized.

[1, 2] Taking the question as to whether the defendant, having made an examination and thereupon accepting delivery of the car, is now precluded from claiming that the machine was wanting in some particular as warranted, we believe that, if we are to harmonize the decisions, we must do so upon the theory that the trial court has a right to judge of the circumstances attending the sale and of the relative position and knowledge of the two parties to the agreement and as to whether the buyer was in fact misled. It is plain that an expert on secondhand automobiles cannot be misled into accepting delivery of an automobile from one who knows nothing about a car. In such case it can make no difference what the seller says as to qualities possessed by the machine. On the other hand, a purchaser without mechanical knowledge has a right to rely upon what a skilled mechanic tells him. The trial court in the case at bar having heard all the testimony on this point, found that the defendant herein was misled by plaintiff's statements, notwithstanding the fact that defendant did make an independent investigation of the car. We cannot hold as a matter of law that, because defendant did make an independent investigation, he was not in some substantial measure misled by plaintiff's false statements. We think the evidence is sufficient, if believed by the trial court, to indicate that he might have relied much more on the statements of plaintiff, as to the qualities of the automobile, than he did on his own examination.

In the late case of Mooney v. Cyriacks, 185 Cal. 70, 195 P. 922, it was held that a purchaser is not estopped from claiming that false representations were made, because such purchaser made an independent investigation. However, in that particular case it appeared that the plaintiff was a woman, knowing almost nothing of the general qualities of automobiles, and it further appeared that particular representations, as to qualities very important to her, were so presented to her that even had she been quite an expert as to such machines, she might have been easily misled. The automobile in the Mooney Case had been run at least 10,000 miles. The speedometer thereon was by the seller fraudulently set back so as to indicate that the machine had been driven only some 900 miles, which last-named distance was the mileage the seller represented the machine had been driven. In addition to this, it appeared that the top of the automobile had been skillfully patched by the seller in a manner as to make it appear that the top was new.

It is therefore plain that in the Mooney Case the purchaser was, by fraud, prevented from making a fair inspection. Williston on Sales, § 208, says:

"There is no reason in the nature of things why a buyer should not rely both on the seller's statements and his own judgment."

The trial court, in the instant case, having determined that defendant was in fact misled, we will not disturb the decision because defendant did make his own examination of the automobile before the purchase.

We then come to the question as to whether or not the defendant herein should have been permitted to introduce any evidence as to fraudulent representations, under the circumstances attending the sale and as the same are affected by the written contract now before the court.

[3] The automobile was not only what is termed a secondhand car, but, to use the language of some of the witnesses, it was "made over" into a truck from an old 1916 Reo touring car. We cannot hold that it had any implied warranties under the circumstances. If warranties accompanied its transfer, they must be held to be express warranties of the seller. Of express warranties only does defendant complain.

[4] The written contract did not attempt to name it as a "truck"; it was described as a "Reo chassis, year model 1916, as is." There were certain express warranties in the sale and purchase agreement. That plaintiff would give a clear title, and would guarantee that a license could be obtained, were warranties clearly expressed. As to the quality of the motor the agreement says: The seller "to the best of his knowledge states that the motor of said Reo is in very good condition." No other warranties are expressed.

The agreement, however, does say that the truck is sold "as is." Just what these words imply has not been fully treated in the reports. We can find but one use of the expression in the reported cases. In Schwartz v. Kohn (Sup.) 155 N. Y. S. 547, it is used, but, as used there, no light is thrown on the real meaning of the expression. According to the use of the word, particularly in catalogues of secondhand books, furniture, or such like articles, its use implies that the buyer takes a chance in making the purchase. It seems to imply the thought that the buyer is taking delivery of goods in some way defective, and upon the express condition that he must trust to his own examination. The very words "as is," taking this contract as a whole, would cause a person to know that the seller meant to say to the buyer, "You look the article over, and, if you buy it, you do so at your risk." It means much the same as saying, "If you buy you take the article with all its faults." We believe that, as a matter of law, under the facts as this record shows them to be, the defendant must be held to have accepted this truck, without the guaranties of which he complains accompanying the transfer.

[5] He in no way pretends that he was misled into signing the agreement, except as to the prior fraudulent statements. His signature to the agreement was not obtained by fraud or artifice. All previous negotiations are presumed embodied in the writings. Section 1625, Civ. Code.

We believe the language used by the court in Yuba Manufacturing Co. v. Stone, 39 Cal. App., at page 447, 179 P. 421, clearly expresses the true rule that should be our guide. The decision just cited says:

"Manifestly the court, as far as possible, should protect an innocent party against the fraud of one seeking to take an unconscionable advantage, but in this class of cases, when the parties have deliberately reduced their contract to writing, and have undertaken to set forth the character of the contrivance which is sold, and there is no mistake or fraud connected with the execution of said instrument, it is reasonable and in accordance with the law to hold that the contract shall not be avoided by reason of some false representation as to the quality of the machine, which representation the vendee has seen fit to completely ignore in the written instrument. It is true, of course, that a defrauded party cannot by the simple 'device of a written instrument' be deprived of the right to prove the fraud, but it is equally true that he cannot be permitted to nullify the rule in relation to written instruments by the specious claim that he was deceived by certain oral representations."

The judgment of the lower court is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by N. J. Shupe against Donald L. Evans. From an order setting aside default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hahn, Hahn & Landreth, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. This is an unlawful detainer action. The chronology of the case is as follows: February 23, 1923, complaint in unlawful detainer filed and summons issued. February 24, 1923, complaint and summons served on defendant. February 28, 1923, default of defendant entered. March 3, 1923, trial had. March 3, 1923, findings and conclusions of law filed. March 5, 1923, judgment filed and entered. March 5, 1923, writ of possession issued. March 6, 1923, writ of possession served and satisfied. March 6, 1923, demurrer filed. March 12, 1923, demurrer dropped from calendar. March 18, 1923, notice of motion to set aside the judgment entered herein under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. May 18, 1923, affidavits of Thompson and the defendant filed. May 18, 1923, proposed answer filed. June 11, 1923, order setting aside judgment entered. June 19, 1923, notice of appeal filed.

It will be noticed that the judgment was entered March 5, 1923; that the notice to set aside said judgment was not served or filed until May 18, 1923, or almost 2½ months after the entry of judgment; that the order setting aside said judgment was not entered until June 11, 1923, or over 3 months after default. The appeal is taken from the order setting aside said judgment of March 5, 1923. Appellant claims that section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to an unlawful detainer action, while section 1179 of the same code does govern.

Respondent controverts this position, and alleges, furthermore, that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in this: (1) That the lease provides that said defendant shall "keep all of said grounds in first-class condition, including the proper attention and irrigation of grapes, shrubs, grass, vines and any other plants or trees growing thereon, all in accordance with the directions of the" plaintiff; (2) that the alternative notice provided for in subdivision 3 of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not served, and that service of such notice was jurisdictional.

We will not discuss the sufficiency of the complaint.

[1] The defect, if any there was, was not one going to the jurisdiction of the court, and hence the judgment was not void, and the remedy of the defendant was by appeal.

"But this was not a defect going to the jurisdiction of the superior court, and the judgment in respect thereto was not void. The complaint sought this very relief, and the court erroneously concluded that the plaintiff in that action was entitled to this relief as against petitioner. It is thoroughly settled in this state that the failure of a complaint to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action does not render a judgment void. The court had full jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and, by reason of personal service on petitioner, full jurisdiction of the person of the defendant as to all the matters tendered by the complaint. (See Crouch v. H. L. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341 [146 P. 880], and cases therein cited.) The remedy of the petitioner, who must be held to have been perfectly advised of the claim of the plaintiff in that action, as stated in his complaint, was to contest that claim in the trial court, or on appeal from that judgment." Gillespie v. Fender, 180 Cal. 202, 203, 180 P. 332.

[2] We will now discuss and consider the order of the court vacating the judgment of March 5, 1923. It is not claimed by appellant that the trial judge abused his discretion in making said order, but the sole point raised is that section 1179 of the Code of Civil Procedure governs, and is the only remedy of respondent, and that section 473 has no application to cases in unlawful detainer.

No cases have been cited by either counsel, and we know of none, where section 473 has been applied to unlawful detainer cases; but it has been used in various special proceedings, such as claim and delivery (Bonestell v. Western Auto-Motive Finance Corp., 69 Cal. App. 719, 323 P. 734); mandamus (Lapique v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 582, 181 P. 227, where the court indulges in some obiter dicta at page 584 [181 P. 228]); Torrens title proceedings (Beggs v. Riordan, 44 Cal. App. 230, 186 P. 187); quiet title proceedings (Schaefer v. Dinwiddie, 44 Cal. App. 405, 186 P. 617); red light abatement (People v. Gifford, 54 Cal. App. 182, 201 P. 469); quiet title, under McEnerney Act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78) (Cresta v. Ocean Shore Railroad Co., 56 Cal. App. 687, 206 P. 460); criminal cases (People v. Mahach, 60 Cal. App. 635, 213 P. 539); partition proceedings (Chavez v. Scully, 69 Cal. App. 633, 232 P. 165), and adoption proceedings (In re De Leon, 70 Cal. App. 1, 232 P. 738).

It is thus seen that section 473 is of very wide application.

Furthermore, a consideration of the two sections leads us to disagree with appellant's contention. Section 1179 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "The court may relieve a tenant against a forfeiture of a lease, * * * in case of hardship, where application for such relief is made within thirty days," etc. It will be observed that no mention is made of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect." If appellant's contention were correct neither party would be entitled to relief in case of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, no matter how meritorious the application might be. Again, section 473 is purely procedural, while section 1179 deals more with substantive law mixed with procedure.

Again, section 1179 deals with an entirely different situation than section 473. Under section 1179 the application may be made by the defendant (the tenant), and also by either "a * * * subtenant, * * * mortgagee, * * * or any person interested in the continuance of the term," whether parties to the action or not, while section 473 is limited to the parties themselves or their legal representatives.

Hence, we are of opinion that the relief granted by section 473 is in addition to, or cumulative of, that given by section 1179.

[3] The appellate courts of the state have decided so many times that a trial upon the merits is to be had wherever possible that no citation of authorities is necessary.

[4] The trial court having passed upon the sufficiency of the showing made by the defendant to be relieved from the default judgment and no abuse of discretion being either claimed or shown by the record, the order vacating the judgment of March 5, 1923, is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Sales $\S$ 411—Complaint alleging defendants' agreement to sell cattle and dairy equipment, performance by plaintiff, and defendant's breach, held to state cause of action.

Complaint alleging contract under which defendants agreed to sell cattle and dairy equipment to plaintiff, price therefor being payable in installments, payment of part of price by plaintiff, and entry into possession, and breach of agreement by defendants, held to state cause of action.

2. Trover and conversion $\S$ 32(1)—Complaint alleging defendants converted cattle and dairy equipment sold to plaintiff held to state cause of action.

Complaint alleging purchase by plaintiff of cattle and dairy equipment, payment of part of price therefor, and entry into possession, and that defendants breached contract and unlawfully converted cattle and chattels to their own use, held to state cause of action for conversion.

3. Sales $\S$ 417—Finding that buyer of cattle and dairy equipment was damaged in sum paid to apply on contract price held sustained by evidence.

Where contract for sale of cattle and dairy equipment for named price was breached by defendant, finding that plaintiff was damaged in sum of first installment paid was sustained by evidence that he took possession of personal property and during his absence thereafter, before second payment became due, defendants contracted to sell property to third person, whom plaintiff found in possession when he returned.

4. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 258(1) — Excluding testimony that woman accompanying buyer notified defendants cattle purchased were abandoned and asking them to take charge held proper, where her agency for buyer was not shown.

In action for breach of contract to sell cattle and dairy equipment and for conversion of cattle by sellers thereof after breach, excluding sellers' offer of testimony to show that woman present with buyer when sale was made had notified defendants that cattle were abandoned and had asked them to take charge held proper, where her agency for plaintiff was not shown.

5. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 417—Evidence held not to show buyer of cattle and dairy equipment breached contract to care for cattle and keep feed bills paid.

Evidence that buyer of cattle and dairy equipment employed same dairyman employed by sellers and had sufficient feed on hand to feed stock held not to show he breached contract requiring him to care for stock in dairymanlike manner and keep feed and expense bills paid.

6. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 185—Seller having breached contract to sell cattle and dairy equipment before date installment became due, buyer was not required to tender payment.

Where seller of cattle and dairy equipment breached contract for sale of cattle before second installment became due, buyer was not required to tender such payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by M. Groeneveld against J. G. Delozier and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. E. Hannon, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Claude A. Shutt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KING, Presiding Justice pro tem. Appeal from judgment for plaintiff for $1,000. The verified complaint alleges:

I. A written contract dated July 30, 1923, by which defendants agreed to sell plaintiff certain cattle and dairy equipment for $5,000, payable $100 down, $900 July 31, 1923, $1,000 on or before 90 days, $75 August 16, 1923, and other later payments, with interest on deferred payments payable monthly. The contract recites that, "as there is a mortgage now against the cows, these payments are to be applied on it" until the defendants "take same up." It is contracted that the stock and increase are to remain on the ranch "where now located" until paid for. Plaintiff was "granted the use of the corrals and barns," etc. Appellants agreed to erect a three-room cottage for the milkers and make other specified improvements. It was also provided that, if plaintiff "fails to meet his payments as they become due, then he forfeits all money paid and his interest in said cattle reverts," etc., "at their option." The agreement provides that plaintiff was to care for said stock "in a dairymanlike manner" and to keep feed and expense bills paid.

II. That plaintiff entered into possession of the property July 31, 1923, and on August 9, 1923, defendants dispossessed him.

III. That defendants did not apply the payments to the mortgage nor build the cottage.

IV. That plaintiff has performed all obligations, etc., "except those he was prevented from performing by defendants."

V. That plaintiff has paid $1,000, that $1,500 is the reasonable increase in value of said cattle—and plaintiff is damaged $2,500.

A second cause of action along similar lines alleges that "defendants unlawfully took, converted, and disposed of said cattle and chattels to their own use to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $2,500." He prays for $2,500.

A general and special demurrer was overruled.

The answer denies "that defendants, or either of them, dispossessed plaintiff of any cattle or chattels contrary to the terms of their agreement or otherwise." It alleges that defendants were at all times ready, able, and willing to apply all payments to erect a cottage, but "plaintiff violated his said contract and terminated the same without having requested or desired the making of any said payment or the erection of any said house."

As to the second cause of action, defendants "deny that on the 9th day of August, 1923, or at any other time when any act was done by either of the defendants with relation to any of said cattle or chattels, the plaintiff was lawfully possessed or possessed of any of said cattle or chattels, his property, or that any of said cattle and chattels was at said time or ever the property of plaintiff"; and "deny that the defendants or either of them, ever unlawfully took or converted or disposed of any of said cattle or chattels to their own use or otherwise as alleged in said amended complaint or otherwise."

The court found:

- (1) That the contract was made as alleged.
- (2) That plaintiff paid the $100 and the $900 due July 31, 1923.
- (3) That plaintiff entered into possession July 31, 1923, and on August 9, 1923, defendants dispossessed him.
- (4) That plaintiff performed all conditions and obligations, etc., as set forth in the contract up to and including August 9, 1923.
- (5) "By reason of the failure of defendants to perform its conditions and obligations agreed by them to be performed, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of" $1,000 and interest from July 31, 1923.

A motion for new trial was denied.

Plaintiff testified that defendant Colvin took him to the premises and introduced him to Hardy, a milker then in the employ of defendants, and whom plaintiff then hired and placed in charge. Plaintiff then left. He came back August 7th; Hardy being still in charge. He returned August 16th with one Vanderveen, described as "really the prospective buyer" to "turn the keys over to him." He found S. B. Jones in possession. Jones had moved in with his wife, son, and daughter. He saw defendants August 18th, and they admitted they had sold to Jones. He demanded the cattle or his money, but never got either. He testified that he was ready August 16th when he went to the place to pay the money then due.

Under cross-examination of plaintiff, a written rescission, dated September 5, 1923, and served September 12th, was introduced demanding his money, $1,000 and damages of $1,500, "because of the breach by you of said contract in transferring same to one S. B. Jones."

September 21, 1923, a return notice was served on plaintiff, tendering all property described in the complaint, and stating, "This offer will terminate September 24th." This was served two days after the original complaint was filed. Defendant Colvin testified that plaintiff did not care for the stock in "a dairymanlike manner." He also testified that they offered to turn the cattle back to plaintiff if he would pay up what was due and for the feed. This was on August 18th. This last statement is corroborated by the other defendant.

Defendants first argued:

(1) That the complaint states no cause of action.

(2) That evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings.

(3) Decision is against law.

(4) Errors of law committed at trial.

(5) It affirmatively appears that plaintiff failed to perform the contract.

Taking up these objections in their order:

[3] 2. The plaintiff produced evidence of the execution of the written contract sued on; that under the contract he took possession of the personal property mentioned therein "on the ranch where now located," he "being granted the use of the corrals and barns" as provided in the contract; that he made the payment of $100 on execution of the contract and of $900 due July 31, 1923; and that during his absence, and before another payment became due, on August 9, 1923, defendants contracted to sell the property to one Jones, whom plaintiff found in possession when he came back on August 16th when his third payment was due. The court evidently accepted this testimony as true, and found that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $1,000, which he had paid. The court might very readily, under the evidence, have given judgment for the additional $1,500 which Jones contracted to pay for the same property nine days after plaintiff made his contract. The findings are fully sustained.

3. We are unable to follow appellants' argument on this point.

[4] The errors of law complained of are (a) the overruling of defendants' demurrer; and (b) the denial of the motion for a nonsuit, which are covered above. Appellants then discuss the action of the court in sustaining objections to their offer of testimony "to show the connection with this transaction of the woman who was present when the transaction was had, and of the refusal of the court to receive in evidence the fact that she had notified the defendants that the cattle were abandoned and had asked them to take charge of the same." As to this offered testimony, the learned trial judge pertinently stated in sustaining the objections:

"You have not gone far enough to show that he (plaintiff) should take orders from her in the future. She was incapable of giving consent. The fact that she was present and even furnished some of the money is no proof whatever to my mind that she was cointerested, other than being interested in the plaintiff."

The rulings sustaining the objection to this testimony were correct.

[5] 5. In support of this objection appellants urge that the "uncontradicted testimony of defendant Colvin, page 17 et seq. of this brief, is to the effect that the dairy herd was at no time cared for in a dairymanlike manner." Counsel has overlooked the testimony of plaintiff that he employed the same dairyman who had been in the employ of appellants and that there was sufficient feed on hand to feed the stock.

[6] As to the argument that "it was not even contended that the plaintiff ever tendered to defendants the payment that became due on the 16th day of August, 1923," a complete answer is that a week before this payment became due appellants had breached the contract—while no payment was due.

The judgment is affirmed.

Bills and notes  370—Failure to surrender to makers note for which note sued on was executed, held not to defeat recovery by good-faith purchaser (Civ. Code, § 3138).

In action on negotiable note by purchaser for value in good faith, before maturity without knowledge of any equities of defendants, defense that note for which note sued on was executed was to be returned to makers on payment of interest on note sued on, but that prior note was never returned, and hence there was no consideration for note sued on, could not be maintained under Civ. Code, § 3138, and could not defeat recovery on note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Sarah M. Burnstein and others against Frank Simmonds and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to recover on a promissory note. The defendants appeared and answered, and also filed a cross-complaint. The cross-complaint was answered, and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings responsive to each and all of the issues, and ordered judgment for the plaintiffs. From a judgment entered thereon the defendants have appealed, and have brought up a bill of exceptions.

The defendants contend that on the findings as made the judgment should have been in their favor. That contention is based on facts which we will proceed to recite.

On the 28th day of November, 1917, Vernon Cruikshank delivered to John W. Sharpe his promissory note in the sum of $6,000, due 90 days thereafter, with interest at 8 per cent., and pledged as security for the payment thereof 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the Tungsten Mines Company. Said note was indorsed on the reverse side by John W. Sharpe, Frank Simmonds, E. J. Genereux, and Elmer Cole, and thereafter it was delivered to D. W. Glenn, together with the collateral security. On December 6, 1920, that note had not been paid, and the parties interested entered into such agreements that on said date a promissory note was signed which was as follows:

"No. ——. Corona, Cal., December 6, 1920.

"On or before 3 years after date for value received, I, we or either of us promise to pay to D. W. Glenn or order, at the First National Bank of Corona, California, six thousand and no/100 dollars, with interest, payable quarterly, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from date until paid, and attorney's fees of ten per cent. on the amount then unpaid, if suit be commenced or other proceedings taken to enforce the payment of this note.

"Should the interest not be paid when due, it shall be compounded monthly thereafter, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal, and thereafter the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note. Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard. The makers and endorsers of this note hereby waive diligence, demand, protest and notice.

"[Signed] Frank Simmonds.

"Elmer E. Cole.

"Ethel I. Genereaux.

"E. J. Genereux."

That note was delivered to the payee, and there was a collateral agreement that, if the interest for the ensuing six months was duly paid according to the terms of the note, then and in that event the note dated November 28, 1917, would be surrendered to the makers. The interest was so paid. However, the note dated November 28, 1917, was not, after the interest had been so paid, returned to the makers thereof. The indorsers have not received it, and the payee is not in possession of it, and does not know where it is, and he has not refused to deliver it to the indorsers or either of them. D. W. Glenn assigned, indorsed, and transferred the note dated December 6, 1920, to C. F. Baldauf and Annie Baldauf, and prior to the beginning of this action they assigned unto Sarah M. Burnstein all of their interest. The plaintiff Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank had an interest in said note as pledgee, but prior to the trial of this action said interest ceased, and at the time the judgment was rendered it had no interest therein.

The plaintiff Sarah M. Burnstein purchased said note in good faith, prior to its maturity, and without notice of defendants' claims, and paid therefor property of the reasonable value of $6,000. Neither plaintiff Sarah M. Burnstein nor her assignors, C. M. Baldauf and Annie Baldauf, nor either of them, had any knowledge of the claims, demands, or equities of defendants against the note in suit prior to the time that plaintiffs acquired their interest therein.

The defendants point to the collateral agreement that the note dated November 28, 1917, was to be returned to the makers when the interest on the note in suit had been paid for the ensuing six months, etc., and thereupon they strenuously maintain that they have never become liable on the note in suit. They contend in this behalf that this action was premature; that the novation must be complete; that there was no consideration for the note upon which this action was brought; that there is no evidence to sustain the judgment; and that the note dated November 28, 1917, being lost, must be legally accounted for and defendants protected before action brought. The plaintiffs reply that, as the note in suit was a negotiable instrument, and as the plaintiffs had no knowledge whatever of the collateral agreement above mentioned until long after Sarah M. Burnstein purchased the note, and, as Sarah M. Burnstein bought the note in good faith before maturity, and for full value, to wit, property of the reasonable value of $6,000, that under these circumstances the defendants may not assert, as against these plaintiffs, the defense above delineated. In making this reply they are sustained by the statute. Civ. Code § 3138. They also argue that under the facts the defendants have not been damaged or inconvenienced by the failure of the payee to deliver the Cruikshank note for several different reasons which they proceed to state. In their reply brief the defendants do not attempt to cite any authorities showing that they may interpose in this action, as against these plaintiffs, the defense which they claim. However, they content themselves by citing authorities that have to deal with the rights of the original parties to negotiable instruments, or which involved contracts which were not negotiable instruments.

Under the findings as made by the trial court the judgment was clearly correct. Except as we have noted, there is no contention that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

SNODGRASS v. BELL et al. (Civ. 5962.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 12, 1927.

1. Taxation ⚡734(7)—Tax title held void for failure to state amount of penalties in published notice of delinquent tax list (Pol. Code, § 3764).

Tax title held void for failure of published notice of delinquent tax list to set forth amount due for penalties, as well as taxes, in compliance with Pol. Code, § 3764.

2. Judgment ⚡707—Judgment quieting title under tax deed is no defense in action by adverse claimant not party to prior suit.

Judgment quieting title in holder of tax deed in action wherein one claiming by adverse possession was not a party is of no avail to former in latter's action to quiet title.

3. Adverse possession ⚡70—Failure to show how predecessor of plaintiff in possession over 34 years obtained title, held not fatal to action to quiet title.

Failure to show how one, from whom plaintiff and her predecessor obtained paper title and possession over 34 years before commencing action to quiet title, obtained title to or right to grant disputed strip, held not fatal to action, where she occupied and cultivated it as then fenced and as described in her title deeds ever since.

4. Adverse possession ⚡89—Adverse claimant's nonpayment of taxes on part of strip for part of period of possession would not warrant judgment for one claiming under void tax deed.

Failure of plaintiff, claiming title by adverse possession, to pay taxes on every part of disputed strip for 5 of 34 years of continuous possession relied on, would not warrant judgment for defendant, claiming under void tax deed, in action to quiet title.

5. Adverse possession ⚡114(3)—Plaintiff's possession for over 34 years under deeds from previous possessor made prima facie case of ownership in action to quiet title.

Plaintiff's possession of disputed strip of land under deeds from previous possessor for over 34 years made at least a prima facie case of ownership in action to quiet title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Helen D. Snodgrass against Chester A. Bell, William J. Errengy, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Errengy appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson and G. C. De Garmo, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Maurice C. Sparling, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Respondent, as plaintiff in the court below, obtained judgment against defendants, including appellant herein, quieting her title to an acreage of land in Los Angeles county. Appellant's answer denied respondent's title and asserted title to a strip of land along respondent's southern boundary. This strip is about 36 feet wide and contains about 1.10 acres. Appellant's claim of title is based upon a tax deed. Respondent claims title by adverse possession.

The original source of respondent's title, as well as of the title of whoever owned the property immediately to the south of her land, was a decree of partition of the Rancho Tajauta, by which respondent's land was allotted to Ascencion Valenzuela, and the land to the south of her was allotted to Felipe Valenzuela. The deeds of respondent's predecessors up until the years 1882-1885 contain descriptions which fix the southern boundary as the northern boundary of the Felipe Valenzuela allotment. At that time

George Reed and wife acquired the land. Reed and wife, by deeds in 1888, 1890 and 1891, conveyed to C. Snodgrass, the immediate predecessor of respondent, all the land described in the complaint, using descriptions which did not tie to the Felipe Valenzuela northern boundary, but included the strip of land now in dispute here. Respondent's testimony established that for 34 years she and C. Snodgrass were in possession cultivating the same and that the southern boundary of the land possessed by them was marked by a fence the posts of which, at the time of the trial, were still standing in their original position; that the land was fenced at the time they took possession; that she had paid all taxes assessed in her name for many years down to date of trial. Her tax receipts since 1911 were received in evidence and the description contained in the assessment rolls of the land assessed to her is a subject of controversy between the parties. The description used called for 30.51 acres exclusive of roads. This was the correct amount of land in plaintiff's inclosure. A metes and bounds description followed, which, if laid out on the ground, would include only 30 acres and would omit one-half of the disputed 1.10-acre strip. According to the testimony of a civil engineer and surveyor, Hopkins, the southern boundary line of respondent's property was so described by this metes and bounds description in the assessment roll that it bisected the disputed strip from its northwest corner thereof to the southeast corner, leaving out a triangular shaped one-half of the disputed 1.10-acre strip.

From 1890 to 1897 the land to the south of respondent was assessed by a description which gave the northern boundary as the land of Snodgrass or of Reed and Snodgrass and variously referred to the acreage as 14, 14.91, and 15 acres. From 1897 to 1914, inclusive, this property was assessed as the 15.91-acre allotment of Felipe Valenzuela. In 1914 a portion of this land was assessed to Maria de Jesus Reyes de Valenzuela, successor to Felipe Valenzuela, by a metes and bounds description which did not include any of the land claimed by respondent. In 1915 and thereafter, the disputed strip besides being in this way at least partly assessed to respondent was also assessed to "Unknown owner." It was described as the north 1.10 acres of Felipe Valenzuela 15.91-acre allotment. The taxes being unpaid, this property was sold for taxes in 1923 to Chester A. Bell, the immediate grantor of appellant. This apparently escaped the actual notice of respondent, who continued as before to pay the taxes assessed in her name.

The result of this tax record is, first, that during the time this strip was assessed to "Unknown owner" and sold for taxes, respondent was paying taxes regularly on at least the one-half part of the same strip according to the metes and bounds description; second, the acreage description on her tax assessment description upon which she was paying taxes taken by itself would include all the disputed strip.

[1] Respondent claims the appellant's tax title is void because at least one-half and perhaps all the tax upon the disputed strip was paid by her at the very time it was assessed to "Unknown owner." She cites authority holding that if part of the tax is illegal the whole sale and tax deed is void. Bucknall v. Story, 36 Cal. 67; Wills v. Austin, 53 Cal. 152. Respondent also claims the tax title is void because the published notice of the delinquent tax list failed to set forth the amount due for penalties as well as for taxes. The notice is the same notice which was held to be illegal in Bussenius v. Warden, 71 Cal. App. 717, 236 P. 371, for failure to comply with Political Code, § 3764, for the same reason assigned by respondent here. Under this authority the appellant's tax title is void.

[2] The appellant's judgment quieting title based upon the tax deed was obtained in an action in which respondent was not a party and is therefore, of course, of no avail to him in this action.

[3] The break in the chain of respondent's paper title is by no means fatal to her action. Although the record does not show how Reed obtained title to or the right to grant the disputed strip, nevertheless respondent and her predecessor obtained paper title and possession from Reed more than 34 years before this action was commenced, and she has occupied and cultivated it as then fenced and as described in her title deeds ever since that time. Her possession was under color of title. Cal. Jur. vol. 1, p. 571.

[4, 5] Appellant's tax title being void, he has no claim upon the property. We need not consider his claim that respondent has not paid taxes for five years on every part of the disputed strip. Even if respondent had not so paid her taxes that would not warrant a judgment in favor of defendant, who has only a void tax deed and is therefore a stranger to the title and not in possession. Respondent's long possession under deeds from the previous possessor made at least a prima facie case of ownership. Scott v. Beck (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 933, and cases cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error ⇨356—Appeal not being taken in time limited by statute, appellate court has no jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 939).

Appeal from judgment not being taken in the 60 days limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 939, appellate court has no jurisdiction, and appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by the G. S. Donaldson Investment Company against W. A. Shay and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Arthur Wm. Green, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duckworth & Harrison, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the notice of appeal was filed too late. It is submitted to us upon the motion and brief of respondent only, the appellant having failed to file any reply.

From the certificate of the county clerk it appears that the judgment appealed from was entered on July 15, 1926, and that the notice of appeal was filed on April 9, 1927, and more than 60 days after the entry of judgment. No proceedings for a new trial were begun. Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"An appeal may be taken from any judgment * * * within sixty days from the entry of said judgment."

It has been uniformly held that the appeal must be taken within the time prescribed by law, otherwise the appellate court is without jurisdiction to entertain it. Lancel v. Postlethwaite, 172 Cal. 326, 156 P. 486.

1. Insurance ⇨131(1)—Insurance contract may be oral.

Parol contract of insurance may be made, and is enforceable.

2. Insurance ⇨152(3)—Parties to insurance contract are presumed to have entered it with reference to statutory form (St. 1909, p. 404).

Both parties to insurance contract must be presumed to have entered it with reference to statutory form prescribed by St. 1909, p. 404.

3. Insurance ⇨622(1)—Action on fire insurance contract, begun more than 15 months after fire, cannot be maintained (St. 1909, p. 404).

Action against insurance company, begun more than two years after fire, cannot be sustained as action on contract of insurance, in view of provision of standard policy prescribed by St. 1909, p. 404, that action must be commenced within 15 months after commencement of fire.

4. Fraud ⇨25—Damages cannot be recovered for fraud in execution of contract, unless such fraud causes pecuniary damage (Civ. Code, § 1572).

One claiming fraud, under Civ. Code, § 1572, in execution of contract, may recover when he shows he has sustained pecuniary damage or injury by reason of having been put in position worse than he would have occupied if there had been no fraud, but he cannot recover, unless such damage or injury is shown.

5. Insurance ⇨622(1)—After expiration of statutory period for bringing action on fire policy, insured cannot bring action on ground of fraud in executing contract.

Insured cannot recover on fire insurance contract after expiration of statutory period for bringing action on ground of fraud in execution of such contract, since such fraud could have caused no damage; insurer being bound by contract as fully as if it had been made in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by C. Fred Harlow against the American Equitable Assurance Company of New York. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Milton M. Cohen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This action was commenced June 30, 1924. The defendant's demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and thereafter the plaintiff filed an amended complaint reading as follows:

"Amended Complaint for Damages.

"The plaintiff herein, by leave of court first had and obtained, files this amended complaint herein and as and for such amended complaint and for cause of action against said defendant, avers as follows:

"I. That the said defendant, at all the times herein mentioned, was, and now is, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New York, and having a place of business in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California.

"II. That the plaintiff herein, on or about the 14th day of April, 1922, and for some time prior thereto, was the owner in fee of a certain piece of real property, together with all the improvements thereon, situate at Washington Boulevard and Huron road, three-quarters of a mile west of Palms, in the county of Los Angeles, state of California.

"III. That on or about the 8th day of November, 1921, in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, the said defendant falsely and fraudulently represented to this plaintiff that, in consideration of the sum of $150, the said defendant, in the event of destruction of said property by fire within a period of 3 years from said 8th day of November, 1921, would, within 90 days after such fire, pay to this plaintiff all the damages and losses sustained by said plaintiff by reason of such fire, not to exceed the sum of $10,000; that, at the time the said defendant made said representations to this plaintiff, the said defendant had no intention to perform the same, nor any part thereof; that the said representations were made by said defendant with the intent to deceive and defraud this plaintiff, and to induce this plaintiff to pay the said defendant the said sum of $150; that this plaintiff, fully believing that said representations were true, and relying upon said representations as protecting this plaintiff against loss by fire in the sum of $10,000 for the period of 3 years from said 8th day of November, 1921, was induced thereby to pay to the defendant on the said 8th day of November, 1921, in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, the said sum of $150.

"IV. That thereafter, to wit, on or about the 14th day of April, 1922, the said improvements situated upon the said property and contained therein were wholly destroyed by fire, and that said property at the time of said destruction of same by fire was of the value of over $10,000.

"V. That the said defendant has not paid to this plaintiff the said sum of $10,000, or any part thereof, although this plaintiff has repeatedly demanded of said defendant the payment of said sum, and by reason thereof this plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $10,000.

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against the defendant in the sum of $10,000, with interest thereon from the 14th day of July, 1922, and for costs of suit."

The defendant demurred to the amended complaint on the grounds that it "does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action"; that the action was not commenced "within 15 months" after the alleged fire; and that the action was barred "by subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, * * * as the same was not commenced within two years after the alleged cause of action mentioned in plaintiff's amended complaint accrued." The demurrer was sustained with 10 days' leave to amend. Plaintiff failed to amend within the time allowed by the court, and judgment was thereupon entered dismissing the action. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

material. "A parol contract of insurance may be made and is enforceable." American C. Co. v. Agricultural I. Co., 12 Cal. App. 133, 135, 106 P. 720; Ferrar v. Western Assurance Co., 30 Cal. App. 489, 491, 159 P. 609, 611; Smith v. Massachusetts Bonding, etc., Co., 71 Cal. App. 661, 666, 236 P. 176; Law v. Northern Assurance Co., 165 Cal. 394, 400, 132 P. 590. A standard form of insurance policy is prescribed by statute, and the use of any other form is prohibited, except as permitted by the terms of the statute. Stats. 1909, p. 404. Both parties must be presumed to have entered into the contract of insurance with reference to the statutory form. Kavanaugh v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 185 Cal. 307, 315, 197 P. 99; General Acc., etc., Corp. v. Indus. Acc. Com., 196 Cal. 179, 187, 237 P. 33; Northern Ins. Co. v. National U. F. I. Co., 35 Cal. App. 481, 484, 170 P. 434; Hicks v. British American Assurance Co., 162 N. Y. 284, 56 N. E. 744, 48 L. R. A. 424. The complaint does not allege that the plaintiff gave notice or made proof of loss as required by such standard policy, or at all. Such policy provides that no action thereon "shall be sustained * * * unless begun within 15 months after the commencement of the fire." This action was begun more than 2 years after the alleged fire. From the foregoing facts it clearly appears that the suit cannot be sustained as an action on the contract of insurance, and appellant does not contend that it can be so maintained. In his reply brief it is said:

"Respondents, in their argument, proceed upon the premises that this is an action for breach of contract. It is manifest, however, from the amended complaint, that the action is based solely upon fraud."

[4, 5] As stated, the complaint alleges an enforceable contract of insurance, under which the plaintiff, by proceeding in accordance with the terms thereof, as supplied by the statute, could have recovered against the defendant for the amount of his loss. The question is whether, having failed to assert his rights under a valid contract which was binding upon the defendant, the plaintiff may now sue for damages on the ground that, at the time of the execution of the contract, the defendant did not intend to perform its promise, even though such want of intention in no manner affected its liability. Section 1572 of the Civil Code provides that "a promise made without any intention of performing it" constitutes actual fraud within the meaning of the chapter in which that section appears. That chapter has to do with the freedom of consent of the parties to a contract. While, in a proper case, a defrauded party may rescind a contract or defend against its enforcement on the ground of the other party's fraud in its procurement without proving damage, it is axiomatic that damages cannot be recovered for a fraud which has caused no damage. "Generally speaking, plaintiff may recover when he shows that he has sustained some pecuniary damage or injury by reason of having been put in a position worse than he would have occupied if there had been no fraud, but he cannot recover where he does not show that he has sustained such damage or injury." 26 C. J. 1169. Notwithstanding the alleged fraudulent character of the promise, the defendant was legally bound thereby as fully as if it had been made in good faith, and the alleged fraud did not put the plaintiff "in a position worse than he would have occupied if there had been no fraud." If the plaintiff has suffered damage, it has been due to his failure to pursue the remedies open to him under the contract of insurance, and not to the alleged fraud of the defendant, which had no possible effect upon those remedies.

The judgment is affirmed.

DEE v. DEE. (Civ. 3370.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 17, 1927.

1. Divorce ⚭69—Unreasonable delay in commencing divorce action for desertion and neglect cannot be predicated on mere lapse of time, however long continued; "continuing offenses" (Civ. Code, § 125, and § 124, subd. 3).

Under Civ. Code, § 125, defining unreasonable delay in commencing divorce action, trial court erred in denying divorce for "willful desertion and willful neglect" on ground that there was unreasonable delay under section 124, subd. 3, in commencing action more than 20 years after desertion, since both willful desertion and willful neglect constitute "continuing offenses."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Continuing Offense.]

2. Divorce ⚭69—Wife's lack of funds held sufficient excuse for 20 years' delay in suing for divorce (Civ. Code, § 125).

Wife's being without funds with which to prosecute divorce action held, under facts and circumstances, to be sufficient excuse for 20 years' delay in prosecuting action, within Civ. Code, § 125.

3. Divorce ⚭154—Trial court cannot deny divorce, where corroborated evidence establishes willful desertion and willful neglect.

Trial court is not authorized to deny divorce, where evidence of plaintiff, adequately corroborated, establishes, beyond question, allegations of willful desertion and willful neglect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Gertrude Dee against Thomas R. Dee. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

W. P. Butcher, Jr., of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff, Gertrude Dee, from a judgment denying her an interlocutory decree of divorce from her husband Thomas R. Dee. These parties intermarried in the city of Chicago on the 8th day of June, 1897, and separated in Denver, Colo., on or about the 15th day of May, 1902, and there is no issue of said marriage and no community property. Mrs. Gertrude Dee commenced this action for divorce in the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara on the 8th day of February, 1924.

Three separate and distinct causes of action for divorce are alleged in the complaint, to wit, willful desertion, willful neglect, and habitual intemperance.

Personal service could not be had upon the defendant, Thomas R. Dee, and he was served by publication, for the time, and in the manner, prescribed by law, and made no appearance whatever in the action.

Under plaintiff's first cause of action the complaint alleges:

"That on or about the 15th day of May, 1902, the said defendant, Thomas R. Dee, willfully and without cause, deserted and abandoned plaintiff, and ever since has, and still continues, to willfully and without cause, desert and abandon said plaintiff, and to live separate and apart from her, without any just cause or any reason, and against her will."

In support of this cause of action the plaintiff testified that prior to the 15th day of May, 1902, she and her husband lived in Illinois, and her husband became addicted to the overindulgence in intoxicating liquors, to such an extent that he was unable to secure employment in said state, and they moved to Iowa. His intoxication continued, and then they moved to her people in Denver, Colo., and her husband still continued his overindulgence in intoxicating liquors, and on or about the 15th of May, 1902, left their home in Denver, without her knowledge, and she has not seen him since, and did not hear from him until about the time the present action was instituted (February 8, 1924), and that he has never offered to return to her. This testimony is fully corroborated by the testimony of plaintiff's mother.

"That said defendant, from the 8th day of June, 1897, up to and including the present date, has willfully neglected to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, he having at all times the ability so to do," etc.

In support of this cause of action plaintiff testified that by reason of the drunkenness and idleness of her husband he failed and neglected to provide her with the common necessities of life; that she was supported by her father and mother until she came to California, which was about eight years before the commencement of this action, and since that time she has supported herself, and that defendant has not contributed anything at all towards her support since his disappearance from Denver about the 15th of May, 1902, down to the time of the trial of this action in the court below. All of this testimony is also amply corroborated by the testimony of the mother of Mrs. Dee.

The trial court, after hearing all this evidence, found:

"That all of the allegations of the complaint are true, but that there was an unreasonable lapse of time before the commencement of the action, and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to an interlocutory decree of divorce, * * * and that the prayer of plaintiff's complaint for said interlocutory decree of divorce be, and the same is, hereby denied."

[1] We are of the opinion that the court erred in denying a divorce to plaintiff. The evidence is amply sufficient, if believed by the trial court, to support a decree of divorce upon the ground of both willful neglect and willful desertion, and the court, having found "all of the allegations of the complaint to be true," should have granted the plaintiff an interlocutory decree of divorce.

Subdivision 3 of section 124, Civil Code, provides that a divorce must be denied in actions on the grounds of willful neglect and willful desertion (among others), when there is an unreasonable lapse of time before the commencement of the action.

Section 125 of the same Code defines unreasonable lapse of time to be such a delay in commencing the action as establishing the presumption that there is connivance, collusion or condonation of the offense, or full acquiescence in the same, with intent to continue the marriage relation, notwithstanding the commission of such offense.

[2] None of these matters could exist in view of the facts alleged and proved by plaintiff against the defendant. Both willful desertion and willful neglect are continuing offenses. McMullin v. McMullin, 140 Cal. 112, 73 P. 808; Locke v. Locke, 153 Cal. 56, 94 P. 244. The testimony shows that defendant has never, after willfully deserting plaintiff in 1902, offered to return, and since that time and long prior thereto, and up to the time of the trial, had not provided anything towards her support. Therefore the status of the parties, at least from 1902 to the commencement of this action, has not changed. Furthermore, plaintiff testified that the reason she had not commenced this action sooner was because she was without funds with which to prosecute the action, which in itself would appear, under the facts and circumstances of this case, to be a sufficient excuse for the delay.

It is wholly unnecessary for us to decide whether there has been an unreasonable lapse of time in commencing the action for divorce upon the ground of habitual intemperance, for, as we have seen, the other two grounds have been fully established.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of the plaintiff, Gertrude Dee, and against the defendant, Thomas R. Dee, as prayed for in the complaint.

HANSEN v. HANSEN. (Civ. 3372.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 15, 1927.

1. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 184(6)—Question whether in given case grievous bodily injury or mental suffering has been inflicted on spouse seeking divorce is for trial court's determination.

Question whether in given case grievous bodily injury or mental suffering has been inflicted on spouse seeking divorce is question of fact for decision of trial court.

2. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 184(6)—Infliction of mental or physical suffering on wife by husband's alleged indulgence in filthy habits held question for trial court (Civ. Code, § 94).

In wife's action for divorce for cruel and inhuman conduct of husband, question whether acts and conduct of husband, alleged to have expectorated at table, walked about house in nude condition, indulged in filthy habits, and to have discouraged children's patriotism, occasioned wife grievous mental or physical pain or injury constituting cruel treatment, under Civ. Code, § 94, was for trial court.

3. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 108—Allegations of husband's filthy habits in home over long period, rendering wife's life intolerable, held to warrant introduction of testimony of acts complained of (Civ. Code, § 94).

Allegations in wife's divorce action that husband for long period rendered wife's life intolerable by filthy habits, in expectorating at table, walking about in nude condition, and discouraging children's patriotism, held to permit testimony as to alleged acts of cruelty, under Civ. Code, § 94.

4. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 127(4)—Corroboration of plaintiff seeking divorce for cruelty is sufficient if there is other testimony as to considerable number of material facts or evidence tending to confirm plaintiff's statements.

Where divorce is sought for cruel treatment, corroboration of plaintiff's testimony is sufficient if considerable number of important facts are testified to by other witnesses, or if other evidence tends to strengthen and confirm plaintiff's statements.

5. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 49(2)—Wife's submission to husband's ill treatment for four-year period held not "condonation" or acquiescence preventing divorce (Civ. Code, § 124, subd. 3, and §§ 125, 130).

That wife withstood husband's alleged ill treatment for over four years before bringing divorce suit held not to constitute "condonation" or acquiescence in husband's conduct, so as to forfeit rights of wife under Civ. Code, § 124, subd. 3, and sections 125, 130.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Condone—Condonation.]

6. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 69—Question whether lapse of time before commencement of suit is reasonable is for trial court (Civ. Code, § 124, subd. 3, and §§ 125, 130).

Question whether any lapse of time between acts constituting grounds for divorce and commencement of divorce suit is reasonable under Civ. Code, § 124, subd. 3, and sections 125, 130, is question for trial court.

7. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 184(10)—Findings in divorce suit supported by evidence are conclusive on appeal.

Findings of trial court in divorce suit where supported by evidence are conclusive on appeal.

8. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 27(7)—Alleged acts of husband in using sink and yard for toilet and expectorating at dinner table held not justifiable as mere personal habits preventing wife's divorce for cruel treatment (Civ. Code, § 94).

Alleged acts of husband in using yard and sink for toilet, expectorating at dinner table, and walking about house in nude condition, for which wife sought divorce for cruel treatment under Civ. Code, § 94, held not justifiable as mere traits of character and personal habits preventing divorce.

9. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 130—Wife's right to divorce for willful neglect held immaterial, where evidence supported finding of husband's extreme cruelty (Civ. Code, § 94).

Where evidence was sufficient in divorce action to support decree of divorce for extreme cruelty under Civ. Code, § 94, it was immaterial whether wife was also entitled to divorce for willful neglect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Lillias Jane Hansen against Peter Hansen for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. K. MacGowen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Oscar E. Winburn, of Watts, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant, Peter Hansen, from a judgment granting an interlocutory decree of divorce to plaintiff, Lillias Jane Hansen, upon the grounds of willful neglect and extreme cruelty.

These parties intermarried in Australia on September 24, 1913, and separated in California on September 25, 1923. Three children were born as the issue of said marriage, the custody of whom were awarded to the plaintiff.

Appellant contends that the acts alleged in the complaint are insufficient to constitute extreme cruelty.

The complaint, among other things, alleges:

"Plaintiff alleges that defendant, disregarding his marriage vow and his duty to and toward the plaintiff as his wife, has been for a period of several years last past guilty of extremely cruel and inhuman conduct to and toward the plaintiff, and in particulars as follows:

"That during a long period of time heretofore defendant has been so coarse, disgusting, and degrading in all personal, domestic, and sexual habits as to cause this plaintiff great mental suffering, physical pain, and much humiliation, and to such an extent as to render the life of plaintiff burdensome and her life with him intolerable.

"That defendant is coarse, filthy, and vulgar in his personal habits in that he has on several occasions and at many times expectorated at the dining table while eating his meals in company with plaintiff and members of the family, said defendant at such times and occasions using empty egg shells or dishes upon the table as receptacles for his expectorations, all of which were sickening, disgusting, and humiliating to plaintiff, and which caused her to become disgusted, sick, and humiliated.

"That defendant has a violent, harsh, and ungovernable temper, and constantly exercises a domineering and unreasonable attitude to and toward plaintiff, causing her to become nervous, sick, and humiliated.

"That on or about the 6th day of October, 1920, defendant, without any cause or reason and without the consent or knowledge of plaintiff, took the two oldest of said minor children and left them at a Chinaman's house at Prescott, Ariz., and refused to tell plaintiff where said children were or to allow or permit her to see said children, until plaintiff agreed to dismiss a certain action which she had theretofore filed against the defendant in the superior court of Los Angeles county, asking for a divorce from defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Defendant at said time told plaintiff that unless she dismissed said divorce action she would never see said minor children again; whereupon and acting in fear of said threat plaintiff did cause said action to be dismissed. Said conduct and words of defendant caused plaintiff great mental suffering and to become nervous and sick.

"That almost daily defendant walks around the family home of the parties herein in a nude condition in the presence and in view of plaintiff and all of the minor children of said parties, thereby causing plaintiff to become disgusted, sick, nervous, and humiliated.

"That defendant constantly teaches the said minor children to be unpatriotic, and has on three occasions within the past year burned and destroyed American flags which had come into the possession of said minor children, thereby causing plaintiff to become disgusted and humiliated and to suffer great mental anguish."

Section 94 of the Civil Code defines extreme cruelty to be "the wrongful infliction of grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, upon the other by one party to the marriage."

[1, 2] No arbitrary rule of law can be laid down as to what particular facts must be alleged and proven in order to justify a finding that the complaining party has suffered grievous bodily injury, or has undergone grievous mental suffering. A correct decision must always depend upon the sound sense and judgment of the trial court. "Whether in any given case there has been inflicted * * * 'grievous mental suffering' or grievous bodily injury, is a * * * question of fact, to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party." Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 P. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660; Fleming v. Fleming, 95 Cal. 430, 30 P. 566, 29 Am. St. Rep. 124; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 P. 298; MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 102 P. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45; Donnelly v. Donnelly, 26 Cal. App. 577, 147 P. 582; Perkins v. Perkins, 29 Cal. App. 68, 154 P. 483; Maloolf v. Maloolf, 175 Cal. 571, 166 P. 330; McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176, 190 P. 460; Crum v. Crum, 57 Cal. App. 539, 207 P. 506.

[3] Therefore, in the case at bar, whether or not the acts and conduct of appellant inflicted grievous mental suffering, or grievous bodily injury, or both, upon the respondent, was a question of fact for the determination of the trial court from all the facts and circumstances in the case. No demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and no objection to the introduction of evidence thereunder was made by appellant, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The allegations and specifications of cruelty set forth in the complaint are sufficient as a basis for the introduction of testimony of the alleged acts of cruelty. 8 Cal. Jur. 705, and cases cited.

Appellant also contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. There is no merit whatever in this contention. The testimony of the plaintiff and respondent follows very closely the allegations of the complaint and reveals a course of conduct on the part of the appellant so immoral, degrading and reprehensible and habits so filthy as to shock the sensibilities of any decent man or woman, much less a lady of modesty and refinement, as the record shows respondent to be.

It will serve no useful purpose to recite all the evidence in detail; suffice it to state some of the acts and conduct of appellant, embraced within and forming part of his course of conduct towards respondent, which continued regularly and continuously for more than four years immediately preceding their separation, viz.: It was the practice of the defendant, while eating his meals, in company with his wife and children, to expectorate in egg shells and dishes; he would take his false teeth out of his mouth and lick them while he was still eating; he would use the sink for a toilet, and also use the back yard for a toilet in daylight in the view and presence of his children and neighbors; he would go around the house in the presence of his children, guests, and wife in a nude condition; he would sleep at night with his wife, absolutely naked, refusing to wear any night clothes of any kind, and would keep his wife awake at nights and pinch her from the thighs down, making her black and blue, because she insisted on wearing a nightgown. This practice of pinching his wife was a common occurrence, and from which she suffered considerable pain. All these acts continued for about four years, growing more intolerable as time went on. Mrs. Hansen further testified that appellant's treatment of her at night became so unbearable that she was compelled to get out of bed a number of times and lie on the floor to try to get rest and sleep.

The proof also shows that the appellant would go out in the yard in a nude condition in the middle of the day and take a bath at a pump in plain view of the children and neighbors, in South Pasadena.

The evidence also shows that the appellant was unpatriotic in the extreme. His three children were given three American flags; he took one of the flags and burned it up and the others were taken from the children, and he went to the lady who gave his children the flags and told her "not to give the children American flags—that he was not an American and did not want his children to have American flags." He would stop the children from singing patriotic songs they had learned at school, and refused to let them salute the American flag. Many other details were given of the conduct and actions of the appellant, equally revolting and disgusting. The appellant complained that his wife would not go with him where he could get work, but the proof shows that they moved 14 times within two years and five months.

[4] Complaint is also made by appellant that the alleged acts of cruelty testified to by respondent are not sufficiently corroborated. The fact is that practically all of the acts and conduct of cruelty are fully corroborated by other witnesses, or by facts and circumstances. Indeed, the corroboration is more complete than is usually possible in this kind of action. It is, however, wholly unnecessary that all of the acts of cruelty be corroborated, for the law is well settled that where a divorce is sought on the ground of extreme cruelty, consisting of successive acts of ill treatment, as is the case here, it is not necessary that there should be direct testimony of other witnesses to every act sworn to by the plaintiff, but it is sufficient corroboration if a considerable number of important and material facts are testified to by other witnesses, or if there is other evidence, circumstantial or direct, which strongly tends to strengthen and confirm the statements of plaintiff. Andrews v. Andrews, supra; Crum v. Crum, supra; Perkins v. Perkins, supra; Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 242, 82 P. 967.

The trial judge had the parties before him, and thus having the opportunity of judging of the degree of intelligence, refinement, and delicacy of sentiment possessed by respondent, concluded that the acts and course of conduct of appellant willfully inflicted upon her grievous mental suffering, as well as grievous bodily injury, to the extent that it constituted extreme cruelty. A careful examination of the rather voluminous record convinces us that the trial court was fully warranted in so concluding; in fact, there is no other reasonable deduction that could be drawn from all of the evidence in the case.

[5] Appellant also contends that an unreasonable lapse of time has intervened between the commission of the acts of cruelty and the commencement of this action, and for this reason alone insists that the judgment should be reversed. This contention is devoid of any merit whatever. The testimony shows that appellant has been guilty of serious reprehensible conduct towards the respondent continuously for more than four years immediately preceding their separation and the filing of the complaint in this action. In fact, the respondent testified that appellant pinched her legs from the thighs down, to such an extent that her limbs were black and blue, on the very last night that she lived with him. Appellant would have us hold that because his wife had been physically able to, and did withstand his ill treatment for more than four years, she has thereby condoned or acquiesced in it, and has forfeited her right to obtain a divorce upon that ground. Certainly, such is not the law. Mrs. Hansen explained why she had endured this cruel treatment for so long, and said it was on account of the children, and in the hope that conditions would be better, but instead of getting better they continued to get worse, until she could endure his unjustifiable treatment and conduct no longer and left him, and immediately instituted this action for divorce.

[6, 7] One of the main objects of the provisions of section 124, subd. 3, and sections 125 and 130 of the Civil Code, is to prevent collusion and fraud, but a reading of the testimony in this case certainly dispels any intimation that there has been any collusion, or any condonation of, or acquiescence in, the conduct of appellant on the part of Mrs. Hansen. Furthermore, the question whether any lapse of time is reasonable or not is one which the trial court must determine, and the trial court in this case determined there was no unreasonable lapse of time, and, there being ample evidence to support such a conclusion, it is conclusive on appeal. 9 Cal. Jur. 692.

[8] Counsel for appellant, while apparently admitting the truth of the charges made against his client, attempts to justify them upon the ground that such acts should be termed "mere traits of character" and "personal habits," and, not being directed towards respondent with a malevolent motive, are therefore insufficient to constitute cruelty. Appellant lays great stress upon the case of Dahnke v. Dahnke, 55 Cal. App. 13, 202 P. 894, as supporting the above contention. A mere casual reading of that case will show that it lends no support whatever to the contention of counsel. In that case Henry Dahnke was at the time of his marriage inflicted with a loathsome, incurable skin disease, of which he did not acquaint his wife before their marriage. Mrs. Dahnke, after obtaining this knowledge, lived and cohabited with Dahnke for seven years, and the court found that the disease was not contagious and did not affect Mrs. Dahnke in any way, and that there was no intention on the part of Dahnke to wrongfully inflict any suffering upon his wife. On the contrary, in the case at bar, the evidence shows, and the court found, that the acts and conduct of Peter Hansen were willful and deliberate and wrongfully caused respondent great mental suffering and physical pain and humiliation, etc. It could hardly be seriously contended that appellant's filthy habits in using the yard and sink for a toilet, expectorating at the dinner table, etc., were "mere traits of character" or "mere personal habits" of a normal person. Such conduct and such habits show a lack of character and a lack of common decency.

[9] It is further contended by appellant that there is no sufficient corroboration of the testimony of Mrs. Hansen that appellant was guilty of willful neglect. We need not dwell at length upon this cause of action. As we have already stated, respondent sought a divorce upon two grounds, willful neglect and extreme cruelty, and, as we have seen, the evidence is ample to support a decree of divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty, it therefore becomes immaterial in this case whether or not she has also proven a sufficient cause for divorce upon the ground of willful neglect. We might add, however, that we have examined the testimony offered in corroboration of the testimony of Mrs. Hansen on the ground of willful neglect, and, while such testimony is not as strong and complete as it is in support of the cause of action on extreme cruelty, it is, nevertheless, in our opinion, sufficient.

We find no reason for disturbing the judgment of the trial court. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

McCONNELL v. REDD. (Civ. 5784.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 17, 1927.

1. Sales $\S$ 454—Contract held one of "conditional sale," not reserving title merely as security, though authorizing seller to apply proceeds of resale toward payment of balance due.

Contract retaining title to property sold until fully paid for held one of "conditional sale," not of absolute sale with reservation of title merely as security, though providing that seller might apply proceeds of resale on buyer's default toward payment of balance due, in view of other provisions authorizing seller to retake property and terminate contract or to bring action for price.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conditional Sale.]

2. Sales $\S$ 450—Outstanding characteristic of "conditional sale" is reservation of title, which authorizes seller to retake possession on default, notwithstanding alternative remedy provided.

The outstanding characteristic of a "conditional sale" is reservation of title by seller, who is entitled under such provision to retake or recover possession, if buyer fails to pay price or installment thereof, though contract provides for alternative remedy of resale and application of proceeds toward payment of balance due.

3. Sales $\S$ 464—Law favors conditional sales, and courts should afford every protection to upholding their conditions.

The law of California favors conditional sales, and it should be the policy of the court to afford every protection to upholding their conditions.

4. Sales $\S$ 477(1)—Buyer suggesting and accepting substitution, and making required payments until default, cannot set up abandonment of written contract and making of oral one.

Buyer of ice machine, who suggested installation of different cooler than that contracted for, accepted substituted cooler, and made payments provided for until default, cannot raise objection, in claim and delivery, that written contract was abandoned by parties and oral one increasing price entered into at time of substitution.

5. Sales $\S$ 479(9)—Seller reserving title until full payment held entitled to relief in claim and delivery without fixing time for buyer to avoid foreclosure; "forfeiture."

Seller held entitled to specific relief in claim and delivery, on buyer's default in payment of installment on price of ice machine, without fixing time in which buyer might avoid foreclosure; rules as to "forfeiture," which involves both idea of losing property by delinquent party and transfer thereof to another without delinquent's consent, being inapplicable to question of right to possession on buyer's default under contract reserving title in seller until full payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Forfeiture.]

6. Sales $\S$ 479(6)—Buyer refusing to pay balance, frequently demanded, cannot complain of delay in bringing claim and delivery.

Buyer refusing to pay balance due under conditional contract, though frequently demanded, cannot be heard to complain of seller's delay in bringing action in claim and delivery for property sold.

7. Sales  477(6)—Accepting payments on installments does not waive provision making time of essence, nor invalidate any part, of conditional sale contract.

Accepting payments on account of installments on conditional sale contract does not waive provision making time of essence, nor invalidate any part, of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by George McConnell against Joseph Redd. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel Rygel, of Oakland (George M. Naus, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

L. L. Steele, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action in claim and delivery. The complaint, in substance, alleges ownership in plaintiff of a certain ice machine, cooler, and equipment, of the value of $400, wrongful possession and detention by defendant, and a demand for delivery. The prayer is for possession of the property, or, in case delivery cannot be had, for its value together with damages. The answer denies ownership in plaintiff; alleges the value of the property to be $875; admits possession; alleges ownership in defendant; and denies wrongful detention. Briefly stated, the facts show that plaintiff was engaged in the business of selling and installing ice machines, coolers, and equipment. Defendant conducted a dairy farm at Newark, Cal. He was desirous of obtaining an ice machine for the cooling of his product. Accordingly he entered into a written contract with plaintiff, wherein and whereby plaintiff agreed to install at defendant's ranch a certain character of ice machine, cooler, and necessary equipment, for which defendant agreed to pay the sum of $875, according to the terms and conditions expressed in such contract. Among the conditions was one which provided that title to the property should remain in plaintiff until fully paid for. In this connection the contract further provided that the institution of an action for the price should not be considered a waiver of the reservation of title. Upon default in payment of any part of the purchase price the parties agreed that the entire balance should forthwith become due and payable, plaintiff, in that event, being given the right to retake possession of the property, either with or without resort to legal process, and to retain all amounts theretofore paid on account thereof, and either terminate the contract, or at his option resell the property as a whole or in parts, either at public or private sale. The net amounts so realized were to be applied toward the unpaid portion of the purchase price, defendant to be liable for any deficiency, or upon such default plaintiff was given the option to recover from defendant the entire unpaid portion of the purchase price. Time was made of the essence of the contract.

Plaintiff, in accordance with the contract so entered into, proceeded on May 9, 1924, to install the machinery as agreed, but during the course of the installation defendant informed plaintiff he did not desire the particular cooler the contract provided for, but one of a different make. Plaintiff agreed to provide the desired cooler upon condition that defendant pay plaintiff the sum of $70 in addition to the sum specified in the contract, which defendant agreed to do. The substituted cooler, together with the other machinery, was installed, this item being the only deviation from the written contract above referred to. The additional cost of the cooler brought the contract price to the sum of $945, and of this sum plaintiff received of defendant, through one E. S. Babue, of the Producer's Milk Company, to which firm defendant sold his milk, the sum of $728.25, thus leaving a balance of $216.75, with interest, as provided in the contract. Payments were made regularly by Babue on behalf of defendant up to the time when the amount indicated was paid, at which time defendant instructed Babue not to make any further payments on account of the contract, giving as a reason that he would take care of the balance himself. Although frequent demands were made upon defendant for the balance due, he refused to pay the same. On December 8, 1925, plaintiff commenced this action, claiming the property. It was taken possession of by the sheriff of Alameda county under the provisions of sections 509, 511, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and later delivered to plaintiff, who still holds possession of the same. Under these facts the trial court found plaintiff to be the owner of the property, and judgment was rendered accordingly, from which judgment this appeal is taken. As grounds for reversal it is urged that the trial court erred in finding plaintiff to be the owner, and likewise erred in making the judgment absolute, instead of fixing a day within which appellant should pay the balance found to be due upon an accounting, or be foreclosed of his interest in the property.

[1] In support of this claim it is contended that the contract was not one of conditional sale, but, on the contrary, was absolute with reservation of title merely by way of security. In support of this claim it is argued that the contract, containing as it does a provision that, in the event of default on the part of the buyer, the seller may apply the proceeds of any resale toward the payment of the unpaid portion of the purchase price, the buyer then to be liable for any balance still remaining to be paid, prevents the reservation of title from being an absolute one and turns the retention of title into a retention by way of security merely. That this being so, the sale was not a conditional one, and the buyer became the owner, and the seller was in the position of a mere mortgagee, for which reason the court erred in finding and adjudging ownership in the plaintiff, and further erred in not giving the buyer a definite time in which to perform. We are cited to the case of Atkinson v. Japink, 186 Mich. 335, 152 N. W. 1079, as supporting this contention. Even conceding this case to be authority for the construction claimed, we do not think that the provision in any manner changed the character of the contract. As was said in Studebaker v. Witcher, 44 Nev. 376, 204 P. 502, the case relied on is against the weight of authority from other jurisdictions (see cases there cited). As above indicated, there were other provisions in the contract relating to the security of the seller. He had the right thereunder, in the event of default, to (1) retake the property and terminate the contract; (2) to retake possession, resell the same, and apply the proceeds received toward the payment of any balance due; or (3) to bring an action for the recovery of the purchase price. The case does not present the situation where a seller has exercised an option given him to declare the whole of the purchase price due and sue for the amount rather than for the recovery of the property itself. In such a case he may be said to have confirmed the title in the purchaser. Here plaintiff seeks to recover property, the title to which he has never divested himself. The mere right given to plaintiff under the contract to conclude all sums to be due, when considered with the provision relating to the retention of title until payment was made, does not in any manner affect the character of the instrument which is one of conditional sale. The clause is in complete harmony with the condition reserving title in plaintiff.

[2] The outstanding characteristic of a conditional sale is the reservation of title by the seller. Under such a provision the seller is entitled to retake or recover possession of the property if the buyer fails to pay the purchase price or an installment thereof. Having defaulted, whatever rights the buyer may have are terminated, and, by virtue of the title which the seller has retained, he is entitled to recover possession, and the mere fact that the contract provides for an alternative remedy in no manner qualifies or affects that right. Nor does it change or alter the character of the instrument as here claimed. Bice v. Arnold, 75 Cal. App. 629-635, and cases cited, 243 P. 468; Silverstin v. Kohler & Chase, 181 Cal. 51, 183 P. 451, 9 A. L. R. 1177.

[3] The law of California favors conditional sales, and it should be the policy of the courts to afford every protection to upholding their conditions. Marker v. Williams, 39 Cal. App. 674, 179 P. 735. In clear and unambiguous language the contract here involved provides that the title to the property shall remain in the conditional vendor until the purchase price shall have been paid. This plain and definite provision is controlling. Defendant agreed to the terms and should be made to abide them. The contract amounts to nothing more than a conditional sales contract, and it is not altered or changed by reason of the alternative remedy name. Practically the same provisions were contained in the contract under consideration in Bice v. Arnold, supra, where the contract was held to be one of conditional sale.

[4] Nor is there any merit in the further claim that the written contract was abandoned by the parties and an oral one entered into at the time there was a substitution of the cooler. No such contention was made under the pleadings or at the trial nor at any other time. The change of this portion of the plant was made at defendant's own suggestion; he accepted the same and made the payments provided for under the contract up to the time he defaulted. Under these circumstances, he is in no position to raise such objection at this time. The objection is without merit.

[5] The same may be said of the claim that plaintiff had no right to specific relief without fixing a time in which defendant might avoid foreclosure. The rules as to forfeiture have no application to the question of the right to the possession of property. Forfeiture involves both the idea of losing property by a delinquent party and the transfer of it to another without the consent of the delinquent. Here no ownership was transferred, for plaintiff had never parted with his title. Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 598; Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 476, 56 P. 339.

[6, 7] To the suggestion that delay in the bringing of the action has affected plaintiff's rights, it is sufficient to say that this is a matter defendant should not be heard to complain of. Accepting payments upon account of installments upon conditional sales contracts does not waive the provision making time of the essence of the contract, nor does it invalidate any part of the contract. Pacific Finance Co. v. Pierce, 48 Cal. App. 601, 191 P. 1115; Los Angeles Furniture Co. v. Hansen, 46 Cal. App. 5, 188 P. 292.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re BARREIRO'S ESTATE. (Civ. 5834.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 16, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1928.

1. Husband and wife ⚡255—Whether corporate stock is separate or community property held to depend on character of realty with which husband purchased it.

Whether corporate stock, purchased by deceased husband, is community property or separate property, held determinable by separate or community character of realty with which stock was purchased.

2. Husband and wife ⚡262(1)—Buildings erected on husband's separate realty during marriage held not presumptively community property.

Improvements, consisting of buildings erected during marriage, on land owned by husband at time of marriage, and continuously thereafter, until transferred to corporation for capital stock, held not presumptively community property, value of which should be included in that of widow's portion of such stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. B. Andrews, Judge.

Petition by the divorced wife of Benigno Barreiro, deceased, for a partial distribution of the estate. From a decree of partial distribution, the executor and children of deceased appeal. Modified, and affirmed as modified.

Wright & McKee and Lewis J. Utt, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Herman Freese and Stephen Connell, both of San Diego, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This appeal is from a decree of partial distribution by the three minor children of the deceased, and by the executor of the last will and testament of Benigno Barreiro, deceased. The respondent is the mother of the children and the divorced wife of decedent. She petitioned the court for a partial distribution of the estate, which the court ordered. By the will of decedent all of his estate was devised and bequeathed to the three children. The respondent asserted her right to take one-half of the estate, claiming that the property was the community property of herself and deceased. By stipulation of all the parties all the property of the estate, other than 1,000 shares of the capital stock of a Mexican corporation known as the Compania de Inversiones de la Baja California, S. A., appraised at $500,000, was expressly excluded from the scope of the application and the hearing. The court found that, of the 1,000 shares, one-fifth, or $100,000 worth, was separate property, and that the remainder was community property. In arriving at this result, the court found that two parcels of real property which had been owned by the deceased at the time of his marriage, and continuously thereafter until transferred to the company, in exchange for a portion of the capital stock, had, during the marriage relation, been improved with buildings, and that, due to the fact that "no evidence or proof" was "adduced establishing or showing that said improvements were made or paid for with the separate funds of said decedent," the improvements were presumptively community property. The improvements so found to partake of the character of community were valued at the sum of $55,000.

Appellant contend that the improvements as a matter of law constitute a part of the separate estate of decedent, and that this court should either modify the decree by adding to the sum of $100,000 the sum of $55,000 or instruct the trial court to amend the conclusions of law and the decree to the same effect.

[1, 2] Inasmuch as appellants assert that fixtures attached to the separate real property take on the character of the land, and become separate estate also, the respondent argues that they are not seeking to recover any part of the realty, but only seeking to have distributed to the widow one-half of the portion of the capital stock of the company found to be community; that this proportion should be fixed in accordance with the value of the separate and community estate turned over to the company for the capital stock. This argument of respondent is unsound, for the reason that the character of the capital stock, whether separate or community, is determined by the character of the property which purchased the stock. We do not mean to say that a fund might not be traced through this medium to its destination, and the character of the property finally acquired be determined according to the facts, because such is not the case before us, but only that in the instant case no character is given to the property by proof other than that the land was separate property. We therefore have but one question to settle: Were the improvements presumptively community property? In McKay's Community Property, § 347, we read:

"Such improvements are incorporated into it" (the land) "and follow the title to it. They are not a thing apart, nor does the making of them create any form of title or interest in the land. This is the rule of both the civil and the common law. The character of the land as separate or common determines the ownership of the improvements."

The claim of respondent is effectually concluded by the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Shaw v. Bernal, 163 Cal. 262, 267, 124 P. 1012, 1013:

"If we assume that all the money expended in constructing the house on this land was community property, it still remains that both the land and the building constructed thereon constituted separate property of the wife. A similar question was early decided by this court. The conveyance of land purchased with community funds had been by express direction of the husband, made to the wife, with the intent on his part to make to her a gift of the property. Subsequently the husband from community funds constructed a dwelling house thereon. The court said: "The question is, who was the owner of the house when it was built under those circumstances?" It admits of only one answer—the owner of the lot was also the owner of the house. It formed a part of the real estate, and the title to the home is necessarily included in the title to the lot on which it is erected, in the absence of an agreement sufficient to pass the title to the house alone. Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. 440, 448 (89 Am. Dec. 195). This holding is in accord with the general rule stated in 21 Cyc. 1648, as follows: "Improvements made during marriage on the separate property of either husband or wife, although with community funds, will as a general rule belong to the spouse owning the separate property." An agreement between the parties may produce a different result as is implied in the above quotation from Peck v. Brummagin; creditors of the husband may perhaps establish a claim to improvements so constructed where they can show that the expenditure thereof was a fraud upon them (see Maddox v. Summerlin, 92 Tex. 483 [49 S. W. 1033, 50 S. W. 567]); the wife might reach as community property a building erected by the husband from community funds on his separate property, for the very purpose of fraudulently depriving her of her interest therein (see Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 216 [73 Am. Dec. 533]); but it is clearly the rule that where a husband deliberately constructs from community funds a building upon the separate property of his wife, in the absence of any sufficient agreement or undertaking to the contrary, as between him and her the title to the building follows the title to the land and is separate property of the wife, and neither he nor the marital partnership has any title to any portion of the property, either land or building. The authorities hold that the most that the marital partnership may acquire under such circumstances, if anything, is a right to reimbursement to the extent of the value added to the property by the improvements. Whether the right to reimbursement exists in such cases is a question not at all involved in this proceeding and we express no opinion thereon. In support of the views we have expressed are the following authorities, in addition to those already cited: McKay on Community Property, § 249; Ballinger on Community Property, note to section 19; 6 American and English Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) 324; Rice v. Rice, 21 Tex. 58; Maddox v. Summerlin, 92 Tex. 483 [49 S. W. 1033, 50 S. W. 567]; Humphreys v. Newman, 51 Me. 40." (Italics ours.)

To the same effect see Carlson v. Carlson, 10 Cal. App. 300, 101 P. 923, and Smith v. Smith, 47 Cal. App. 650, 653, 191 P. 60.

It follows, since there is no question of fact to be determined, that the decree should be modified by adding to the separate property the sum of $55,000, and subtracting a like amount from the community property, and the trial court is instructed to modify its decree accordingly, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

FRANTZ v. MALLIN. (Civ. 5972.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 16, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1928.

1. Limitation of actions ⇨66(6)—Cause of action against seller agreeing to repurchase stock and pay cash therefor, on or before date specified, accrued at date mentioned without necessity of demand (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1).

Under contract by which seller of shares of stock agreed to repurchase the stock and pay $2,500 "in cash therefor on or before August 4, A. D. 1920," no demand or notice on seller was necessary, and statute of limitations commenced to run against buyer under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, from date mentioned in contract, as cause of action accrued at that date.

2. Limitation of actions ⇨2(1)—Law of forum controls in determining whether cause of action is barred.

When statute of limitations is pleaded, law of forum governs as to limitation as against law of place where contract is made or performable.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨177(2)—Where complaint shows on its face that period of statute has expired, plaintiff must allege such other facts as will prevent running of statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1).

Under complaint for recovery on contract showing on its face that more than four years have elapsed, plaintiff must allege such other facts as will prevent running of statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1.

4. Limitation of actions ⇨84(2)—Statute suspending limitation against defendant out of state applies only in case of physical absence, irrespective of residence (Code Civ. Proc. § 351).

Code Civ. Proc. § 351, providing that action may be brought within statutory period after defendant's return, if he is out of state at time cause of action accrues, relates only to physical absence from, or presence in, state, and involves no question of residence.

5. Limitation of actions ⇨179(1)—Complaint alleging that defendant was at all times resident of another state held demurrable for failure to avoid statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1; § 351).

In action for breach of contract to repurchase stock, complaint alleging defendant's agreement to pay "in cash therefor on or before August 4, A. D. 1920," and "that defendant is a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal., and during all the time herein mentioned said defendant was a resident of the state of Colorado," held demurrable under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, as showing on its face expiration of four-year limitation period, without alleging facts sufficient to suspend statute for defendant's absence from state under section 351.

6. Limitation of actions — 191—Proposed amendment to complaint alleging defendant had not been continuous resident of state for four years held demurrable for failure to avoid statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1; § 351).

In action for breach of defendant's contract to repurchase stock at date over four years previous, proposed amendment to complaint alleging that defendant had not been continuous resident of California for period of four years, and "did not take up his residence in California until long after the first of the year 1921," held subject to demurrer for failure to avoid bar of statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1), as defendant must have been absent from state in order to suspend running of statute under section 351.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by J. H. Frantz against H. J. MalLEN. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Ballreich, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles (B. L. Herlihy, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

KING, Presiding Justice pro tem. Appeal from judgment of dismissal upon sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend.

The complaint filed December 17, 1924, alleges that "defendant is a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal., and that during all the time herein mentioned said defendant was a resident of the state of Colorado, and during said time the plaintiff was, and still is, a resident of said state of Colorado."

It then goes on to allege that plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement in Colorado, set out in full in the complaint, by which in consideration for the purchase of certain shares of stock by plaintiff from defendant for $2,000, defendant agreed to purchase said stock from plaintiff, "and pay him $2,500 in cash therefor on or before August 4, A. D. 1920." If on or before August 4, 1920, defendant offered to pay plaintiff $2,500, and plaintiff refused, defendant not to be under any obligation to buy it. Plaintiff bought and paid for the stock.

The complaint then alleges that a week or two prior to August 4, 1920, desiring to turn the stock back and receive the $2,500, plaintiff inquired as to defendant's whereabouts, and learned he was in Europe; that defendant never offered to buy back the stock; that in the fall of 1920, upon defendant's return from Europe, plaintiff demanded the buying back of the stock by defendant, who refused, and still refuses. Soon after this demand defendant left Colorado, and plaintiff "knew not of his residence until some few months since, when he learned that he was in Los Angeles county, Cal." Judgment is prayed for $2,500, with interest at 8 per cent.

A demurrer was interposed upon the general ground of insufficiency, lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and setting up subdivision 1 of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure, as a bar. The demurrer was argued January 22, 1925, and January 23d it was sustained without leave to amend.

February 16, 1925, plaintiff filed a notice of motion for leave to amend, to be heard February 20th, specifying that he would move to strike out of the court's order the words "without leave to amend," and accompanying the notice with a copy of the proposed amendment, which alleged, upon information and belief, that defendant had not been a continuous resident of California for a period of four years, and "did not take up his residence in California till long after the first of the year 1921"; that the contract sued on was not at the commencement of the action, or now, barred by the statute of Colorado, which provides a six-year limitation period.

This motion was denied March 16, 1925, and March 20, 1925, an order was made dismissing the action. Plaintiff appeals.

Appellant attacks the ruling on the demurrer, which was doubtless based on the plea of the statute of limitations. He contends that no cause of action arose until demand was made; that defendant having become a resident of California, even if the California four-year period prevails, yet, the complaint not showing on its face that defendant has been a resident of California for four years, this period has not yet run.

[1] The contract plainly provides that defendant will purchase the stock from the plaintiff and pay him "in cash therefor on or before August 4, A. D. 1920." It does not call for a demand or a notice, and none was necessary. The defendant's agreement was to be performed on or before a definite date, and on that date the statute began to run.

The complaint in no place states that defendant is, or ever was, within the state of California, except possibly by inference from the allegation on information and belief "that the defendant is a resident of Los Angeles county, state of California," and even this is negated by the allegation in the same paragraph—also on information and belief—"that during all the time herein mentioned said defendant was a resident of the state of Colorado."

The complaint also contains a statement that "some few months since he (plaintiff) learned that he (defendant) was in Los Angeles county, Cal."

The only other statement as to the whereabouts of defendant at any time from August 4, 1920, to date of the commencement of the action is an allegation that defendant was not in Colorado "on said date and for many weeks prior and subsequent thereto," and a further allegation that during the fall of 1920 defendant returned from Europe, presumably to Colorado, where plaintiff demanded payment, which was refused, and "soon after the demand above set out the defendant again left the state of Colorado."

[2] Manifestly lex fori governs when the statute of limitations is pleaded, and, unless something is pleaded in the complaint to toll the running of the statute, his demand was barred four years from August 4, 1920, or under appellant's contention, four years from "the fall of 1920," when demand was made, for four years had elapsed before December 17, 1924, when the complaint was filed.

A very clear discussion of the law of the forum is contained in a note in 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 658, where this language is used:

"In the absence of a local statute of the forum changing the rule, it is established by the overwhelming weight of authority that the limitation of time for bringing the action upon a contract depends upon the law of the forum, and not upon the law of the place where the contract was made or where it is performable.

"In other words, the question of limitation is governed by the law of the forum rather than by the law of the place to which the contract is properly subject, so far as matters of substance are concerned. * * * An action upon a foreign contract cannot be maintained if it would be barred by the statute of limitations of the forum, although not yet barred by the foreign law."

[3] Appellant very earnestly contends "that the four-year statute of California was not available to the defendant, unless it appeared on the face of the complaint that he had been a continuous resident of this state for the full period of four years."

[4] In this he is in error. The face of the complaint showing, as it does, that the four-year period has elapsed, plaintiff must allege such other facts as will prevent the running of the statute. Section 351, Code of Civil Procedure, relied on by appellant, provides that the action may be brought within the statutory period after defendant's return, if he is out of the state at the time the cause of action accrues, and that his departure from the state after a cause of action accrues prevents the statute from running during his absence.

[5] It will be noted that this section refers solely to the physical absence from, or presence in, the state by the defendant. No question of residence is involved. Hence the allegation of the complaint that defendant is a resident of Colorado, or that he is a resident of Los Angeles, does not in any way tend to show that he is or has been, in the words of our statute, "out of," or departed from, the state.

The case of Dougall v. Schulenberg, 101 Cal. 156, 35 P. 635, cited by appellant, clearly states as quoted in his brief: "The statute only commenced to run in their favor when they came to this state," and again: "Deducting the period during which the defendant was absent, he had not been in this state two years," etc. These quotations do not justify counsel's deduction that the full term of two years' residence was the question.

So in the case of McKee v. Dodd, 152 Cal. 637, 93 P. 854, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 780, 125 Am. St. Rep. 82, cited, the court referred to the fact that "the total length of his stay in this state aggregated less than two years"—not "lived in California" as argued by counsel.

There is nothing in the complaint whatever to show that the defendant had not been physically within the state of California the full statutory period of four years, and, the complaint plainly showing that this period had elapsed, the demurrer was correctly sustained.

[6] Even if appellant's motion to amend had been granted, the complaint would still have been vulnerable to the same attack, and the motion was properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

86 Cal. App. 768
PEOPLE v. LOOMIS. (Cr. 991.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 16, 1927.

1. Homicide $\S$ 244(1)—Evidence that defendant shot victim while pursuing him held to sustain conviction for manslaughter.

In murder prosecution, evidence that defendant pursued deceased, and inflicted fatal wound at end of pursuit, and at no time after beginning of pursuit was victim in position menacing defendant, held to sustain conviction for manslaughter.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 823(9)—Instruction on presumption of innocence, obtaining until overcome by satisfactory evidence, held not error, when construed with charge on reasonable doubt.

In murder prosecution, instruction that defendant in criminal charge is by law presumed to be innocent until contrary is satisfactorily proven by competent evidence held not error, when viewed with remainder of charge that guilt must be established beyond reasonable doubt, and to moral certainty, and burden of proof thereof is on the people.

3. Criminal law ☞811(5)—Instruction that jury weighing testimony could consider witnesses' demeanor, interest, consistency, and recollection of facts held not error as singling out testimony.

In murder prosecution, instruction that jury, in weighing testimony of witnesses, could consider their demeanor, their interest in result of trial, how far their testimony appeared consistent or was contradicted by other testimony, and whether witnesses' recollection was clear and distinct, held not error as singling out testimony.

4. Homicide ☞287—Instruction as to defendant taking law in hands to avenge grievance held not error.

In murder prosecution, evidence of defendant and his wife that defendant killed deceased, after learning of his illicit relations with defendant's wife, held proper foundation for instruction as to defendant's taking law in his own hands to avenge real or fancied grievance.

5. Criminal law ☞1173(2)—Refusal to instruct, if juror was not convinced of guilt, to adhere until convinced beyond doubt, held not to require reversal.

In murder prosecution, it was not reversible error to refuse defendant's instruction that, if any juror, after deliberating on evidence, was of opinion defendant was not proved guilty by evidence to moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt, he should vote for acquittal, and adhere thereto until convinced beyond reasonable doubt he was wrong.

6. Criminal law ☞1186(4)—Misconduct of district attorney in asking objectionable questions held not reversible error, in view of evidence of guilt and verdict of manslaughter (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In murder prosecution, where, under evidence, jury was not warranted in returning verdict of acquittal, and in returning conviction of manslaughter utmost leniency was extended defendant, misconduct of district attorney in asking objectionable questions to defendant and his wife as witnesses as to her operations, venereal disease, and parentage of her child held not ground for reversal, and, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, the appellate court cannot interfere.

7. Homicide ☞116(4)—To justify taking life, circumstances must create reasonable cause for belief of actual peril.

It is not enough that defendant may believe in existence of peril in order to justify taking of human life, but circumstances must be such as to give reasonable cause for belief.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Frank Loomis was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Foltz, Rendon & Wallace, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The appellant was convicted of manslaughter upon an indictment charging him with the crime of murder, in that he did, on or about the 14th day of April, 1927, in the county of San Joaquin, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, kill and murder one E. J. Wilson. This appeal is prosecuted by the appellant from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial and the judgment of conviction entered upon the verdict of the jury finding him guilty of manslaughter, as herein stated.

The transcript shows that the appellant Loomis and the deceased E. J. Wilson were ranchers living some three or four miles apart in the agricultural section of San Joaquin county lying northeast of the town of Ripon; that Loomis and Wilson had resided in that neighborhood at least seven years previous to the 14th day of April, 1927; that the appellant and the deceased had been acquainted for that period of time, and had exchanged a limited number of calls or visits; that some two years previous to the 14th day of April, 1927, the wife of the deceased had died, and that thereafter Wilson made more frequent visits at the home of the appellant. The evidence shows that the deceased, for a period covering about six months prior to April 14, 1927, had several times come to the home of the appellant and taken the wife of the appellant out to card parties and other places of amusement. The evidence does not show just how many times the deceased had taken Mrs. Loomis out to different places of amusement, but it does show that the appellant consented to Wilson taking Mrs. Loomis out to the different places. The family of the appellant consisted of himself, his wife, and a minor daughter of the age of about eight years. It further appears from the testimony that some time previous to the 2d day of April, 1927, and on or about the 27th day of February, 1927, the deceased took Mrs. Loomis for an automobile ride on a road leading from Escalon to Farmington, and during the ride violated the person of Mrs. Loomis. Some conversation thereafter which took place between the deceased and Mrs. Loomis is set forth in the transcript to the effect that the deceased insisted that Mrs. Loomis should not make known to the appellant the wrongful acts of the deceased; it appearing that the deceased apologized for his unwarranted conduct, and promised never again to repeat such conduct. Thereafter Mrs. Loomis, not mentioning to her husband the conduct of the deceased just referred to, upon the invitation of the deceased and the urging of her husband, accompanied the deceased to one or two places of amusement, and on the 2d day of April, 1927, without having said anything to her husband about the acts of the deceased, again accompanied the deceased to a card party. Upon returning home from the card party, the deceased took Mrs. Loomis to his own residence, and there, according to the testimony of Mrs. Loomis, against her wish and consent, again violated her person. After this occurrence the deceased once more became penitent and apologized, and, on the 11th day of April, 1927, invited Mrs. Loomis to accompany him to some party or place of amusement. Mrs. Loomis refused this invitation, and, after the departure of the deceased, upon being pressed by her husband as to her reason for declining to go out with the deceased, as he (Loomis) could not go, related to her husband the acts of the deceased herein mentioned. On the following day the appellant, with his wife, drove over to the residence of the deceased in an automobile, and there, in the presence of one or two witnesses, had a conversation with the deceased in relation to the conduct of the deceased toward the wife of the appellant. In this conversation the deceased manifested no disposition to discontinue his acts toward the wife of the appellant. Thereafter the appellant and his wife drove over to the town of Modesto, where a physician was consulted to ascertain if any infectious disease had been communicated to Mrs. Loomis by reason of the conduct of the deceased. The appellant and his wife then returned to their home and continued working on their farm until about 11 o'clock on the 14th day of April, 1927, when the appellant and his wife again drove over to the home of the deceased. Before leaving on this second visit, the appellant took with him an automatic revolver, placing the same in his right-hand hip pocket. Upon reaching the residence of the deceased, and inquiring of an electrician, who chanced to be there, of the whereabouts of the deceased, the appellant ascertained that the deceased was at work out in the fields mowing alfalfa. Thereupon the appellant, together with his wife, drove over in their automobile to where the deceased was mowing alfalfa, and waited for the deceased to come around to that portion of the field nearest to the course over which the appellant had driven his automobile.

According to the testimony of Mrs. Loomis, the deceased stopped his mowing machine right by the automobile just mentioned; that the appellant and Mrs. Loomis remained in the automobile; that the right front wheel of the automobile was about opposite the left side wheel of the mowing machine; that the deceased, after stopping his mowing machine, came up to the right side of the automobile; that the appellant asked the deceased what he had to say about the occurrences, and the deceased remarked that he had nothing to say; that at the time of this conversation the deceased was standing by the right side of the automobile, with one of his hands against the door thereof; that at this juncture the appellant got out of the automobile, and went around the rear thereof, and leaned up by the hind wheel against the fender. At this instant of time the appellant addressed the deceased as follows: "Earle, I just want to know if you acknowledge that you forcibly assaulted my wife;" to which the deceased replied, "Yes, and, what is more, I will do it again; I will get rid of you, and then I will get her." After saying this, the deceased made a lunge at the appellant, and hit him. The witness did not see the blow, but says she heard it; that she saw the deceased pass by her as he moved toward the appellant; that she heard a thud as of something falling; that she immediately looked around, and the appellant was getting up; that, after the appellant got up, deceased again started toward him with his hands raised; that at this time the appellant had his right hand raised, holding therein the gun to which we have referred; and that, as the deceased started toward the appellant the second time, the appellant fired one shot. The deceased hesitated a moment, ran over toward the mowing machine, and hesitated there a moment as the appellant fired a second shot; that the deceased then ran in an easterly direction over the checks in which the alfalfa field was divided; that the appellant followed the deceased some little distance, during which period of time several shots were fired; that, after the deceased had reached a point which is shown by the testimony of other witnesses to be at a distance of 203 feet from where the shooting began, the deceased turned and faced the appellant, and the appellant, according to his testimony, at a distance of some 15 feet, again fired at the deceased, whereupon the deceased, after taking a step or two, fell to the ground, and was later taken up dead. The testimony of the appellant shows that he followed the deceased from the time he began firing at him when they were standing alongside the automobile until the deceased fell to the ground at a point, as we have stated, 203 feet distant, and that he fired at the deceased until his revolver was empty. The testimony of other witnesses who measured the grounds was to the effect that the distance from the automobile to the place where the body of the deceased lay was 203 feet, and that, along the course which was taken by the parties from the time the shooting began until its termination, five cartridge shells were found corresponding to the kind and size suited for use in the automatic pistol belonging to the appellant; that two of the shells were found within close proximity of the body of the deceased, one being about 12 feet therefrom, and the second at a few feet greater distance. The other shells were along the course over which the parties traveled.

The testimony of the appellant is to the effect that he was afraid that the deceased was about to do him some great bodily harm; that the deceased was a larger man than he, and that the appellant was afflicted with defective eyesight, and could not distinguish objects, without the aid of his glasses, more than a few feet distant, and that he was afraid the deceased would break his glasses and render him helpless; that he pursued the deceased, thinking that the deceased was going to the mowing machine for the purpose of getting a rifle or revolver. The testimony, however, shows that the deceased did not obtain any revolver, rifle, or any instrument whatever by which he might defend himself against being shot by the appellant, and that the appellant fired several shots at the deceased after the deceased had left the vicinity of the mowing machine.

The testimony of Dr. Johnson, who performed the autopsy, shows that several wounds were inflicted upon the body of the deceased, and that the wound which caused the death of the deceased entered the front left side of his body, pierced the aorta or large blood vessel leading to the heart, passed through other organs of the body, and shattered one of the vertebra of the spinal column; that death necessarily followed very quickly after the infliction of this wound; that, after receiving a wound of this kind shattering the vertebra, the person so wounded would immediately drop to the earth and remain there until death; that it would only be a few seconds—the language of the physician being, “Death would follow probably in a few seconds, if it ran into minutes at all”—that none of the other wounds which he had described were necessarily fatal. Dr. Johnson also testified that the autopsy revealed that one of the bullets entered the body from the rear, inflicting a severe, though not necessarily fatal, injury. There is no testimony in the transcript contradicting that of Dr. Johnson which we have just stated in relation to the wounds received by the deceased, and of the fact that the wound which pierced the aorta and other organs of the body between the aorta and the spinal column, and shattered one of the vertebra of the deceased, was such as necessarily to cause the deceased to fall to the ground and to expire within a few seconds, and therefore the jury could only conclude that the fatal shot was the one which brought the deceased to the ground at a distance of 203 feet from where the shooting began, and that this shot was fired after the deceased had retreated for the distance mentioned, and was facing the appellant without anything in his hands whatever indicating that the deceased possessed either the power, or entertained the intent, to inflict upon the appellant any grievous bodily injury.

[1] Before the testimony of the appellant and Mrs. Loomis had been introduced, the physical facts introduced in evidence, as we have herein summarized them, establish conclusively that the appellant had pursued the deceased and fired at him at least five different times, inflicting the fatal wound at the end of the pursuit; that the deceased not only retreated to his mowing machine, which was only a few feet away, and to a point much farther distant, in his attempt to escape death, and at no time after the first shot was fired was in a position menacing the appellant. The testimony of the appellant and of the appellant's wife coincide exactly with what the physical facts surrounding the affray disclose, and show that the appellant pursued the deceased, as we have stated, and that the deceased at no time had any weapon or instrument of any kind with which he could inflict grievous bodily injury upon the appellant. The only difference between what the physical facts of the encounter disclose and the testimony of the appellant is that the appellant testified that he was afraid the deceased was going to get a gun or revolver at the mowing machine, and that thereafter he was still afraid of the deceased. The testimony of the appellant, after the first shot, fully discloses the character of the pursuit. Answering a question as to what the deceased did after the first shot was fired, the appellant testified:

“Then he (referring to the deceased) started to run southeast, and when he got to the mowing machine he slowed up a little and I thought maybe he went after a gun; then he quit running toward the mowing machine, and he run about straight east, so by that time I got it into my head that I had to chase him. I knew if he ever got a gun or anything from the mowing machine it would be all off with me. I could not think of anything else, and all I thought of was, if he gets me, it is good night with the wife. I knew he might kill her for telling on him. He told me what he had done and I didn't know what he would do, so he started running out there, and I followed him out, and he ran over a border. The wind was blowing very hard, and it blew his hat off. He turned around and stopped like he was going to go after his hat or get me, and I shot at him twice more on the run; he kept going east and southeast, and he run pretty near south, and, when I saw him coming and crowding through there, I headed him off. I thought he was going back to the car or the mowing machine, or something, and then we got out on the place where it had been mowed. We were pretty near to the ditch or the levee or something there, and he was about 25 feet east of me, and I kind of run up on that levee and stopped, and he saw I was stopping, and he stopped and looked at me. He was maybe 15 or 18 feet east of the hump which I was standing on, and so I stood there and looked at him part of a minute, probably, and he looked at me, and he started straight toward me, and I kept standing there and threw up my hand with my gun beside me. I did not say anything to him. He looked at me and started toward me, and I kept motioning to him two or three times to try to make him stay away, and as he got 8 or 10 feet from me I kept ashooting until he was right close on me, and as he went almost past me he fell down and rolled over.”

This testimony of the appellant corresponds with the physical facts as to the shells being found close to the body of the deceased, and also to the testimony of Dr. Johnson that the fatal shot was fired after the pursuit had continued for the distance herein mentioned. It may be here stated that the testimony shows that the place where the deceased's body was found was much farther away from the automobile than the mowing machine; that the mowing machine, as shown by the testimony of Mrs. Loomis, was close by the automobile; and that the deceased was all the while getting farther and farther away from the automobile until he turned and faced the appellant just before the fatal shot was fired.

As disclosed by the physical facts and the testimony of the appellant and of the appellant's wife, to which we have referred, the appellant was beyond any reasonable doubt guilty of the crime of murder as charged in the indictment returned against him. This résumé of the testimony has become necessary by reason of the alleged misconduct of the district attorney, to which we will herein-after refer.

[2] Two grounds of reversal are urged by the appellant: First, that the court erred in its instructions to the jury in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the defendant; and, second, misconduct on the part of the district attorney. It is first urged by the appellant that the court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction:

"The defendant in a criminal action is by law presumed to be innocent until the contrary is satisfactorily proven by competent evidence."

A reference to the transcript shows that this is only an excerpt from the instruction given. Just preceding these words the court instructed the jury as follows:

"In criminal cases guilt must be established beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, and the burden of proof is upon the people."

[3] Immediately following are the words which we have quoted as alleged to be error on the part of the trial court, but, as is readily seen when the whole instruction is read, no error appears. Immediately following is given an instruction relative to reasonable doubt, being the instruction taken from the Massachusetts case which has been followed in this state for years. It is also urged that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows:

"In viewing and weighing the testimony of each and all of the witnesses in the case you have a right to consider their demeanor and manner upon the stand, their interest in the result of the trial; how far their testimony appears consistent or inconsistent in itself; how far it is contradicted, if at all, by other facts and circumstances and testimony in the case, whether their recollection as to matters to which they testified is clear and distinct."

A number of authorities are cited by appellant having to do with cases where the trial court singles out the defendant and gave an instruction relative to his testimony, his demeanor upon the witness stand, interest, etc. These cases have no bearing upon the instruction given by the court. What the court instructed the jury is mere commonplace, and are matters which the jury, if reasonably intelligent, would take into consideration without any instruction from the trial court, and, being applicable to all the witnesses who testified, no error was committed by the court in the giving of the instruction just quoted. It has been held that an instruction singling out the testimony of the defendant is not sufficient ground for reversal, although the giving of such an instruction has consistently been condemned. People v. Bojorquez, 35 Cal. App. 350, 169 P. 922, and concurring opinion by Mr. Justice Hart.

[4] The court also gave to the jury the instruction which was given by the trial court in the case of People v. Vukich (Cal. Sup.) 257 P. 46. The instruction involved is the one relating to a defendant taking the law in his own hands to avenge a real or fancied grievance. In the Vukich Case the giving of the instruction was held proper, and in the case at bar, even though the appellant relied solely upon the plea of self-defense, all the circumstances detailed by the appellant himself and by Mrs. Loomis laid the foundation for the giving of the instruction. These circumstances were all well calculated to arouse in any normal man a feeling of hostility toward the violator of his home and a desire to avenge himself for the injury. The point is also made that the court refused to give certain instructions on the subject of self-defense, requested by the appellant. A reference to the transcript, however, shows that the court carefully and painstakingly instructed the jury upon this subject in language as clear and direct and as fully covering the subject as would have been the case had the court discarded the instructions given, and used the instruction proposed by the appellant.

[5] The refusal to give the instruction numbered 22 requested by the appellant is also alleged to constitute error. The proposed instruction reads:

"If any one, or any number of you, after deliberating upon all the evidence in the case, shall be of the opinion that the defendant has not been proven guilty by the evidence in the case to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, those entertaining that opinion should vote for a verdict of not guilty, and should adhere to that point until convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that they are so wrong."

While the giving of an instruction similar in language to the one requested has been held proper in many cases, the refusal to give such an instruction has likewise consistently been held not to constitute, in and of itself, sufficient cause for reversal. See People v. Grahle, 67 Cal. App. 183, 227 P. 227, and a large number of cases there cited. Without going further into the alleged errors of the trial court relative to the instructions given to the jury, it is sufficient to say we have carefully examined all the instructions given and refused, and find that the trial court fully and fairly instructed the jury as to all the law involved in this case, and that no reversible error can be found either by reason of the instructions given or the requested instructions refused.

[6] We have finally to consider the alleged misconduct of the district attorney. This misconduct consisted in asking questions in the cross-examination of Mrs. Loomis, while on the witness stand for the defendant, and also of questions asked the defendant. Before considering the questions, we will state that the transcript shows that the jury was instructed to disregard the questions asked by the district attorney, and to which no answers were permitted. It is, however, urged here that the misconduct was such as to render ineffective any instructions that might be given to the jury by the trial court. Upon cross-examination the district attorney asked Mrs. Loomis the following questions:

"Q. Isn't it a fact that at that time and place you had a conversation with Mrs. McAlpine that you had several operations; that you were all cut up inside; that you had your ovaries taken out; that the reason was that you had contracted a venereal disease in Modesto, and brought it home, communicated it to your husband, and told him as an explanation that you had gotten it off a toilet seat, or that he had gotten it off a toilet seat?" "Q. Had he within a year prior to this occurrence at any time, did your husband say anything to you concerning the fact of his parentage of your child?"

Upon cross-examination of the defendant the district attorney asked the following questions:

"Q. Do you know whether or not your wife's ovaries have been removed?" "Q. Isn't it a fact that in April, 1926, your wife filed a divorce complaint against you?" "Q. Isn't it a fact, Mr. Loomis, that your wife filed a divorce complaint against you within a year prior to this shooting, wherein she stated and alleged that you—"

At the time of asking the question of the defendant relative to a divorce action having been begun against him by his wife, the district attorney had in his hand what is said to have been a copy of the complaint in such action, but, as that is not a part of the record, we know nothing of its contents, and shall pass the incident by with the statement that the transcript shows absolutely nothing upon which to base the question, and with the further statement that the transcript shows nothing which would lead to the conclusion that the asking of this question amounted to any serious misconduct, or could have had any prejudicial effect upon the minds of the jurors. With this statement, before considering the relevancy or irrelevancy or alleged prejudicial effect of the asking of the other questions, we will refer to the case of People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 P. 43, upon which the respondent particularly relies to show the propriety of the district attorney propounding the various questions set forth herein. In the case just cited the defendant was being tried on the charge of having murdered one Max Krieger. The facts disclosed in the opinion in that case show that the defendant had a grown daughter with whom he was having illicit relations; that Krieger was paying attention to the daughter, whether with honorable or other intent does not appear, but, for the purpose of showing a motive for the killing of Krieger by the deceased, the prosecution was permitted to introduce testimony tending to show the illicit relation between father and daughter; that the defendant was actuated by the fear that Krieger, a rival for his daughter's favors, would become possessed of knowledge of the criminal relations existing between father and daughter, and therefore, through motives of jealousy, and to conceal his own criminal acts, killed Krieger. It is true that in that case the testimony was offered of illicit relations upon a promise of the district attorney to connect it up with the defendant to show a motive, as herein stated, subject to a motion to strike out, and no motion was made, but the court, in its opinion, held such testimony, under the circumstances, admissible. The judgment in that case, however, was reversed on other grounds.

The case of the People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 599, 77 P. 449, is also called to our attention in connection with the Cook Case. In the Smith Case the question turned upon the good or bad faith of the district attorney, and need not be further adverted to herein. The circumstances involved in the Cook Case are almost the antithesis of those involved in the case at bar. In the Cook Case the commission of a separate and distinct crime was sought to be shown as a motive for the commission of the offense upon which the defendant was being tried. Under such circumstances the law seems to be well settled that other offenses may be shown when there is a reasonable connection between the offense charged and the offense sought to be shown so that the latter may reasonably be said to be connected with, and furnish a cause for the commission of, the crime for which the defendant is being tried. All the cases relating to the introduction in evidence of separate offenses as the motive for a commission of a second offense are not pertinent here, for the simple reason that the questions involved do not relate to separate offenses committed by the defendant. A parallel set of circumstances would have been presented if, in the Cook Case, the daughter of the defendant had been asked questions indicating that she had had certain operations performed upon her body by reason of some former unlawful relations with parties other than the defendant. If motive there was for the defendant killing Wilson in this case, it was the alleged violation of his home by the deceased. The fact that Mrs. Loomis had told something to a Mrs. McAlpine about her condition had absolutely nothing to do with the motive of the defendant in killing Wilson, assuming that he was actuated by a spirit of revenge and a desire to kill the deceased on account of the deceased's invasion of the defendant's home. If Mrs. Loomis were assumed to be a woman of dissolute character, as the question indicated, it certainly would not tend to show any additional motive on the part of the defendant to kill Wilson. If the killing took place under circumstances justifying the homicide on account of the invasion of the defendant's home, it would not be any more justified because the wife of the defendant was a dissolute character, nor would it be any less justified. At the time the questions were asked which we have set forth herein, there was nothing in the case indicating that the defendant relied upon anything other than the plea of self-defense; that the deceased was the aggressor in striking the defendant preceding the shooting. It was not a case of sudden passion or irresistible impulse following the discovery of the deceased in some illicit act with the wife of the defendant, and therefore what Mrs. Loomis may have told Mrs. McAlpine was wholly inadmissible. It could not have been admitted on the theory of proving the defendant at least guilty of manslaughter, for the simple reason that there was nothing in the case showing a homicide following a sudden heat of passion or an irresistible impulse, but only a homicide following, at most, the striking of a blow by the deceased upon one shoulder of the defendant sufficient to fell him to the ground. Likewise, the question relative to the paternity of the eight year old child involved in the second question presented nothing proper for the jury to consider, as disclosed by the facts set forth in the transcript. That the defendant was or was not the parent of the child bearing his name would not bear upon the question of whether the defendant did or did not kill the deceased in necessary self-defense.

The Supreme Court of this state has had occasion in numerous instances to condemn questions which have for their purpose only the degrading of the witness. That the first question which we have set forth herein, propounded to Mrs. Loomis, was inadmissible, clearly appears by reversing the situation placing Mrs. McAlpine on the witness stand and asking her if Mrs. Loomis did not relate to her what is set forth in the question. That the question tended to degrade the witness in the eyes of the jury seems to us clearly apparent because of the imputations and intentions contained therein. Questions tending only to degrade the character of the witness have been condemned in the following cases: People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 P. 1078; People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 83, 39 P. 12; People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 57 P. 785; People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 P. 752; People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 20 P. 719; People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 P. 78. Other cases might be cited, but these are ample to show that, where such questions are propounded by the district attorney, sufficient misconduct is presented necessitating a reversal. In some of the cases, as in People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77 P. 449, where the question of misconduct of the district attorney upon argument of the cause to the jury was presented, a distinction is made between the good faith and bad faith characterizing the alleged misconduct. The effect on the jury in the case at bar from the asking of the questions which we have set forth herein could not very well be any different whether propounded in good or in bad faith, and differs from words that may be uttered in the heat of argument, because the jury, as ordinarily intelligent men, and under the instructions of the court, would readily make the distinction between the evidence and the argument of counsel. Some of the cases also present the question as to whether the trial court immediately instructs the jury to disregard the questions propounded by the district attorney. In the case at bar it appears that the vitally objectionable questions were immediately followed by instructions from the court to disregard the same.

[7] Admitting that the questions propounded by the district attorney were prejudicial in their character, and were questions which should not have been propounded, this cause still presents a different situation from one where, under sharply conflicting evidence, the jury has brought in a verdict of murder involving either life imprisonment or the infliction of the death sentence. Under the testimony set forth in the transcript and as summarized herein, whether the questions of the district attorney were propounded in bad faith or in good faith, or under the assumption that they were admissible, or from lack of familiarity with the rules of evidence, must be held immaterial. This is true, because, if the testimony of the defendant and the testimony of Mrs. Loomis be taken at full face value, it nevertheless appears that the homicide was committed under circumstances which establish that there could have been in the mind of the defendant no reasonable belief that his own person or the person of his wife was in actual peril. It is not enough that the defendant may believe himself in peril in order to justify the taking of human life, but the circumstances must be such as to give reasonable cause for such a belief. After the first shot was fired by the defendant, the testimony of the defendant himself and the testimony of

Mrs. Loomis, taken at its full face value, shows that there was no reasonable grounds or appearances for believing that the deceased was about to inflict upon either one of them any grievous or other injury. Their own testimony shows that the deceased was retreating; that he was unarmed; that the deceased retreated to the mowing machine, and then sought safety by further flight; and that the defendant followed the deceased for a trifle over 200 feet, and then and there inflicted the mortal wound. Under such circumstances the jury would have been justified in returning a verdict of murder, based upon the testimony of the defendant and Mrs. Loomis, accepting the testimony of both of them at full face value. The verdict of manslaughter returned by the jury in this case can only be reconciled with the testimony by concluding that the jury acted upon the assumption that a man who invades the home of another deserves to be shot. Under section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution we are prohibited from interfering with the verdict in this case because, no matter how objectionable the questions propounded by the district attorney may be, the jury was not warranted, under any aspect of the case, in returning a verdict of acquittal, and in returning a verdict of manslaughter the utmost leniency was extended to the appellant. The homicide in this case grew out of the invasion of the home of the appellant by the deceased, but, while juries usually modify the verdict in such cases, the law does not recognize homicide therefor as either justifiable or excusable except in certain instances not shown by the evidence in this case. Here the homicide occurred several days after the alleged invasion of the home of the appellant.

The judgment and order of the trial court are affirmed.

BURGESS v. DORAN. (Civ. 5634.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 12, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨854(6)—Order granting new trial will be affirmed if any of grounds therefor are supported by record.

If any of grounds for new trial are supported by record, order granting new trial will be affirmed.

2. New trial ⇨66—In unlawful detainer, verdict for defendant, not claiming renewal of lease for 10 years was in writing delivered to lessee, held "against law" (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6; Civ. Code, §§ 1624, subd. 5, 1626).

Where defendant in action for unlawful detainer pleaded that lessor granted renewal of lease for 10-year period, but did not claim that any writing renewing such term required by Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5, for leases over 1 year, was ever delivered to lessee, as required by section 1626 for contract to take effect, verdict for defendant was "against law," within Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6, providing for new trial when verdict is against law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Against Law.]

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨88(1)—Document claimed to be lease renewing former lease, not shown to have been delivered to lessee, held in legal effect no lease (Civ. Code, § 1626).

In action in unlawful detainer against defendant claiming to have been granted renewal of lease for 10-year period, document claimed to be lease, not shown to have ever been delivered to lessee, was in legal effect no lease, under Civ. Code, § 1626, providing that contract takes effect on delivery.

4. New trial ⇨66—Jury's verdict on equitable issues is purely advisory, and, on trial court's failure to make findings thereon, verdict is against law, requiring new trial.

Verdict of jury on equitable issues is purely advisory, trial court being required to make findings thereon, and, on failure of trial court to make findings, verdict is against law and new trial should be granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by C. W. Burgess against N. V. Doran. Verdict for defendant, plaintiff's motion for a new trial was granted, and defendant appeals, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a. Affirmed.

James M. Hanley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Hugh K. McKevitt, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action in unlawful detainer against the defendant. The defendant appeared and answered. A trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial. The motion was based on all of the statutory grounds except as to excessive damages. The trial court granted the motion and in its order it did not specify on which of the grounds of the motion it based its order. The defendant appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The defendant makes several points which are not controverted by the plaintiff, but in support of the order the plaintiff calls to our attention the condition of the record and contends that the trial court did not err in granting the motion. In this connection we think the plaintiff must be sustained.

In the defendant's answer an equitable defense was pleaded. In brief, that equitable defense was that the plaintiff had by certain conduct granted to the defendant a renewal, for a 10-year period, of a lease which it is conceded commenced on October 2, 1915, and expired October 5, 1925. After the jury had been impaneled the plaintiff and defendant stipulated to such facts that there remained no issue to be tried except the issues presented by the equitable defense. The defendant proceeded to introduce her evidence and the case was duly presented to the court and jury. On submitting his case the plaintiff presented and requested the trial court to submit to the jury certain special issues, but they were not presented to the jury by the court. On the other hand, the court gave to the jury two forms of general verdicts—one in favor of the plaintiff, and one in favor of the defendant. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the defendant. Later the plaintiff made concurrently two motions. One motion was in the form of a request for the trial court (1) to disregard and ignore the verdict; (2) to decide and determine said action and file its findings; (3) to decide and determine the equitable issues and file its findings; and (4) to decide and determine all of the equitable issues tendered by the answer and to file its findings. The other motion was the motion for a new trial which we have noted above. The trial court ignored the motion to file findings, etc., and decided the motion for a new trial in favor of the moving party.

[1] The grounds on which the motion for a new trial was based included attacks that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict and that the verdict was against law. The defendant contends that, as the order granting the motion did not specify that one of the grounds on which it was based was the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, therefore it will be presumed on appeal that the order was not based upon that ground. However, if any one of the other grounds is supported by the record, the order appealed from should be affirmed. The verdict was against law for two different reasons.

"You are hereby instructed that any agreement for the leasing of the Land Hotel for a longer period than 1 year is invalid and not binding unless the agreement or some note or memorandum thereof was in writing and was signed by Mr. Burgess and was delivered to Mrs. Doran."

It is not contended that the instruction was erroneous. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5. The evidence was all one way, and it is not even claimed that any writing renewing the term was ever delivered to Mrs. Doran. The plaintiff contends that, under these facts, the document which the defendant claims to be a lease in legal effect was no lease. Civ. Code, § 1626; Feigenbaum v. Aymard, 71 Cal. App. 713, 236 P. 156. The authorities clearly sustain the plaintiff's contention. It is equally clear that, on the record as made, "the verdict * * * is against law." Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6; Larrabee v. Western Pacific R. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 749, 161 P. 750.

[4] In the next place, the verdict of the jury on equitable issues was purely advisory. Haggin v. Raymond, 67 Cal. 302, 7 P. 721; Adams v. Helbing, 107 Cal. 298, 40 P. 422; Swift v. Occidental Mining, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 161, 166, 167, 74 P. 700; Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 37 Cal. App. 268, 276, 173 P. 1013. The trial court should have made findings thereon, and until findings were made the record was incomplete. Vallejo, etc., R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 556, 147 P. 238. In such cases where the trial court fails to make findings, it has also been held that the verdict is against law and a new trial should be granted. Haight v. Tryon, 112 Cal. 4, 6, 44 P. 318.

The judgment is affirmed.

BORADORI v. PETERSON. (Civ. 6009.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 16, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨80(10)—Evidence held not to show agreement to include lease as part of business so as to entitle employee to profit from sublease.

Evidence held not to show that parties to contract of employment for stated salary and fourth of net profits agreed on inclusion of employer's lease as part of business so as to entitle employee to profit from sublease.

2. Master and servant ⇨70(3)—"Net profits," within contract entitling employee to share, mean return exceeding expenses and losses.

"Net profits" of business, as in contract to pay employee a share thereof, mean what remains as clear gains of business venture after expenses incurred in its conduct and losses sustained in its prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Net Profits.]

3. Master and servant ⇨80(6)—Employee claiming share of profits of mercantile business, including profits from sublease, must show agreement to treat lease as merchandise.

Net profits of business of buying and selling merchandise being limited to difference between gross receipts for sale thereof and expense of conducting business, including rent, it was incumbent on employee, suing employer for share of net profits, including profits from sublease, to show agreement that employer's rent or lease should be treated as merchandise in determining whether business resulted in a profit.

4. Contracts ⇨170(1)—Parties' contemporaneous and practical construction of equivocal contract is strong evidence of its meaning.

The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence of its meaning, if its terms are equivocal.

5. Master and servant ⇨80(10)—Evidence held to warrant finding against employee's right to compensation for services rendered after termination of employment.

Evidence held to warrant finding that employee was not entitled to recover compensation for services rendered to employer after termination of employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by William J. Boradori against Frank B. Peterson, doing business as the Frank B. Peterson Company. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William P. Cauby and Robert L. McWilliams, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Francis V. Keesling and L. L. James, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by appellant against respondent, by whom he was employed for a number of years, to obtain a decree directing the payment of such sum as might be found to be owing to him. As stated by appellant in his opening brief, the case involves two principal questions. The first is whether or not appellant is entitled to share in the profits accruing from subletting certain premises in which respondent's grocery business had been located; the second, whether or not appellant is entitled to a reasonable compensation for services rendered by him following the termination of his employment by respondent. Judgment was entered in favor of respondent—defendant in the court below—and from such judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial this appeal has been taken.

Respondent, Frank B. Peterson, was for many years engaged in the wholesale grocery business in Main street, San Francisco, and for a number of years appellant had charge of the business so far as the buying and selling of the merchandise and the direction and control of the salesmen were concerned.

The precise terms of appellant's employment at the outset do not appear. It is in evidence, however, as testified by respondent, Frank B. Peterson, that he, being the owner of the business, charged the business 6 per cent. for the moneys invested by him and that the profits of the business, so far as his associates were concerned, were computed after the deduction of that 6 per cent. While the firm was in business at the Main street location it occupied leases premises, the lease on which had been purchased by Peterson. This lease was taken in the name of Frank B. Peterson personally and was regarded and treated as his personal affair. The grocery business was charged $245 per month rent, and the lease, while handled in the firm's books, was handled in an account called "lease account." At the end of the year this account was closed out directly to Frank B. Peterson's investment account, which was a holding capital account, and did not affect the business. There were two other tenants in the premises—the Naknek Packing Company and the Velvetone Company—who paid rent, which rent went directly to Frank B. Peterson's personal account.

In December, 1913, appellant, Boradori, had planned to leave Peterson and to associate himself with the William Cluff Company. When this was called to the attention of Peterson he persuaded Boradori to abandon that plan and remain with him, and he agreed to give Boradori thereafter one-fourth of the net profits of the business. This understanding was embodied in a written memorandum reading as follows:

"San Francisco, December 8, 1913. This is to confirm verbal agreement whereby Mr. William J. Boradori is to receive $200 per month from December 1, 1913, from Frank B. Peterson Company and one-quarter of the net profits, commencing February 1, 1924, for at least one year. [Signed] Frank B. Peterson."

The first of the two questions involved in this appeal is the meaning of the term "net profits" as used in this written memorandum of agreement.

This agreement was continued in force until the sale of the business in 1919. During the intervening years Boradori was paid various sums as his share of the profits. Some years there were no profits, and Boradori's income was limited to his salary. One year his profits went up to $10,000 or $12,000.

The question as to the construction to be placed on the agreement arises out of the circumstances surrounding the removal of the business from Main street to new quarters at Spear and Harrison streets. In the month of December, 1918, Peterson, casting about for a new location, rented from J. D. & A. B. Spreckels Securities Company a building on the corner of Spear and Harrison streets for a period of 10 years and to that location moved his grocery business. The removal was made with the consent of appellant, and no change was made in the business and relations existing by virtue of the arrangement of employment made in 1913.

When Peterson commenced business at the Main street location there was a ground lease of the premises which had some years to run. The lessees had erected the building, which upon the termination of the lease was to become the property of the owner. Peterson himself paid the lessees a monthly rental. The building being in bad condition, Peterson threatened to leave unless substantial repairs were made. The landlord thereupon sold the lease to Peterson, who paid $6,000 for the remainder of the term. This he spread over a number of years, charging the grocery business with $245 rent per month and crediting his personal account with that amount. He also charged other lines of business in which he was interested with their proportionate shares. All of these matters were carried on the books of Frank B. Peterson Company, under what was termed "lease account" and were never considered by any one to be a part of the grocery business. When Frank B. Peterson Company moved to the new quarters in 1918 the same method of handling the lease account followed, except that for some unexplained reason the term "rent account" was used instead of "lease account," and thereafter under the Spreckels lease the grocery business was charged with the rent and credited with the rent received from the subtenants.

In 1919 Peterson concluded to dispose of his grocery business and found a purchaser in Getz Bros. & Co., who were willing to sublease the Spreckels premises from Peterson for the remainder of the term and pay Peterson a certain sum over and above that called for in the lease. Before consummating the transaction Peterson placed the matter before appellant and stated to him in effect that unless it met with his approval he would proceed no further, and appellant agreeing, the sale was consummated. As to the lease, appellant testified:

"Q. What was said about the lease? A. Mr. Peterson told me what he was asking for the lease and it was—and we understood them—we figured it was between fifty and fifty-five thousand dollars."

There is, however, no testimony that appellant was to receive any of the profit made on the lease, nor that he demanded any or even suggested that he was interested in it.

[1] The judgment is attacked upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding that the plaintiff received everything he was entitled to receive; that he had no interest in the lease and therefore none in the profit derived from the sublease to Getz Bros. & Co.

Under the written agreement of 1913 appellant was to receive 25 per cent. of the net profits of the grocery business. Parol evidence was admitted to show the intention of the parties as disclosed by their own construction of the agreement, the circumstances under which it was made, and their previous, contemporary, and subsequent business relations. Appellant did not contend that any partnership relation existed between the parties. There is no question but that appellant was at the time the agreement was made an employee of Peterson in the grocery business alone as manager of that business. The execution of the agreement made no change in their relationship of master and servant. Appellant acquired no interest in Peterson's other business affairs. When the grocery business showed a profit, he received his share of it; when it showed a loss, Peterson sustained the loss, appellant at all times receiving his regular salary. The agreement was made December 8, 1913, and appellant was to receive "one-quarter of the net profits commencing February 1, 1914, for at least one year." It therefore appears that at the expiration of one year either party could terminate the agreement at will, and that if appellant was dissatisfied with the increased rent under the Spreckels lease or the fact that the entire rent was charged to the grocery business and credited with rent received from the subtenants, as he claims, he could have refused longer to remain in the employ of Peterson. He certainly cannot complain of the fact that after the removal to the new location the grocery business, from the net profits of which he received a part, was credited with the rent paid by the subtenants, while in the old location the rent paid by the subtenants went to Frank B. Peterson personally, and no part thereof inured to his benefit.

Appellant contends that the conduct of the parties shows that the profit on the lease was intended to be figured in determining the net profits of the business, specifying the particular circumstances to show such intent as follows: That at the time of the execution of the Spreckels lease Peterson said to appellant, Boradori: "I am signing my life away, and it is up to you to make good on this lease;" that it appeared from the books of the grocery business after the removal to the new premises that Naknek Packing Company and Red Salmon Company, who were subtenants, paid a monthly rental each of $100 for the use of the premises occupied, which amounts were charged to profit and loss on the books of the Peterson Company in connection with the grocery business; that the accounting had after the sale of the business showed that under the heading "rent account" there were credited receipts of rent paid by two subtenants in the sum of $600 as against rent paid out on the principal lease in the sum of $2,787.82; that in the statement of accounts prepared by the expert accountant in August, 1919, for the purpose of closing out the business, an item of $7,626.50 appears as a debit item for rent paid by the Peterson Company under the Spreckels lease; likewise an item appears of $2,084.87 representing the rents received from the subtenants; that when Peterson was about to make the deal with Getz Bros. he showed a memorandum to appellant and said: "This deal, William, I want you to understand is up to you—dependent upon your yes or no; study it over;" that Peterson told appellant he was asking for the lease between fifty and fifty-five thousand dollars.

Appellant does not contend that there was any express agreement that the lease should be deemed a part of the grocery business, but relies upon what he terms "acquiescence."

The following colloquy between the court and Boradori shows the unimportance of the statement testified to by appellant as having been made by Peterson:

"The Court: You said Mr. Peterson said to you, 'You must make good on this lease,' and Mr. James said, 'Didn't he say you must make good on this business?' A. The lease was a part of the business.

"Q. Well, as contradistinguished from the business, is there such a thing as making good on the lease? A. Mr. James was differentiating.

"Q. As I understood it—as I understood, Mr. James said to you, 'You must make good in the business,' and you answered 'No; he said, "'You must make good on the lease.'"—what is the difference between making good on the lease or in the business? A. Well, there wouldn't be any difference, but he referred to the lease."

With reference to the same matter, Mr. Peterson testified:

"Q. What did you say—first, when you moved down to the new place, you expanded the business, did you not? A. Yes.

"Q. A greater expense and a greater overhead? A. With the prospects for a much larger business.

"Q. And the rental was $1,300 a month? A. Nearly $1,300.

"The Court: What did you say to Mr. Boradori? A. Something like this. I said, 'That is a frightful rent to pay; you will have to work pretty hard.'

"Mr. James: Did you say he had to work hard on the business? A. Well, he had to manage the business well, something like that."

It is evident that Peterson had some misgivings as to whether the business in the new location would increase in sufficient proportion to carry the additional rent, and therefore he wished to impress upon appellant the necessity for his own sake as well as for the interest of the business that he "make good on the lease," as stated by appellant, or as testified by Peterson, "he had to work pretty hard—had to manage the business well."

[2] The meaning of "net profits of a business" has been defined by the courts, if authority is necessary to define a meaning so generally and commonly understood. "The words 'net profits' define themselves. They mean what shall remain as the clear gains of any business venture, after deducting the capital invested in the business, the expenses incurred in its conduct, and the losses sustained in its prosecution." Park v. Grant Locomotive Works, 40 N. J. Eq. 114, 3 A. 162; Crawford v. Calkins, 170 Mich. 587, 136 N. W. 369.

[3] Therefore, inasmuch as the net profits of a business, which consists of the buying and selling of merchandise, are limited to the difference between the gross receipts for sale of merchandise and the expense of conducting the business, of which rent is probably the most essential item, it is incumbent upon appellant to show some agreement between the parties that the rent or lease should be treated as merchandise in determining whether the business resulted in a profit in which appellant is entitled to share.

No authority directly in point has been cited by counsel for either side, due probably to the fact that none could be found, as it is not likely that the contention here made has been urged with any degree of frequency.

The case of Amsden v. Dunham, 78 App. Div. 33, 78 N. Y. S. 989, is more nearly analogous to the circumstances here presented than any of the cases cited. There the defendant was engaged in the business of buying and selling cheese. Plaintiff was employed at a fixed salary and a commission of 5 per cent. upon the net profits of the firm. While plaintiff was working under this agreement, defendants constructed a warehouse, which on dissolution of the firm, and while plaintiff was still in their employ, they sold at a profit of $6,000. Plaintiff claimed he was entitled to share in this profit. The court says:

"We do not think that it was fairly within the contemplation of the parties that a profit or increase in valuation of such a piece of property as this should be the basis of commissions to plaintiff. The regular legitimate business of defendants when plaintiff entered their employ was, as stated, the purchase and sale of cheese. It is manifest that he was hired to help about that business. While one of the expressions above quoted from the evidence about his receiving commissions is quite broad, his complaint alleges his right to recover for work, labor and services performed for defendants 'in their copartnership business,' and which was the buying and selling of cheese. So far as the evidence and surrounding facts disclose that was the purpose for which he was hired. It does not appear that he was expected to render any particular services, with reference to such ventures as the erection and operation of this warehouse, and it is a reasonable construction of the contract that he should receive commissions upon the profits of the business which received the benefit of his services. While it is true that this warehouse was used in connection with defendants' business and was deemed advantageous for the proper conduct thereof, it can hardly be regarded as strictly and properly a part of the business itself. It was simply a means of carrying on the work in which the copartnership was engaged. It was collateral and incidental to the same rather than a part thereof. It would be unreasonable to assume that the parties contemplated that any enterprise in which the copartners might engage, although with copartnership funds and however remote from their natural business, should be made the basis of swelling or reducing plaintiff's commissions. We assume that if defendants had made profits in any one year in the purchase and sale of cheese, upon which plaintiff was entitled to commissions, and such profits were entirely wiped out by some outside venture like the erection of this building, or the purchase of land or any other form of speculation, plaintiff very strenuously would have insisted that he should not be affected by such losses. The reverse of the illustration seems to us proper. We do not think that the erection of the building was a part of the copartnership business which plaintiff was hired to work in, and that he is, therefore, not entitled to compensation by way of commissions upon any apparent profit in the building."

See, also, Hawley v. Coal Co., 48 Kan. 593, 30 P. 14.

[4] Appellant has cited several authorities to the effect that when the meaning of the nature of a contract is considered doubtful, the acts of the parties done under it afford one of the most reliable clues to the intention of the parties; that the contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence as to its meaning if its terms are equivocal. We are in perfect accord with the principles enunciated in those authorities, but are not of the opinion that the acts of the parties done under the contract here show that the profit, if any, to be made on subleasing the premises on the sale of the business was to be accounted for as a profit of the grocery business. We are unable to find any evidence in the record that suggests a meeting of the minds of Peterson and Boradori upon the inclusion of the lease as a part of the grocery business, or that it entered Boradori's mind until some time after the sale of the business.

[5] With reference to the second cause of action in which appellant alleges that he is entitled to a reasonable compensation for services rendered to Frank B. Peterson following the termination of his employment in the grocery business, and respecting which the court found he was not entitled to recover such compensation, it may be said that there is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain the finding of the trial court. According to the testimony of appellant he worked for Mr. Getz for one month following the sale of the business, and then was at Peterson's office nearly every day for about 10 or 11 days. On October 12, 1919, he left for the east on business of his own, returning in about 6 weeks. He opened a brokerage office of his own at Peterson's, for which office Peterson did not charge him any rent. He spent about half of his time in December, 1919, and January and February, 1920, at Getz Bros., adjusting differences that had arisen in the price of merchandise and other matters connected with the transfer of the business. In March, 1920, he had another contract with Mr. Peterson on another matter which had no bearing on the matter in controversy, for which service he received $3,000. Frank B. Peterson testified that he did not employ appellant at all after the sale to Getz Bros., except when he was buying groceries for the canneries, for which he was paid very handsomely. Otherwise there was no employment whatever. Appellant occupied office space with him, for which appellant was not charged rent, and he helped to establish appellant in the brokerage business. During the period of 9 months subsequent to September 1, 1919, appellant never requested or demanded of him that he pay him anything.

From what has been said, it follows that, in our opinion, the findings complained of find ample support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

DALTON v. GARDNER. (Civ. 5965.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 17, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Trial $\S$ 396(2)—Findings outside issues made by pleadings are nugatory.

Findings outside of issues made by pleadings are nugatory.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1010(1)—Where there was evidence tending to support findings, court could not disturb judgment.

Where there was evidence supporting, or tending to support, each of trial court's findings, appellate court could not disturb judgment.

3. Partnership $\S$ 108—Where court appointed receiver for partnership, and thereafter made finding that debts were paid, and that there were no assets, no further accounting was prerequisite to valid money judgment against copartner in counterclaim.

In action for dissolution of copartnership and for accounting, where trial court appointed receiver, and, after accounts had been rendered, and after moneys were collected, receiver paid debts, and court made finding that all debts of partnership had been paid, and that there were no assets, an accounting was had, so that plaintiff's contention that pleadings were amended to allow defendant to take money judgment against copartner on counterclaim, without first causing accounting to be had, was without merit.

4. Partnership $\Rightarrow$ 108—Rule that partner cannot take money judgment against copartner without accounting being had first does not apply to cause of action created in proceedings collateral and prior to rights growing out of partnership relation.

Rule that partnership cannot take money judgment against copartner without first causing an accounting to be had applies to liability on claims arising out of partnership relation, and does not apply to cause of action created in proceedings collateral to, and prior to, any rights growing out of partnership relation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Wallace S. Dalton against P. B. Gardner for dissolution of partnership and for an accounting, in which defendant filed a counterclaim. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

tiff and defendant commenced to transact

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silver-ton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. O. Leake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a decree dissolving a copartnership and for an accounting. The defendant appeared and answered and filed a counterclaim. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendant, and judgment was entered thereon. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleged the formation of the partnership; that the plaintiff and defendant commenced to transact business; and that the defendant had been guilty of numerous wrongful acts, among others, that he had misappropriated the partnership funds. In his answer the defendant denied each of the alleged wrongful acts, and then, as an affirmative defense, he pleaded that the plaintiff was guilty of fraud in inducing the defendant to become a copartner.

On the trial of the case the plaintiff called the defendant as a witness, and proceeded to examine him under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He also called Mr. Wilson, the fiduciary agent of the partnership. On the hearing the trial court proceeded to take an accounting without referring the taking of an account to a referee, and without making an interlocutory decree. Both parties acquiesced in the procedure, and the record presents no objection or exception on the subject. The findings are numerous. All of the issues made by the pleadings are found upon. The fourth finding is as follows:

"The court further finds that an accounting was had of the profits and losses of said business up to and including the month of January, 1924, and that plaintiff and defendant up to said time received from said business the sum of $100.26; that since said time no accounting has been had between the parties."

The sixth finding is as follows:

"The court further finds that all of the partnership debts have been paid and that there are no assets, and that a full accounting has been had between the partners."

[1, 2] The plaintiff contends that the findings are contradictory, and for that reason that the judgment should be reversed. The vice in that contention is that both findings are wholly without the issues made by the pleadings. Findings outside of the issues made by the pleadings, it has been held in numerous decisions, are nugatory. The plaintiff quotes findings 9 to 18, inclusive, and contends that they are not sustained by the evidence. Those findings are in response to the allegations of the defendant's pleading, in which he charged that he had been imposed upon by the fraudulent misrepresentations made by the plaintiff inducing him to become a partner. The defendant cites us to many passages showing that there was evidence introduced supporting, or tending to support, each of the findings. Under these circumstances this court may not disturb the judgment.

[3] After the cause had been submitted, the defendant applied for permission, and the permission was granted, authorizing the defendant to amend his answer. At this time the plaintiff asserts that it was error for the trial court to grant the permission. In this behalf it may be remarked that the nature of the amendment was purely formal to make the pleadings conform to the proof. As we understand the plaintiff, it is his contention that the amended pleading operated to allow the defendant to take a money judgment against a copartner without first causing an accounting to be had. But the assumption of the plaintiff is a misconception of the record. As stated above, the trial court took the accounting. It is conceded that the partners themselves settled their accounts down to February 1, 1924. The defendant was in charge of the business from February 1, 1924, to June 12, 1924, and produced his accounts covering that period. At the same time he brought forward $792.64 and, on the order of the court, paid it over to the receiver. From June 12, 1924, to August 27, 1927, Mr. K. C. Wilson was in charge of the business, having been appointed by the defendant. He came forward with his accounts and the moneys on hand, and turned them over. The record discloses that a receiver was appointed by the trial court after the complaint was filed. The record does not disclose that any one item on any one of the several accounts was disputed. Neither party claimed that he was personally entitled to any of the moneys; but that all of the moneys on hand were needed to pay the debts, and were so used. After the above accounts had been rendered, and after the moneys were collected, the receiver paid the debts, and the court made a finding that all of the debts of the partnership had been paid, and that there are no assets. It is clear, therefore, that an accounting has been had, and that the principle for which the plaintiff contends has not been violated.

[4] Moreover, the amount for which the trial court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant was based on his cause of action for alleged false representations. That cause of action was created in the proceedings collateral to, and prior to, any rights growing out of the partnership relation, whereas the principle for which the plaintiff contends is applicable to liabilities and claims arising out of the partnership relation. 30 Cyc. 461.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. REITZ. (Cr. 1404.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 17, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 7, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Criminal law §321—Judgment in action in which defendant was charged with testifying falsely, not disclosing grounds, will be presumed based on fraud put in issue by complaint.

Where judgment in action to annul marriage, in which it was charged that accused testified falsely, did not show grounds on which it was granted, court must presume in support of integrity of judgment that it was based on the one legal ground put in issue by complaint—fraud specified in Civ. Code, § 82, subd. 4, on which issue accused was charged with testifying falsely.

2. Perjury §11(8)—Evidence of falsity of testimony in proceeding to annul marriage, that parties had never cohabited, held to sustain conviction of perjury; such testimony being material to issue of fraud.

Accused's testimony, in action to annul marriage, that he and wife had never cohabited as husband and wife, was character of testimony tending substantially to prove issue of fraud or to influence tribunal before whom proceeding was had, and proof of its falsity and that it was given under all legal restrictions defining crime of perjury, supported conviction for perjury.

3. Perjury §32(3, 4, 6)—Judgment roll in proceeding in which alleged perjury was committed was admissible to show proceedings, jurisdiction, and materiality of testimony.

In prosecution for perjury, judgment roll in marriage annulment proceeding, in which accused was charged with testifying falsely, was properly admitted to show pendency of proceeding, jurisdiction of court, and giving of testimony and its materiality.

4. Perjury §32(3)—In perjury prosecution, testimony of deputy county clerk held admissible to show legality of proceedings and court in which hearing was held.

In prosecution for perjury, testimony of county clerk was admissible for purpose of showing legality of proceedings and particular court in which hearing, in which accused was charged with testifying falsely, was held.

5. Perjury §32(5)—In perjury prosecution, court reporter's testimony held admissible to show that accused had been regularly sworn as witness and testified in open court.

In prosecution for perjury, testimony of court reporter was admissible to show that accused had been regularly sworn as witness and testified in open court upon trial in which he was charged with testifying falsely, and also to show particular testimony given by him on that occasion.

6. Criminal law §369(14)—That testimony otherwise competent tended to show accused was guilty of forgery could not affect admissibility in perjury prosecution.

In prosecution for perjury, testimony that answer and waiver of notice of trial reported to have been signed by wife, in proceedings for annulment of marriage, in which accused was charged with testifying falsely, were in fact not signed by her, was admissible to show criminal intent of accused in giving alleged false testimony in annulment proceeding, even though it also tended to show that accused was guilty of distinct crime of forgery.

7. Perjury §32(8)—Physician's testimony regarding facts discovered on examining accused's wife held admissible to show falsity of accused's testimony in marriage annulment proceeding.

In prosecution for perjury, testimony of physician to effect that accused's wife had been examined by him, and that she had not undergone an operation such as accused had testified to in marriage annulment proceeding, held admissible to show falsity of accused's testimony in annulment proceeding.

8. Perjury §32(8)—Testimony that accused lived with wife, contradicting accused's testimony in marriage annulment proceeding, held admissible in perjury prosecution.

In prosecution for perjury in which accused was charged with having testified falsely in action to annul marriage, testimony that accused and wife had lived together for some months after their marriage, in direct contradiction of accused's testimony in annulment proceeding, held admissible.

9. Criminal law §683(1)—Testimony in rebuttal in perjury prosecution covering admissions on part of accused showing that his testimony on direct examination was untrue, held admissible.

In prosecution for perjury, testimony in rebuttal covering admissions on part of accused showing that his testimony on direct examination was untrue, held admissible.

10. Criminal law §656(3)—Comments of judge pointing out to counsel materiality or propriety of testimony in overruling objection held not misconduct.

Trial judge's comments in overruling objections to testimony, pointing out why it was material or proper on cross-examination without expressing any belief as to its truth, held not improper, especially in view of instructions.

11. Criminal law §703—Overstatement by district attorney of what he intended to prove held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for perjury, overstatement by district attorney in opening statement of what he intended to prove held not prejudicial to accused.

12. Criminal law §721½(1)—Calling accused's former wife as witness in perjury trial and later referring to inability to use her because of accused's objection, held not error.

In prosecution for perjury, action of district attorney in calling accused's former wife as witness and in later referring to his inability to use her because of accused's objection held not error.

13. Criminal law §1144(16)—Court cannot presume that jury would disregard evidence showing falsity of material statements and convict accused of perjury on falsity of immaterial statement.

In prosecution for perjury, in which accused was charged with having testified falsely in action to annul marriage, where evidence in case unmistakably showed falsity of other material statements, court could not presume that jury would disregard such evidence and convict accused upon their belief that accused's statement in annulment proceeding that his wife was school teacher and wanted to quit was false.

14. Criminal law §1173(2)—Refusing instruction in perjury prosecution that certain evidence was immaterial held not prejudicial, in view of other evidence.

In prosecution for perjury, in which accused was charged with having testified falsely in action to annul marriage, refusal to instruct that testimony relating to conversation between accused and his wife, covering her desire to quit her position as school teacher, was immaterial, and had not been corroborated, held not prejudicial, where there was evidence which unmistakably showed falsity of other material statements.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Matt Reitz was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried upon an information charging perjury. The appeal is taken from the judgment following the verdict of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The information charged that, in an action instituted by this defendant for the annulment of his marriage to Maybelle Nelson Reitz and pending in the superior court in the city and county of San Francisco, this defendant falsely testified under oath that he had never lived with his wife; that she misrepresented facts to him of which he had no knowledge at the time the marriage was contracted; that, on the night of the marriage, she informed him that "she had an operation performed on her about two years before I married her—a female operation"; that "she could not bear children"; and that he knew nothing of the condition of her organs, as he had no way of finding out and had no relations with her after their marriage.

On this trial it was shown by unimpeached evidence that the annulment proceeding was from its inception a fraud upon the wife and a fraud upon the court. The parties had lived together as husband and wife for several months following the marriage ceremony, and were both residents of Los Angeles county at the time the annulment proceeding was begun. The defendant brought that action in the city and county of San Francisco, where he filed an answer and waiver of notice of trial purporting to have been signed by his wife, but which were shown to have been forgeries. The testimony given by the defendant in that action was brought out by inquiries directed by the trial judge, and it was without doubt the basis of the judgment of annulment which the court entered. That such testimony was false cannot be open to question at this time. The jury believed it to be false, and its finding is supported by convincing proof offered by the state, as well as by the damaging admissions and contradictions made by the defendant while on the stand as a witness in his own behalf. The only element of proof lacking is the direct denial by the wife, and this, of course, was not available to the state because of defendant's objection that she was disqualified from appearing as a witness against him.

[1] On this appeal it is urged that the evidence fails to support the verdict because the testimony charged to have been false was immaterial to the issues of the proceeding in which it was given. The argument is that the annulment proceeding was based upon section 82, subd. 6, of the Civil Code, which specifies as one of the grounds for annulment "that either party was, at the time of the marriage, physically incapable of entering into the marriage state, and such incapacity continues, and appears to be incurable"; that the testimony only went to show that the wife was sterile, or incapable of bearing children, and did not tend to show that she was impotent or physically incapable of coition, the ground specified in the subdivision quoted. The point is argued by appellant at great length and, though the argument is interesting, it is unavailing, for the following reasons: The complaint in annulment, in addition to the charge of impotency, also charged fraud (a ground specified in subdivision 4 of section 82 of the Civil Code); no findings of fact were made, and the judgment does not disclose the grounds upon which it was granted. This being so, we must presume, in support of the integrity of the judgment of that court, that it was based upon the one legal ground put in issue by the complaint—fraud. The circumstances constituting the alleged fraud, as pleaded in the annulment complaint, were "that, prior to and at the time of said marriage, defendant represented as a fact that she was entering into the marriage relations with plaintiff in good faith, and that she would treat plaintiff with consideration and live with him as husband and wife and demean herself accordingly, and that she was physically capable of entering into the state of marriage." It was then alleged that these representations were untrue, that the wife did not enter into the marriage contract in good faith, and that she was "physically incapable of entering into the marriage state."

In Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87, 103, it is said:

"A woman, to be marriageable, must, at the time, be able to bear children to her husband, and a representation to this effect is implied in the very nature of the contract."

See Barnes v. Barnes, 110 Cal. 418, 422, 42 P. 904.

In Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 802, 803, 167 P. 394, 396 (L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184), it is said:

"In consenting to a marriage, * * * each of the parties impliedly promises the other that he or she will perform the duties and obligations of the relation. * * * One who so promises and represents, thus obtaining the consent of the other, with the secret determination not to fulfill the promise, must be held to have obtained such consent of the other party by fraud."

[2] In the section of the Code above noted, fraud is made a ground for annulment unless the other party, with full knowledge of the facts, has freely cohabited as husband or wife. Here the defendant testified that he had knowledge of the facts constituting the "fraud" on the night of the marriage and that he had no relations with his wife at any time. The record on this appeal does not purport to contain all the evidence given at the trial of the annulment suit. It includes the testimony of the defendant charged to be false only. Thus we have no way of knowing what showing was made on the issue of false representations, but it is self-evident that the testimony showing that the parties had never cohabited as husband and wife was the character of testimony which "tends substantially to prove the issues, or to influence the tribunal before whom the proceeding was had." 20 Cal. Jur. p. 1013; People v. Patterson, 64 Cal. App. 223, 229, 221 P. 394. This testimony alone was, therefore, of sufficient materiality as the basis of a charge of perjury, and, the state having in the criminal proceeding proved it to have been false and to have been given under all the legal restrictions defining the crime of perjury, the verdict of conviction is amply supported in the evidence.

[3-5] Criticism is made of the action of the trial court in permitting the state to put in evidence the judgment roll in the annulment proceeding and to tender the testimony of the deputy county clerk and the official court reporter covering the pendency of the proceedings in that court. The judgment roll was properly admitted to show the pendency of the proceeding, the jurisdiction of the court, the giving of the testimony and its materiality. People v. Bradbury, 155 Cal. 808, 815, 103 P. 215. The testimony of the deputy county clerk was admissible for the purpose of showing the regularity of the proceedings and the particular court in which the hearing was held. The testimony of the court reporter was admissible for the purpose of showing that the witness had been regularly sworn and testified in open court upon that trial and also to show the particular testimony given by him on that occasion.

[6] Criticism is also made of the admission of testimony of other witnesses tending to show that the answer and waiver of notice of trial reported to have been signed by the wife were in fact not signed by her, and that all the papers included in the judgment roll had been altered by placing at the top thereof the words "City and County of San Francisco," fixing the venue of that proceeding. This testimony was offered for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff in the annulment proceeding, a resident of the county of Los Angeles, after having exhibited some of these papers to his wife's attorney, had arranged to have them altered so that the proceeding could be brought in the city and county of San Francisco and that court could be lead to believe the wife consented to the proceeding and waived notice of time and place of trial. The purpose of the testimony was to show the criminal intent of the appellant in the giving of the testimony in the annulment proceeding which was alleged to have been false; the fact that it also tended to show that the appellant was guilty of a distinct crime—forgery—cannot affect the admissibility of the testimony in this proceeding.

[7-9] Criticism is also made of the admission of the testimony of the physician, to the effect that she had made a physical examination of the wife of the appellant, and found that she had not undergone an operation such as the appellant had testified to in the annulment proceeding. This evidence, though weak, was admissible, because it tended to show the falsity of appellant's testimony. The same may be said as to the testimony of those witnesses to the effect that the appellant and his wife lived together for some months after their marriage, as this was in direct contradiction of the testimony of the appellant given in the annulment proceeding. Criticism is also made of the admission of the testimony of the witness Pendell, in rebuttal, covering the conversations which he had with appellant relating to the exhibition of the papers in the annulment proceeding to his wife and her attorney prior to the filing of the complaint in San Francisco. The appellant on his direct examination testified that he had shown all these papers to his wife in the office of her attorney, and that she had signed all those to which her signature was attached in her attorney's presence. This was specifically denied by the attorney, who was called as a witness in the perjury trial, and the testimony objected to merely covered admissions on the part of appellant showing that his testimony on direct examination was untrue.

[10] The appellant urges numerous specifications of misconduct on the part of the trial judge which he insists were improper comments upon the facts of the case. These comments were made by the trial judge while ruling upon objections to the admission of testimony in attempting to point out to appellant's counsel from the facts already in evidence why certain proposed testimony to which he objected was material or proper cross-examination. The trial judge did not in any instance intimate to the jury his own view as to the truth of the evidence referred to, and instructed the jury that they should disregard all statements made by him or by counsel and to make their own determination as to the truth of the evidence before them.

[11, 12] The appellant complains of the opening statement made by the assistant district attorney—that it was too long and covered an offer to prove facts which he was not able to make good. As said in People v. Gleason, 127 Cal. 323, 325, 59 P. 592, 593, an overstatement by the district attorney of what he hopes to prove is usually prejudicial to him. There was nothing prejudicial to the appellant in the statement made by the assistant district attorney. The action of the assistant district attorney in calling the former wife as a witness and in later referring to his inability to use her because of appellant's objection is assigned as error. The state, of course, was entitled to call the former wife as a witness, and her testimony could have been received if the appellant had not entered his objection. There was therefore no error in calling this witness to the stand. The assistant district attorney referred to his inability to use the wife as a witness while he was arguing to the trial judge the necessity of giving him a wider latitude in the cross-examination of another witness. The appellant assigned this as misconduct, but did not request an admonition to the jury. Later in the course of the trial the assistant district attorney asked appellant's consent to put the former wife upon the stand to testify as to whether certain writing was hers. The consent was not given, and the remark of the assistant district attorney was assigned as misconduct. Although no admonition to the jury was requested, the court on that occasion did expressly warn the jury to disregard the remarks of counsel.

[13, 14] During the course of the oral argument in this court, the appellant complained of instruction No. 19 given to the jury, wherein the trial judge stated what portion of the testimony given by the appellant in the annulment proceeding was material, and that, if they found that, when such material testimony was given by the appellant, he was under lawful oath and stated such matter to be true, when he knew it to be false, they should bring in a verdict of guilty. The objection is that included in the testimony given in the annulment proceeding which the court held to be material was the statement of the witness that "she (Mrs. Reitz) was a school teacher and she wanted to quit teaching school and thought it made no difference to me"; that the jury therefore might have found that it was untrue that the wife had been a school teacher and wanted to quit teaching school, and could have convicted the appellant upon that statement alone. The argument is overtechnical, because there was no evidence of any character tending to prove that any part of this statement was untrue, and we cannot presume merely on argument of counsel that the jury would have disregarded all the evidence in the case which unmistakably showed the falsity of other material statements and would have convicted the appellant upon their belief that the statement that his wife was a school teacher and wanted to quit was false. In appellant's proposed instruction No. 47, he asked the court to instruct the jury that this portion of the testimony relating to the conversation between the appellant and his wife covering her desire to quit her position as a school teacher was immaterial and had not been corroborated as required by law. The court refused to give the instruction, but, in view of what we have just said, we are satisfied that no prejudice occurred.

We have read the record with care, and are satisfied that the appellant was given a fair and impartial trial, and that the cause went to the jury upon instructions which fully and fairly covered all the material issues.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. YOUNG. (Cr. 998.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 18, 1927.

1. Incest §14—Evidence held to sustain conviction of incest.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of incest with daughter.

2. Incest §16—Instruction in Incest case held not error as authorizing conviction regardless of whether defendant was father of complaining witness, or regardless of when he committed offense.

Instruction in prosecution for incest, that evidence that daughter had sexual intercourse with others was to be considered only in disproof of fact that the condition of her sexual organs was caused by her father, and that if jury believed that he did have sexual intercourse with her to convict though other persons contributed to the condition of her sexual organs, held not error as authorizing conviction regardless of whether defendant was father of complaining witness if he committed offense on date alleged, or regardless of when he committed offense if he was father of complaining witness.

3. Criminal law §822(1)—Last sentence of instruction might not be considered separate from context.

Last sentence of instruction in incest case might not be considered alone separated from the context of the instruction.

4. Criminal law §823(10)—Instruction in incest case held not error as authorizing conviction regardless of whether defendant was father of complaining witness, or regardless of when he committed offense, in view of other instructions.

Instruction in prosecution for incest with daughter, that evidence that daughter had sexual intercourse with others could be considered only in disproof of fact that the condition of her sexual organs was caused by her father, and that if jury believed that he had sexual intercourse with her to convict though others contributed to condition of her sexual organs, held not error as authorizing conviction regardless of whether defendant was father of complaining witness if he committed offense on date alleged, or regardless of when he committed offense if he was father of complaining witness, in view of other instructions.

5. Criminal law §824(1)—Defendant, if desiring more specific instruction, should have requested it.

Defendant, charged with incest, if desiring more specific instruction than one given by court, was bound to request it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Adam F. Young was convicted of incest, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Bell, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. [1] The defendant was convicted of the crime of incest with his daughter. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial. Appellant contends:

"That while there is a direct conflict in the evidence in this case, the testimony of the girl * * * is so inherently improbable that it is not entitled to belief."

The girl testified that the defendant committed the act charged and numerous similar acts. The defendant's son testified that he witnessed the commission of the act. The sheriff of the county testified that the defendant, after his arrest, said:

"I might as well tell you because I did it. * * * I am guilty and I might as well say so. * * * No use to hire an attorney because I can save the money for my wife."

There is other testimony of similar import. There is also testimony to the effect that at different times prior to the alleged act the girl made complaint of the defendant's conduct towards her. The defendant did not testify at the trial. The foregoing evidence is clearly sufficient to support the verdict.

[2-5] The court instructed the jury:

"That any evidence admitted in this case tending to show that any persons other than the defendant, Adam F. Young, had sexual intercourse with Marie Young does not excuse or mitigate his offense if you believe to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he did have sexual intercourse with Marie Young on the date alleged in the information and that she is his daughter. The reputation and character of Marie Young for chastity and virtue are not material in this case. Evidence tending to show that she had permitted others to have sexual intercourse with her is to be considered only in disproof of the fact that the condition of her sexual organs was caused by her father. If you believe from all of the evidence in the case to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he did have sexual intercourse with her, you should find the defendant guilty although other persons contributed to the condition of her sexual organs."

Appellant complains of the italicized parts of the instruction, but it is difficult to understand the nature of his objection thereto. He says:

"The evidence shows beyond dispute that she (the prosecutrix) was the daughter of the defendant. * * * That portion of the instruction was uncertain in its phraseology and would lead a juror of common ordinary understanding to believe he could find the defendant guilty if he found beyond a reasonable doubt that she was the daughter of the defendant. They could draw two conclusions from said instructions: (1) That they could find him guilty if he accomplished the act on the date alleged in the information whether he was the father or not of the complaining witness; or (2) they could find him guilty if he accomplished the act at any time if he was the father" of the complaining witness.

Even a hypercritical examination of the instruction would not warrant appellant's contentions further than that the last sentence, if separated from the context, would lead to the belief that the defendant might be convicted upon proof of acts of sexual intercourse other than the one charged. But instructions are not to be so considered piecemeal. In the instruction quoted, and in another instruction, the court stated that to warrant a conviction the jury must find that the alleged act was committed "on the date alleged in the information." In other instructions the court stated that a verdict of guilty should be returned if the defendant "committed the act as charged in the information." From the instructions as a whole the jury could not have understood that the defendant might be convicted of any offense except the one charged. If the defendant desired a more specific instruction, he should have requested it.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CROSSAN. (Cr. 1492.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 17, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Criminal law §800(2)—Instructions requiring jury to find that aeroplane was operated without "due caution and circumspection" before convicting of manslaughter held not error in failing to define terms (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2).

In prosecution for involuntary manslaughter from operation of aeroplane without due caution and circumspection, brought under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, instruction to consider whether defendant was exercising due caution and circumspection and instructions authorizing convictions if defendant operated aeroplane without due caution and circumspection causing death of decedents held not error because of failure to define term "due caution and circumspection"; it being self-explanatory.

2. Homicide §34—One in charge of thing dangerous in use who fails to take precautions which person of ordinary prudence would use, resulting in death of another, is guilty of manslaughter; "involuntary manslaughter" (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2).

Where one in charge of thing which is dangerous in use fails to take precautions which person of ordinary prudence would use under circumstances and death of another results therefrom, he is guilty of involuntary manslaughter, under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, even though his negligence does not amount to wanton and reckless disregard of human safety or life.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Involuntary Manslaughter.]

3. Jury §62(3)—Statutory provision as to selection of names for jury lists in proportion to inhabitants is directory, and jury commissioner's selection is not to be disturbed in absence of abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 204a, 204e, 206).

Provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 206, that names for jury lists shall be selected from different wards or townships of counties in proportion to number of inhabitants therein, is directory merely, and selection made by jury commissioner, appointed under §§ 204a, 204e, is not to be disturbed in absence of showing of abuse of discretion.

4. Jury §62(3)—Statutory provision as to selection of names for jury lists in counties where sessions of superior court are held in cities other than county seat held directory merely (Code Civ. Proc. § 206).

Provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 206, that where sessions of superior court are held in cities other than county seat names for jury list for sessions in such a city must be selected from township in which city is located, and no names from that township shall be selected to serve in any other part of county, held directory merely.

5. Criminal law §1186(4)—Selection of persons for jury list from improper part of county held harmless error, where defendant did not exhaust peremptory challenges (Code Civ. Proc. § 206; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

That jury commissioner selected at least some of names for jury list from part of county prohibited by Code Civ. Proc. § 206, that at least two of these were drawn for service on jury and one actually served, held harmless error, within Const. art. 6, § 4½, where defendant did not exhaust his peremptory challenges.

6. Criminal law §1186(4)—Failure to comply with statute in selection of jury list held harmless error (Code Civ. Proc. § 206; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Failure of jury commissioner to comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 206, in selecting names for jury list held harmless error, within Const. art. 6, § 4½; there being no showing of prejudice, and defendant not being entitled to any particular juror or to a jury from any particular place.

7. Criminal law ⚡651(1)—View of premises rests in discretion of trial court (Pen. Code, § 1119).

Whether jury shall be permitted to view premises where material fact occurred is matter resting within discretion of trial court, under Pen. Code, § 1119.

8. Criminal law ⚡651(1)—Order directing view held not error in absence of abuse of discretion (Pen. Code, § 1119).

Whether jury shall be permitted to view places where material facts occurred rests in discretion of trial court, under Pen. Code, § 1119, and Court of Appeals might not disturb order directing view by jury of such places where there was no showing of abuse of discretion.

9. Criminal law ⚡1186(4)—Appointing deputy district attorney to show jury places to be viewed, if error, held harmless (Pen. Code, § 1119; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appointment of one of deputy district attorneys in charge of prosecution to show jury places to be viewed, if error, under Pen. Code, § 1119, held not prejudicial but harmless, within Const. art. 6, § 4½.

10. Homicide ⚡163(1)—Evidence of habit to show that defendant, charged with manslaughter, was operating aeroplane close to ground held inadmissible where there were many witnesses (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2).

Admitting evidence of habit of carelessness of defendant, charged with involuntary manslaughter, by operation of aeroplane without due caution and circumspection, under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, for purpose of showing that he was not flying 1,000 feet in the air when his motor stopped, but in fact was flying just above beach where his aeroplane struck decedents, held error, where there were many witnesses to flight of aeroplane.

11. Criminal law ⚡1186(4)—Error in admitting evidence of habit held reversible where, without such evidence, jury might not have convicted (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Error in admitting evidence of habit of defendant, charged with manslaughter, by operating aeroplane too close to ground without due caution and circumspection, under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, for purpose of showing that he was not flying 1,000 feet in the air when his motor stopped, but just above beach where aeroplane struck decedents, held reversible, where court could not say that defendant would have been convicted without such evidence, and not harmless, within Const. art. 6, § 4½.

12. Criminal law ⚡470—Expert testimony in prosecution for manslaughter, that it was not safe to fly aeroplane which was in either of certain conditions, held to invade province of jury (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2).

In prosecution for involuntary manslaughter by operation of aeroplane without due caution and circumspection, brought under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, testimony of experts that it was not safe to fly an aeroplane with a loose magnet or with only one gallon of gasoline in the tank held inadmissible as invading province of jury.

13. Homicide ⚡163(1)—Evidence in prosecution for manslaughter respecting custom of aviators as to inspecting aeroplanes held inadmissible, since care required might not be established by habit of others (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2).

In prosecution for involuntary manslaughter by operation of aeroplane without due caution and circumspection, brought under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, evidence respecting custom of aviators as to inspecting machines before flying them held inadmissible, since standard of care required might not be established by habit of others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Carrol B. Crossan was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: Seawell, Curtis and Shenk, JJ., dissenting.

Paul W. Schenck, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. [1, 2] Appellant was operating an aeroplane, and while it was in the air its engine stopped, making it necessary for him to land. He came down in the surf at Venice, and as he landed the aeroplane struck and killed two young girls who were in bathing. Thereupon an indictment was found against him in two counts, each of which charged the killing of one of the girls as manslaughter. At the trial he was convicted on both counts, and now appeals from the judgments and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant complains that the court wrongly instructed the jury as to the degree of negligence necessary to constitute a case of manslaughter. There was no proof that the operation of the aeroplane at the time and place in question was an unlawful act, or that appellant was operating it in an unlawful manner. The offense of which he was guilty, if any, was therefore involuntary manslaughter of the kind defined in subdivision 2 of section 192 of the Penal Code, as resulting from "the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, * * * without due caution and circumspection."

The court gave the jury instructions defining manslaughter in the language of section 192, and further stated to them:

"In this connection you are further instructed that only the last of these kinds of manslaughter is involved in this case, that is, manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection. Operating an airplane is in itself a lawful act. If you find from all the evidence that the defendant was at the time and place in question operating an airplane, then you must further determine, first, whether operating an airplane is an act which might produce death, and, second, whether the defendant then and there operated an airplane without due caution and circumspection, and thereby caused the death of Madeline Jeannette Kupfer and Litizia A. Normandin, or either of them."

The court also gave two instructions relating to the two counts, in identical language, except as to the name of deceased, one of which was as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant operated an aeroplane within the county of Los Angeles, upon the date charged in the information, without due caution and circumspection, and as a result of the operation of the aeroplane in such manner defendant's aeroplane collided with the deceased, Madeline Jenette Kupfer, and thereby caused the death of said Madeline Jenette Kupfer, you should find the defendant guilty as charged in count I of the indictment."

Appellant criticizes these instructions because they do not define the terms "due caution and circumspection," and also claims that certain instructions requested by him, in which those words were declared to be equivalent to "criminal negligence" and the latter term was defined as "that degree of negligence which is so gross and so flagrant that it indicates to the minds of the jury a wanton and reckless disregard of the rights of others," should have been given. We think both of these contentions are disposed of adversely to appellant by People v. Wilson, 193 Cal. 512, 518, 226 P. 5; People v. Seiler, 57 Cal. App. 195, 201, 207 P. 396, and People v. Anderson, 58 Cal. App. 267, 208 P. 324. In the Wilson Case the Supreme Court said:

"* * * When a person is doing anything dangerous in itself, or has charge of anything dangerous in its use, and acts with reference thereto without taking those proper precautions which a person of ordinary prudence would have used under the circumstances and the death of another results therefrom, his act or neglect is a criminal act against the person so killed even though his negligence does not amount to a wanton or reckless disregard of human safety or life."

In the Anderson Case, where the defendant was convicted of manslaughter, it is said:

"The court instructed the jury quite fully as to the various elements of the crime of manslaughter and in doing so employed the words 'without due caution and circumspection.' The appellant offered and the court refused to give an instruction attempting to amplify the meaning of the words 'due caution and circumspection.' * * *

"Conceding that this proposed instruction is a correct exposition of the law, it adds nothing to the meaning of the words used by the Legislature in defining the offense. The average juror is quite as much enlightened by one as by the other. All the words employed in the expression, 'due caution and circumspection,' are in common and daily use and are understood by the average person. 'Caution' means care to avoid accident or misfortune, but the definition informs us of little more than the meaning accorded to it by mankind in general.

"The instruction of which appellant complains as being inadequate is given in the very words of the statute. 'Negligence,' when so great as to be criminal in character, is stated in the proposed instruction as being the equivalent of want of 'due caution and circumspection.' 'Negligence' is a word that has acquired a highly specialized meaning and whole volumes have been written upon it; but the words 'due caution and circumspection' as used by the trial court have their common and ordinary meaning and no other. When these words are stated to the jury they import to them this common meaning without further amplification. The Supreme Court in a recent case says: 'From this it is argued that the instruction must be condemned as erroneous. But the Legislature has the power to declare what the law shall be on the subject. It has done so by this section. * * * However this may be, it cannot be disputed that error cannot be predicated upon an instruction which states the law as the Legislature has fixed it by statute and which is applicable to the case.' People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, quoting from page 671 (174 P. 892, 897).

"But an attempt to expand upon and define 'due caution and circumspection' would, if successful, be no more when given than a mere 'commonplace'; and it is well settled that giving or refusing a mere 'commonplace' does not constitute reversible error. People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316 (143 P. 317)."

[3] At the trial appellant interposed a challenge to the jury panel on the ground that the jury commissioner appointed for the county of Los Angeles, under the provisions of sections 204a and 204e of the Code of Civil Procedure, had failed to follow the provisions of section 206 of the same Code in making up the jury list. This challenge was denied and he now complains of the ruling as error. Section 206 provides:

"The names for such lists shall be selected from the different wards or townships of the respective counties in proportion to the number of inhabitants therein, as nearly as the same can be estimated by the persons making said lists."

It appears from the testimony of the jury commissioner that he made no substantial effort to comply with this provision of the Code, his method of selection bearing no discoverable relation to the population of the different wards or townships, but he did express an opinion that the result conformed to the provision above quoted "sufficiently for all practical purposes." In view of his testimony as to the manner of selection, this opinion cannot be given any weight, but the provision above quoted from section 206 is directory.

It is intended merely for the guidance of the person making up the list, and, in the absence of some showing of an abuse of discretion by such person, his action should not be disturbed. People v. Danford, 14 Cal. App. 442, 448, 112 P. 474.

[4, 5] Section 206 further provides that where sessions of the superior court are held in cities other than the county seat, as in the county of Los Angeles, where a session is held at Long Beach, the names for such list to serve in such outside city shall all be selected from the township in which said city is located, and no names from such township shall be selected to serve for any other part of the county. In this case the trial was held at the county seat and at least two names of persons who resided in Long Beach were drawn for service on the jury, and one of these persons actually served upon the jury. We think this provision of the Code must also be regarded as directory, and, besides, the defendant did not exhaust his peremptory challenges, and could by the use of one of them have removed the Long Beach juror from the panel, if he had any objection to such juror.

[6] A defendant is entitled to a fair and impartial jury, but not to any particular juror nor to a jury from any particular place, and no contention is made here that the jury was not fair and impartial, or that appellant suffered any prejudice as a result of either of the violations of section 206 complained of. All of these matters are fully within the saving grace of section 4½, art. 6, of the state Constitution. Riley v. Davis, 57 Cal. App. 477, 486, 207 P. 699.

[7-9] Appellant also complains of the action of the court in ordering a view by the jury of the place where the two girls were killed and of certain other places in that vicinity. This order was made on the application of the prosecution, over appellant's objection. To show the place in question, the court appointed one of the deputy district attorneys in charge of the prosecution and offered to appoint also appellant's counsel, but the latter declined to accept the appointment. Objection to the appointment of the deputy district attorney on the ground that he was an interested party was made by appellant and overruled. Under this order the jury were shown not only the place of the killing, but also several other places in that vicinity. As far as we can discover, all of these were places at which facts mentioned in the testimony occurred, and all were within the provisions of section 1119 of the Penal Code, which extends to any place in which any material fact occurred. The matter of a view of the premises is in the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of such discretion. People v. Pompa, 192 Cal. 412, 421, 221 P. 198.

Appellant does not point out to us anything amounting to an abuse of discretion in this case. We have read the record of the proceedings at the view, and, assuming, without deciding, that it was an irregularity to appoint a deputy district attorney to show to the jury the place in question, we are unable to see that appellant was prejudiced thereby.

[10] Just before the time when appellant's aeroplane struck the two girls who were killed, according to the testimony of several eyewitnesses, he was flying his aeroplane southward along the beach, at an elevation variously estimated as from 40 to 150 feet above the sand. In this position he flew over Sunset Pier, rising somewhat as he did so and then coming down, and then flew a distance of several hundred feet to Walters Pier, which he barely cleared, and came down in the water a short distance south of Walters Pier, there striking the two girls. According to some witnesses his motor was still going when he crossed Sunset Pier, but others testified to the contrary. All agreed that it had stopped before he reached Walters Pier. Appellant himself was not a witness at the trial but there were read in evidence, by the prosecution, two statements made by him, in which he claimed that his engine quit working when he was 1000 feet in the air at a point about midway between Venice and Ocean Park and 200 feet out over the ocean; that the only safe place to land was on the beach, so, after trying and failing to start his motor, he glided toward Venice; that he saw an apparent open space on the beach and headed for it, but when he got nearly down saw that there were too many bathers and he would hit some one if he landed there, and then turned out toward the ocean, but the wind threw him against the bathers. Appellant also produced evidence tending to show that if he were at the place he stated when his engine stopped, it was doubtful whether he could have glided back to his flying field before reaching the ground.

The prosecution offered, and the court admitted, a large amount of evidence as to acts of negligent and reckless flying by appellant on other occasions previous to the fatal flight. This was offered and admitted, over objection by appellant on all possible grounds, for the avowed purpose of showing a habit of carelessness on the part of appellant, and thus rebutting his claim that he had used due caution and circumspection on the occasion in question. The evidence so admitted was very voluminous, occupying a large part of the 1,800-page transcript, and showed that on many previous occasions appellant had flown along the beach at a low altitude, barely clearing the numerous piers in that locality, and on some occasions frightening persons who were fishing on them; that about two months before the homicide, when flying low, he had fallen on the beach in the same vicinity; that he made a practice of flying over the boulevard by his airport at a height below the tops of the lamp posts thereon, sometimes stirring up the dust on the pavement with his wheels; that he often flew down near the roofs of houses; that on various occasions he swooped down so close to automobiles that the occupants became alarmed; that at an air meet in Orange county he swooped down over the heads of the crowd while doing stunts, and that a number of police officers went to him, told him they had had complaints of his flying low, and warned him to quit the practice. The question as to the admissibility of this evidence is not altogether free from doubt. In considering it, we must notice the fact that there were numerous eyewitnesses of the fatal occurrence, who testified to appellant's conduct on that occasion.

In Wallis v. So. Pac. Co., 184 Cal. 662, 195 P. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117, the Supreme Court had under consideration a similar question. That was an action for damages for the death of a man who had been struck by a train while driving a wagon over a highway crossing of defendant's railroad. The defendant pleaded contributory negligence, and thus raised the question whether the deceased had stopped, looked and listened before attempting to cross the track. The trial court admitted evidence that the deceased was in the habit of stopping his wagon at railroad crossings and when necessary going ahead to the track to ascertain if a train was approaching. This ruling was upheld, and in making its decision the Supreme Court several times called attention to the fact that there were no eyewitnesses of deceased's conduct at the time of the fatal accident, and the testimony in regard to it was entirely circumstantial. Thereupon the court said:

"The law governing this class of evidence is perplexingly inharmonious. The weight of authority, however, seems to uphold its use under the conditions stated, that there is an absence of satisfactory testimony of eyewitnesses as to the fact in controversy, while other decisions and authorities consider it legitimate evidence without such condition. This limitation upon the introduction of such testimony seems rather illogical. If the fact of the existence of habits of caution in a given particular has any legitimate evidentiary weight, the party benefited ought to have the advantage of it for whatever it is worth, even against adverse eyewitnesses; and if the testimony of the eyewitnesses is in his favor, it would be at least a harmless cumulation of evidence to permit testimony of his custom or habit."

The latter part of the language thus quoted is clearly obiter dictum, in view of the above-mentioned facts of the case, but the court then went on to discuss the matter further and review a number of authorities, finally referring to "the rule admitting evidence of habit to rebut or support conflicting testimony of eyewitnesses, as adopted in this state." A few months later the case of Starr v. Los Angeles Railway Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599, was decided. That was an action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff in alighting from a street car of defendant. One of the acts of negligence testified to by plaintiff was that the conductor of the car was sitting down in the car talking to another passenger when the car stopped for plaintiff to alight. Another witness testified to the same fact. Under these circumstances the court held:

"Evidence as to the previous conduct and habit of the conductor as to sitting down and talking to passengers was improperly received, not only because of the fact that the matter was not in issue, but also because of the fact that his habit was not competent (Langford v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 729, 732, 733 [164 P. 398]; Steinberger v. California Elec., etc., Co., 176 Cal. 386 [168 P. 570]) to establish the condition at the time of the accident. We need not here consider the effect of the exception to this general rule considered in Wallis v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 184 Cal. 662 (195 P. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117), where circumstantial evidence only is relied upon, and there are no eyewitnesses."

[11] We are unable to put any other construction on the language just quoted from the Starr Case than that the court intended to withdraw the dicta contained in the Wallis Case, and limit the admissibility of habit evidence to cases where circumstantial evidence only is relied on and there are no eyewitnesses. Neither can we discover any point of view from which the ruling complained of here appears to be without the scope of the decision made in the Starr Case. The attempt here was to show, by habit evidence, that appellant, instead of being 1000 feet in the air when his motor stopped, as he claimed, was in fact flying just above the beach—a fact exactly analogous to that involved in the Starr Case, and one to which there were many eyewitnesses. Since the Starr Case is a deliberate and carefully considered expression of the Supreme Court on this point, we feel bound to follow it, regardless of any opinion we might otherwise entertain on the matter, and hold that the trial court erred in admitting this habit evidence. The error is unquestionably of so grave a character as to require a reversal. As we have already said, a large part, perhaps exceeding half, of the record is occupied by this evidence, and the impression made on the jury by it must have been such as to bring about a conviction, regardless of any other evidence. The other evidence, while perhaps sufficient to uphold a conviction, is conflicting both as to the facts and as to the possible inferences to be drawn from them, and we cannot say that appellant would have been convicted upon it alone. There was, therefore, a miscarriage of justice, calling for a reversal.

Appellant complains of the ruling by which two police officers were allowed to testify as to their measurement of the amount of gasoline left in the tank of his aeroplane after the accident. We think a sufficient foundation was laid for this testimony. The objections made by appellant go rather to its weight than to its admissibility.

[12] Witnesses were also permitted, over appellant's objection, to testify as experts that flying with a loose magneto, or with only one gallon of gasoline in the tank, is not safe. There was other evidence tending to prove the existence of both of these conditions on appellant's aeroplane at the time in question. This testimony invaded the province of the jury and should not have been admitted. No doubt expert witnesses should be allowed to testify as to the probable consequences of flying with a loose magneto or a small supply of gasoline, but testimony that such flying was not safe went beyond the scope of expert testimony and covered the ultimate fact which the jury were required to determine. 10 Cal. Jur. 1013, 1014.

[13] Evidence was also admitted over appellant's objection regarding the custom of aviators as to inspecting their machines before flying them. This was also error. "The standard of care required of persons under given circumstances is not to be established by proof that others have been in the habit of acting in a certain manner." Rudd v. Byrnes, 156 Cal. 636, 642, 105 P. 957, 960 (26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 134, 20 Ann. Cas. 124).

The judgments and order appealed from are reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. SIGNAL REALTY CO. et al. (Civ. 5568.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 15, 1927.

1. Evidence §474(20)—Striking testimony of defendant's witness as to rentals of building for ensuing 33 years after condemnation of strip of land held proper.

In suit in eminent domain for condemnation of 5 feet along boundary of an avenue, where plaintiff's witness testified that value of property taken was estimated on value it would produce from known rentals, striking testimony of president of landowner corporation that in his opinion amount of damage would be 22 per cent. of income from building for 33 years after condemnation held proper, where his testimony consisted of speculation and conjecture only.

2. Evidence §497—Witness for whose testimony proper foundation is laid may give opinion as to severance damages.

In condemnation suit, where purpose of inquiry is to ascertain damages to remaining property, which is measured by its loss in market value, any witness for whose testimony proper foundation has been laid may give opinion as to severance damage.

3. Evidence §502—Questions concerning collateral subjects which prospective purchaser might ask are properly propounded on cross-examination only or thereafter on redirect examination.

While scope of investigation as to severance damages is within trial court's discretion, questions concerning collateral subjects, touching property which one about to buy would ask, are properly propounded on cross-examination only or on redirect examination, where they have been entered into during cross-examination.

4. Evidence §474(20)—Difference in value of building before and after condemnation must be established by competent evidence and not by fanciful guess.

While measure of damages in condemnation suit is difference between building values before and after condemnation and is determinable by depreciation and reduction of income, such elements must be established by competent evidence and not by mere fanciful guess of witness as bearing on severance damages.

5. Evidence §474(18, 20)—Exception to rule excluding opinion evidence does not permit evidence of owner's idea on value of property taken and of loss to remainder.

In condemnation suit, notwithstanding exception is made in favor of building owners to general rule excluding opinion evidence by witnesses not shown to have special knowledge concerning market value, such exception does not permit owner to state his idea as to value of property taken and of loss to remaining portion.

6. Trial §89—Striking evidence of value of fixtures, cost of removal, and replacement held proper; tenant having right to remove them when lease terminated.

In suit to condemn a 5-foot strip of land along a street on which a building abutted and in which a drug store was maintained under a 5-year lease, striking tenant's evidence as to value of fixtures and cost of removal and replacement thereof was proper, where tenant had right to remove them at termination of lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Suit by the County of Los Angeles against the Signal Realty Company and others. From the judgment rendered, defendants Signal Realty Company and O. E. Culver appeal. Affirmed.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for appellant Signal Realty Co.

Hugh Gordon, of San Francisco, and Benj. M. Stansbury, of Los Angeles, for appellant Culver.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and Leslie R. Tarr, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The respondent filed suit in eminent domain for condemnation of 5 feet along the northerly boundary of certain real property of appellant Signal Realty Company, on the southerly side of Florence avenue, extending easterly 160 feet from Long Beach boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles, for the purpose of widening Florence avenue. Appellant realty company was also the owner of a two-story brick and terra cotta building, which extended 152 feet easterly on Florence avenue and 122 feet southerly on Long Beach boulevard. Appellant Culver occupied a portion of said building, including the corner, in which he maintained a drug store and store-room, under a 5-year lease with an option of renewal for a like term, which said lease had been in effect for a period of 2 years. Referees appointed by the court reported that the appellant realty company was entitled to damages for the value of land to be taken in the sum of $6,023, and for reconstruction of the improvements by use of old material, $24,483, or a total of $30,506. Appellant Culver was awarded nothing. Exceptions to the referees' report having been filed, the court heard evidence and concluded that the realty company was entitled to reconstruct its building with new material, whereupon the award for reconstruction was increased $8,200, making a total compensation of $38,706. As so modified, the report was approved.

Appellants base their appeal upon alleged prejudicial errors in law claimed to have been committed by the trial court in striking out certain evidence, and upon an asserted insufficiency of evidence, as a result thereof, to sustain said award which, it is insisted, would have been materially higher had the stricken testimony been allowed to stand. No question is raised as to compensation for the property taken.

It appears that an expert whose qualifications were stipulated by the parties, testifying for the plaintiff, swore that considering the life of the building at considerably more than that contended for by the defendant corporation, and having allowed the market value of the 5 feet of land, and of the building, together with the expense of tearing down and reconstructing the building for continued use at the same rental per square foot and deducting the rents which the realty company would necessarily be compelled to concede to tenants, he arrived at the amount of compensation fixed by the referees' report. During cross-examination of this witness on behalf of the defendants he testified that in valuing business property with business upon it, it is usual to inquire into the rentals and determine what the property will produce as income property from known rentals, and that this was done in the instant case. The witness Seelig, president of the defendant corporation, had previously testified that he valued the building and the land at $300,000; he said:

"In my opinion the amount of that damage will be 22 per cent. of our income. * * * I figured 22 per cent. of the cost of the land and the building, which is $66,000. * * * I absolutely feel sure, in fact I know I am going to lose $395 per month, which is $4,740 yearly. This represents gross rentals. * * * The figure which I am being paid for the 5 feet of the building is not included in the $66,000 figure, and I am being paid for the reconstruction of the 5 feet of the building that is being damaged, and that figure is not in the $66,000 either. The $66,000 is severance damages. * * * I have seen the figures in the referees' report. The value of the land taken is $6,023, and the value of the improvements is $24,483, less about $1,500 for remodeling, making a total for the land and improvements about $29,000, which, added to $66,000, gives a total of $95,000 compensation. * * * I believe that after the severance of the 5 feet from the land and building that, if we went out in the market to sell that building, based on the new rentals, we could not get much in excess of $200,000 for it, whereas now we think we can get $300,000 for the land and building. * * * In our agreement with Mr. Culver, the lessee of the drug store, the Signal Realty Company is to receive all of the damage which may be done to the leasehold interest, in return for which we have reached an agreement by which we will reduce his rental."

Like reductions in rents were made to other tenants. This witness further testified that, assuming the necessary reconstruction would consume a period of four months, he had allowed his tenants a total reduction in rent amounting to $2,150 for loss of business. Appellant Culver testified that the condemnation of 5 feet of his store space would also take permanent fixtures valued at $1,632, and that in order to resume business he would be compelled to relocate certain other fixtures at a cost of $4,372.50, for both of which items he demanded compensation.

All of this testimony of the two witnesses last mentioned was admitted over objections of the plaintiff, upon the grounds that Seelig's testimony was remote and speculative, and was predicated upon loss of business, and that the evidence given by appellant Culver related to movable fixtures, and to the relocation of fixtures not taken, neither of which was a compensable item. At the conclusion of the hearing upon the referees' report, counsel for respondent moved that all of the testimony of the witness Seelig pertaining to the question of rental for the ensuing 33 years be stricken out, at which time it was agreed by the parties that the witness based his estimated loss of $66,000 upon the fact that the property would be rented for a certain figure for the next 33 years. Respondent also moved that the testimony of appellant Culver as to the value of fixtures, consisting of counters, shelving, showcases, signs, etc., located in the 5-foot strip, and pertaining to the necessity for removal of fixtures and relocation of fixtures, and the cost thereof, be stricken out. The motions to strike were submitted upon briefs, and thereafter each of the motions was granted, and the evidence offered by appellants upon the foregoing elements of damage was eliminated.

Appellant realty company contends that in striking out the testimony which was introduced in its behalf in this regard "and in awarding the Signal Realty Company nothing for severance damage," there remained nothing but the testimony of the respondent's witnesses upon which to base a valuation. It is insisted by respondent that the stricken testimony amounted to nothing more than an attempted showing of loss of income, after proper deductions had already been made by the referees for rents which the appellant company would cease to receive upon severance of 5 feet of the building. As we have heretofore observed from quotations of Seelig's testimony, he maintained that, in addition to about $29,000 which the referees allowed him, he should have $66,000, which he estimated as 22 per cent. of the cost of the land and the building, and almost in the same breath he stated that this latter amount was 22 per cent. of the income, and that it should be added to the amounts allowed for land taken, improvements, tearing down, and reconstruction of the building.

[1-4] We think the testimony was properly stricken, because it consisted of the witness' speculation and conjecture only. Of course, in so far as severance damages are concerned, the purpose of the inquiry is to ascertain the damage to remaining property which is measured by its loss in market value. Any witness for whose testimony a proper foundation has been laid may give his opinion upon this issue. The scope of investigation is largely a matter within the discretion of the trial court. It would not be an abuse of such discretion to permit the witness to state existing facts, such as location and surroundings of the property. San Diego Land & T. Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 P. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604. However, questions concerning collateral subjects touching the property which one about to buy would feel inclined to ask are properly propounded upon cross-examination only or upon redirect examination where they have been entered into during cross-examination. Little Rock Junction Ry. v. Woodruff, 49 Ark. 381, 5 S. W. 792, 4 Am. St. Rep. 51, cited with approval in San Diego Land & T. Co. v. Neale, supra. Put in any event, even such inquiry into collateral issues should be limited to conditions capable of proof, and mere conjectural statements and opinions are not permissible. As we have mentioned, it was stipulated between the parties that the testimony of the witness Seelig that the severance damages sustained would amount to $66,000 was based upon his estimated loss of that amount in rentals during the next 33 years by reason of the loss of the land taken. In making this statement the witness was not relating a fact. He did not pretend to do more than tell the court what he believed would result, based upon his knowledge of the past. This was merely an estimate, and his testimony in that regard was only conjecture. It follows that the portion of the testimony of the witness Frisbie was properly stricken which was given on cross-examination based upon the assumed premise that the statements of the witness Seelig which had been stricken was correct. Authorities cited by appellants to the rule that where a portion of a building is taken the measure of damages to the building is the difference between its value before, and the value of the remainder after, condemnation, and is determined by a consideration of its use, depreciation, reduction of income, etc., are not inconsistent with what has been said herein. These elements are proper to be considered, but they must be established, if at all, by competent evidence and not the mere fanciful guess of any witness as bearing upon severance damages. It is not so much the subject with which the witness Seelig's testimony dealt that is objectionable, but it is its character as being speculative which rendered it incompetent and irrelevant.

[5] A further reason for sustaining the trial court in striking out the evidence is that, although an exception is made in favor of the owners to the general rule excluding opinion evidence of witnesses not shown to have a special knowledge concerning market value, that exception does not go beyond permitting the owner to state his idea as to the value of the property taken and of the loss to the remaining portion. We know of no instance, and are cited to none, in which an owner has been permitted to add to his testimony in that regard by opinion evidence upon collateral matters unless a foundation were first laid for his testimony in the same manner as that of any other witness by proof of his qualifications as an expert.

[6] The only remaining point worthy of discussion is appellant Culver's contention that he should be compensated for removal and damage to or destruction of store fixtures in the portion of the building which was demolished. Again, in this instance, testimony bearing upon the value of the fixtures and the expense of removal and replacement was received over objections of the plaintiff. During Culver's examination he testified that in many respects he was compelled to purchase new fixtures, on account of the necessary rearrangement following the severance of the front of his store. Thereafter, upon motion of the plaintiff, this evidence was stricken out, and such ruling is assigned as error. Appellant's authorities relate wholly to permanent fixtures which constitute improvements in the ordinary use of that term, and we think they are not in point. Appellant's store fixtures consisted of screen doors, shelving, window display cases, signs, awnings, etc., much of which, it is said, were fastened to the building by nails, screws, and bolts. Testifying in his own behalf, however, this appellant said:

"The property I have testified to is property I have paid for. It belongs to me, and I knew when I paid for it that I had a right to remove it at the termination of the lease."

It cannot be doubted that such was the intention of the parties, and there is nothing in the record tending to indicate that the realty company claimed the right to ownership of its tenant's trade fixtures at any time. There is some evidence to the effect that even after severance there would remain more room than was actually utilized by Culver, and while he might prefer to remodel or replace certain fixtures following their removal, at considerable expense to himself, it remains that the plaintiff took no part of his property, and the cost of removal was not a compensable item. In Jahnke v. Jahnke (Cal. App.) 253 P. 752, it was held that as a general rule the question as to whether articles are so affixed as to become a part of the realty is one of fact to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence presented, and that the intent of the parties is the controlling criterion, citing Gosliner v. Briones, 187 Cal. 557, 204 P. 19; Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160; Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 377, 27 P. 750, 13 L. R. A. 680; Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107; Lavenson v. Standard Soap Co., 80 Cal. 245, 22 P. 184, 13 Am. St. Rep. 147; Jordan v. Myres, 126 Cal. 565, 58 P. 1061; Western U. Tel. Co. v. Modesto Irr. Co., 149 Cal. 662, 87 P. 190, 9 Ann. Cas. 1190. Here, as in Jahnke v. Jahnke, "the trial court found by implication at least that the articles of property here involved were not affixed to the building so as to become a part thereof, and thereby constitute a part of the realty, and the findings of the court in this regard seem amply supported by the evidence." A case strikingly analogous to the instant one is N. Y. C. & H. R. Co. v. Albany S. T. Co., 161 App. Div. 329, 146 N. Y. S. 674, wherein it was held that evidence as to the value and cost of removal of personal property was properly excluded. So, too, in Ranlet v. Concord Railroad Corp., 62 N. H. 561, compensation was demand for coal and wood bins and sheds constructed upon the realty, and it was there held that:

"The land covered by the plaintiffs' lease was taken by the defendants in the legitimate exercise of the power of eminent domain. The measure of the plaintiffs' damages was the market value of the unexpired lease, and the excluded evidence could furnish no aid in the determination of that question. Petition of Mt. Washington Road Co., 35 N. H. 134, 146; Col. Const. Lim., 565; Lawrence v. Boston, 119 Mass. 126. As the title to all property is held subject to the implied condition that it must be surrendered whenever the public interest requires it, the inconvenience and expense incident to the surrender of the possession are not elements to be considered in determining the damages to which the owner is entitled. A landowner is not entitled to the expense of removing personal property from the land taken. Cent. Pacific Railroad Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247."

No error appearing, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BLAIR v. WILLIAMS. 86 Cal. App. 676 (Civ. 4481.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 14, 1927.

1. Parent and child $\S$ 3(1)—Father held under primary duty to support child (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 156, 196, 198).

Under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 156, 196, 198, father is under primary duty to support child.

2. Parent and child $\S$ 3(1)—Father, writing nurse, wife, and child to move to his city, where he paid nurse's wages, held liable on contract to nurse for services to child (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 156, 196, 198).

In suit by nurse for value of services rendered in caring for defendant's child, defendant, writing nurse urging her, his wife, and child to move to Los Angeles, where defendant was residing, and paying nurse's wages for some time after she arrived in Los Angeles, held liable in contract as well as under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 156, 196, 198, for wages of nurse and cash advanced by her.

3. Divorce $\S$ 324—Divorced husband held not liable for nurse's services to child after order allowing alimony for support of wife and child understood by nurse to include her wages.

In suit by nurse to recover value of services rendered in caring for defendant's child, evidence that nurse was present in court pending divorce trial between defendant and wife, during which trial amount due nurse was discussed, and order made requiring defendant to pay monthly sum for support of wife and child, and that nurse understood her wages were to be paid by the alimony, showed that nurse no longer relied on contract with defendant, but continued labor with understanding that she was to be paid out of alimony, and hence contract between defendant and nurse was superseded by order for alimony relieving defendant from any liability for nurse's wages subsequent to order.

4. Contracts ⚡167—Applicable laws in existence when agreement is made and state appellate court decisions interpreting laws form part of agreement.

All applicable laws in existence when agreement is made and decisions of appellate courts of state interpreting such laws enter into and form part of agreement as if they were expressly referred to and incorporated in its terms.

5. Parent and child ⚡3(1)—Father is not responsible for support of child awarded to custody of mother either with or without provision for maintenance (Civ. Code, §§ 196, 207).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 196, 207, father is not responsible for support of children after entry of order granting custody of children to mother either with or without their maintenance.

6. Courts ⚡91(1)—Decisions of Supreme Court are binding on appellate court until changed by court or Legislature.

Appellate court is bound by decisions of Supreme Court until it changes its views or Legislature enacts laws to the contrary.

7. Divorce ⚡324—Statutes relating to parent's duty to support child become part of contract between father and nurse for care of child, terminating contractual relation on entry of order for alimony, which thereafter determined defendant's liability (Civ. Code, §§ 196, 207).

Civ. Code, §§ 196, 207, relating to obligations of parents for support and education of child, held written into contract between nurse and father of child respecting care of child, and contractual relation whereby defendant was liable for nurse's wages was terminated on entry of order for alimony in trial of divorce between defendant and wife, and liability of defendant for wages was thereafter limited by order for alimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Agnes Blair against Edward Huntington Williams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lowenthal, Collins & Lowenthal and Victor Ford Collins, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. Defendant and one Beatrice N. Williams were, at the trial of this action and for years prior thereto had been, husband and wife. A son, Ned Williams, was born to them. Some time prior to July 6, 1919, they separated, the defendant coming to California, and his wife and infant son remaining in Montclair, N. J. The court finds, and there is sufficient evidence to support it, that the defendant hired the plaintiff as a nurse for said child, who was then, and up to the time of the trial continued to be a cripple, and practically helpless. On July 6, 1919, from Los Angeles, the defendant wrote to plaintiff urging that Mrs. Williams, the boy, and plaintiff should come to Los Angeles. Later on they did come, defendant defraying part of the expenses of the trip. Upon their arrival defendant located them in a residence, and visited them frequently, almost daily. These mutual relations continued for some time. Defendant likewise contributed to the support of the family, paid the plaintiff her wages from time to time by check, and also on some occasions paid incidental moneys advanced by plaintiff. Defendant and his wife had some sort of a separation agreement, but what it was was not made known to the plaintiff, and it does not appear in the transcript. As stated by the defendant in his opening brief, in October, 1920, the defendant instituted an action for divorce from his wife. In that action, and in February, 1921, the court made an order requiring defendant to pay his wife $300 per month for the support of herself and their infant child, including the nursing of the said son. Subsequently, in the latter part of 1921, the court modified that order. The plaintiff was present in court on both of said occasions, and, although she testified that she did not hear all the court said, yet she did know the objects for which the hearings were held, and that she understood her wages were to be paid from the alimony money. The trial court awarded plaintiff a total judgment of $885, of which $75 was for cash advanced and $810 for wages. We have separated the $810 into two amounts, covering two different periods of time. The first period is up to the first court order for alimony, and the second period for all time thereafter.

Plaintiff's testimony as to the amounts due her during the first period is epitomized as follows:

Balance due for December, 1919, January and February, 1920	$ 35 00
Balance due for wages for May, 1920.....	25 00
Pay for plaintiff increased from $35 to $50 per months in May, 1920.....
Defendant did not pay for November and December, 1920	100 00
Defendant did not pay for January and February, 1921	100 00
Total due for first period.....	$260 00
Total due for second period.....	550 00
Total award of court for wages.....	$810 00
Award of court for cash advances.....	75 00
Total judgment of court.....	$885 00

At the alimony hearing in the latter part of 1921 the court, in the presence and hearing of the plaintiff herein, said to defendant (it does not appear whether it was an order or merely a suggestion) that plaintiff had apparently not received her wages; that Mrs. Williams was supposed to pay her, and that she should be paid the sum of $350; that that was all that was owing her at that time; and instructed defendant to pay plaintiff herein the sum of $100 immediately, and the balance when defendant could. It further appears that defendant paid the said sum of $100 on January 1, 1922, but it does not appear that he has ever paid the balance of $250. It does appear that he paid all alimony orders up to the time of the trial of this action. We therefore hold that the defendant is entitled to a credit on said sum of $260 for the first period in the amount of $100, leaving a balance due for that period of $160.

[1] "Sections 156, 196, and 198 of the Civil Code provide that the primary duty of the father is to support his minor children, that he is the head of the family, that if the support of the father is inadequate the mother must assist him to the extent of her ability." Fox v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 194 Cal. 178, 228 P. 39. In the instant case, particularly having in mind that the child, Ned, is a cripple, and practically helpless, the primary duty to support him was on his father, the defendant herein. The evidence clearly shows that the defendant had assumed this burden until the first order for alimony in the divorce proceeding, but had fallen behind in his payments to the plaintiff in the sum of $260 for wages and $75 for incidentals, as above shown.

While it does not appear in the transcript, we may safely assume that the court order of February, 1921, awarded the custody of the child to the mother, otherwise she would not have been allowed a monthly sum for his support; and it appears from the evidence without conflict that the child was actually in the mother's custody.

[2] Up to the making of this order in February, 1921, the responsibility of the defendant for the plaintiff's wages and cash advanced is perfectly clear, particularly in view of the defendant's letter to the plaintiff of date July 6, 1919, written to plaintiff at Montclair, N. J., urging that Mrs. Williams, the son, and plaintiff should come to California and establish a home. This liability was upon the defendant herein, both by his contract evidenced by said letter and the common law, as well as our state statutes. What effect, then, does the divorce suit and the making of said alimony orders have upon said contract and responsibility?

It should be constantly borne in mind during this discussion that the plaintiff herein knew that the divorce action was pending, was present at all the alimony hearings, knew their purpose, heard the amount due her discussed between the parties to the divorce action and the court, and knew that her back and future wages were to be paid from the alimony money. She testified: "My back wages I understood was to be paid; my wages was to be paid by the alimony." In other words, then, from February, 1921, on she "understood she was to be paid by the alimony"; and this is in keeping with the facts, for the only payments received by her thereafter, except the $100 paid her on January 1, 1922, by the defendant, were from Mrs. Williams.

[3] In speaking of the first court order, the plaintiff testified:

"That was one what the court made, and then Mrs. Williams paid me while she would get the money from the court, and then after that they stopped my payments, because they could not continue paying me. After the court made the order, Mrs. Williams commenced paying me just while she received the $350."

In speaking of the second order she testified:

"After the hearing before Judge Toland I received $100 from Dr. Williams. I did not understand the $100 was in accordance with any directions he received from the court to pay me. I did not receive any other money from Dr. Williams in 1922."

It thus seems clear that plaintiff no longer relied on any contract she had with defendant, but "understood she was to be paid by the alimony," and continued in her labors with that understanding. Therefore, commencing with the court order in February, 1921, the relations of the parties changed, and the contract was superseded by the order for alimony.

[4-6] And we think that plaintiff cannot recover against defendant beyond the court order of February, 1921, for other reasons. "All applicable laws in existence when an agreement is made enter into it and form a part of it as fully as if they were expressly referred to and incorporated in its terms." 6 Cal. Jur. 310, § 186. And decisions of the appellate courts of this state interpreting those laws are likewise a part of such contract. Id. With the foregoing in mind we approach a consideration of the authorities. At the outset it is well to state that, on the question of the responsibility of the father for the support of his children after the entry of an order granting the custody of the children to the mother, either with or without a provision for their maintenance, there is a wide difference of opinion among the courts of the various states. According to some textwriters there are two rules, and the one adopted by California that under such circumstances the father is not liable is the minority rule. 15 A. L. R. 573, note.

But, so long as our Supreme Court has spoken, and until it changes its views, or the Legislature enacts laws to the contrary, we are bound by the utterances of that court. In considering the decisions of our own courts and the courts of sister states following the same rule, there are few decisions dealing with orders entered pendente lite, but, in discussing such an order as the one before us, it has been said:

"The order as finally made has the characteristics of a permanent order; in other words, a final judgment." Davies v. Fisher, 34 Cal. App. 137, 166 P. 833.

With this ruling in thought, let us proceed:

"Interpreting and applying the several provisions of the Code, the decisions of this court are clear to the effect that when there has been a decree of divorce, and such decree vests the custody of the minor children in the mother, the father is under no obligation to provide for such children any support of education beyond that which may be directed by the court which has granted the divorce, either in its decree or by subsequent modification." Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 339, 163 P. 42, 44. (Italics ours.)

"When the court granting the divorce and assigning the custody [of the children] to the wife makes, under the authority of the statute, provision for their support out of the husband's estate, he would seem, upon principles already mentioned, to be relieved from all further obligation." 2 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce (6th Ed.) § 557.

We quote at length from the case of Brown v. Brightman, 136 Mass. 187, for the reason that that case and the instant case are nearly on all fours:

"The plaintiff has boarded and partly cared for the minor child of the defendant for the period of time named in the account annexed to the declaration, namely, three hundred and twelve weeks. Most of that period the mother of the child, who lived with the plaintiff, was away in the daytime at work. During this time the plaintiff cared for the child; but the mother of the child took care of the child at night, and when she was not away at work. A fair price for the board and care furnished by the plaintiff to said child, under all the circumstances of the case, was an average of three dollars for each week during the whole time. The defendant has paid the plaintiff through his wife $35, which was applied by the plaintiff on this account.

"The board and care was furnished under the following circumstances: The mother, previously to the birth of the child, came to live with the plaintiff, with the consent of the defendant, and remained there with her child, with his consent, until the date of the writ. He paid the board of the mother until about five weeks before the child was born. He never lived with the plaintiff. He came to see the child at the plaintiff's house when the child was about ten months old, and never came there afterwards. Subsequently, he removed to Rhode Island, where he has since resided. He never offered to take the child or the mother, or to assume the care of either. On April 21, 1877, the mother, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, but without the knowledge of the defendant, obtained a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court giving her the custody of the child; and, on November 12, 1879, the mother, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, but without the knowledge of the defendant, obtained a decree of divorce from the defendant, with the custody of the child.

"The auditor found that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the board and care of the child for 312 weeks at $3 per week, less the $35 paid by him, amounting to $901, with interest from the date of the writ, unless the obtaining of said decrees, or either of them, by the mother, relieved the defendant from liability from the time of the granting thereof.

"At the trial in the superior court, before Mason, J., without a jury, the plaintiff contended that she was entitled to recover the amount found due by the auditor; and asked the judge so to rule. The defendant contended, and asked the judge to rule, that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, she was entitled to recover only from the time her claim began up to the time of the decree of April 21, 1877, or at most up to the time of the decree of November 12, 1879.

"The judge rules that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only up to the time of the decree of April 21, 1877; and found for the plaintiff in the sum of $175.78. The plaintiff alleged exceptions. * * *

"Colburn, J. By the common law of this commonwealth, the defendant, if of sufficient ability, was under obligation to provide for and support his infant child. Dennis v. Clark, 2 Cush. [Mass.] 347 [48 Am. Dec. 671]. If this case depended upon the common-law liability of the defendant, under the facts found by the auditor, the plaintiff would doubtless be entitled to maintain her action. Reynolds v. Sweetser, 15 Gray [Mass.] 78.

"By the decree of this court in 1877, under the St. of 1874, c. 205, and the further decree of 1879, upon the libel for divorce, the care and custody of his child were taken from the defendant and given to the wife. With these decrees in force, he had no right, either to take the child and support it himself, or to employ any one else to support it, without the mother's consent. The wife had no authority to bind the defendant by a contract for the support of the child, and no contract can be implied upon which the plaintiff can recover in this action. The remedy to secure such provision for the support of the child as the defendant might have the ability to furnish, was under a decree of this court, which it had ample authority to make, in either of the proceedings before it, as part of the original decree, or at any subsequent time. * * * Exceptions overruled." (Italics ours.)

The Supreme Court of Maine, after quoting the above language from Bishop, says:

"It would be unjust to allow both a common law remedy and the statutory remedy to exist at the same time, and it would operate too severely on a husband for him to be constantly exposed to action by his divorced wife and also by strangers to recover of him sums expending by them for the support of his children, over whom he is not allowed to exercise any control." Hall v. Green, 87 Me. 122, 125, 32 A. 796, 797 (47 Am. St. Rep. 311). (Italics ours.)

"Where, pending divorce proceedings, an order for the payment of temporary alimony is made on petition accompanied by the affidavit of a physician setting out in the bill of particulars the value of his services rendered the wife and infant child of defendant, the presumption is that, in the allowance based on such petition, the physician's bill was included, and the allowance is a bar to a subsequent action against the husband by the physician for such services." Hyde v. Leisenring, 107 Mich. 490, 65 N. W. 536, syllabus 1.

In the instant case the plaintiff was present in court, knew the amount due her was discussed and that an order of court was made on such evidence before it. The rule in the Hyde Case is applicable here.

The earlier case of Selfridge v. Paxton, 145 Cal. 713, 79 P. 425, is therefore in point especially when we remember that the plaintiff here was aware of the nature of the preliminary orders entered in the divorce case and was present when they were made. In the Selfridge Case Bessie Paxton sued Blitz Paxton for divorce, and was granted a decree awarding to her the custody of the child, Roma Paxton, but making no provision for Roma's maintenance. Thereafter the plaintiff, a surgeon, with knowledge of the decree, rendered necessary surgical aid to Roma, charged a reasonable amount therefor, sent a bill to the father, and thereafter sued him. The court said, on pages 715 et seq. (79 P. 426):

"It is apparent that the evidence does not show any contract, either express or implied, on the part of defendant Blitz to pay for the said services rendered Roma; and the court does not find any such contract. The finding merely is, that the appellant was notified of the illness of Roma and did not object to respondent's services. The case, therefore, seems to present the naked legal question whether under the law of this state a third person can recover of a father for necessities furnished his infant child when by a decree of court the care, custody, and control of the child has been taken away from him and given to the mother, who, to the knowledge of the person furnishing the services, is exercising such custody under such decree [Italics ours.]; and our opinion is, that this question must be answered in the negative. * * * The law as to the liability of a parent for necessities furnished the child comes within the declaration of section 4 of the Civil Code of this state, that 'The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates.' The Civil Code, commencing with section 193, under the caption of 'Parent and Child,' clearly 'establishes the law' respecting the rights, duties, and liabilities which arise out of that relation; and the law touching the question involved in the case at bar is found in sections 196 and 207. These sections are as follows:

"196. Obligations of Parents for the Support and Education of Their Children. The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. If the support and education which the father of a legitimate child is able to give are inadequate, the mother must assist him to the extent of her ability.'

"207. When a Parent is Liable for Necessaries Supplied to a Child. If a parent neglects to provide articles necessary for his child who is under his charge, according to his circumstances, a third person may in good faith supply such necessities, and recover the reasonable value thereof from the parent.'

"By these sections the duty to support a child, and the liability to the third person for necessities furnished it, are clearly confined to a parent 'entitled to the custody' of the child, and having it 'under his charge'; and no such liability attaches to a parent who has been deprived of such custody and charge. * * * In Ex parte Miller, 109 Cal. 648 [42 P. 429], Justice Temple, in a concurring opinion, says: 'When a parent is deprived of the custody of his child, and, therefore, of the right to its services and earnings by a summary proceeding, he is no longer liable for its support and education.' This is true as a general proposition of law, and it is recognized by our Code. Section 196 of the Civil Code provides that a parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances, plainly implying that the parent does not owe that duty to a child when he is not 'entitled to its custody.'" And he further refers to section 207 as providing that when a parent neglects to provide the necessities for a child 'who is under his charge, then third persons may do so, and recover the value'; and he further says that in no instances except those specially provided for in the Code 'has the court power to deprive the parent of his authority and yet hold him liable for the maintenance of his child.' Whatever may be thought as to how the law should be on this subject, we must take it to be as it is written in the Code. * * * Of course, the court when rendering a judgment of divorce may provide for, and generally does provide for, the maintenance of the children of the parties; and it may afterwards so provide when it appears necessary."

This position of our Supreme Court has never been reversed, and has been approved in Pacific Gold Dredging Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 465, 194 P. 1, 13 A. L. R. 725. To the same effect are Crittenden v. Schermerhorn, 39 Mich. 661, 33 Am. Rep. 440; Hyde v. Leisenring, supra; Hall v. Green, 87 Me. 122, 32 A. 796, 47 Am. St. Rep. 31, and Ryder v. Perkins, 219 Mass. 525, 107 N. E. 387.

[7] It follows, then, that the provisions of sections 196 and 207 of our Civil Code, as interpreted by our appellate courts as above set forth, were written into any contract between plaintiff and defendant respecting the care of defendant's child, and therefore, upon the entry of the order for alimony, particularly with plaintiff's knowledge, the contractual relation ceased, and the liability of the defendant thereafter limited to the payment of the said order according to its terms. As the Court of Appeals of Maryland has well said:

"The father was under the common law obligation to support his child during its minority, and this obligation continued without regard to a divorce decree, unless in that decree the court should order that it be supported by some one other than the father. The fact that the decree ordered the father to pay $3 per week to the mother for the support of the child, in no way affected his common law obligation to support it, but only prescribed the amount to be paid for its support, and through whom the child was entitled to receive it." Blades v. Szatai, 151 Md. 644, 647, 135 A. 841, 842 (50 A. L. R. 232). Italics ours. In this case the orders made by the court, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, "prescribed the amount to be paid for its support, and through whom the child [and its creditors] was entitled to receive it."

Under statutes quite similar to ours the Supreme Court of Nebraska has held:

"When, in a divorce action, there has been such a judicial ascertainment of the amount the father should pay for the support of his minor children, that amount is presumed to be just and reasonable until it is reversed or modified by a subsequent order of the court. The amount thus ascertained, so long as the decree remains in full force, is, in this state, the legal measure of the father's liability for the support of such children. * * * While the decree in the divorce action, awarding the custody of the minor children to the mother and providing an allowance for their support and maintenance, remains in force, the father is not required to provide food, clothing and shelter for his minor children, the measure of his liability in that respect being the amount provided in the decree." Dimond v. State, 110 Neb. 519, 194 N. W. 725.

Although in this case the plaintiff well knew of the divorce proceeding and the alimony orders made thereunder, and is therefore bound by that knowledge, it has been held that a father is not liable for medical attention furnished the child by a physician who was ignorant of such state.

"Where a husband and wife are living * * * apart, and there are separate maintenance proceedings pending in which there is an order for alimony pendente lite, and the husband is not in default on that order, he is not liable for medical services subsequently furnished during the pendency of the suit, and it is immaterial that the physician knows nothing about the litigation, since he is put on inquiry." Steele v. Leyhan, 210 Ill. App. 201.

In the instant case the plaintiff not only was put upon inquiry, but had actual knowledge of the orders.

We are therefore of the opinion that the judgment of the trial court, in so far as it awards any amount to the plaintiff for services performed and moneys advanced after the order of February, 1921, in the divorce case, is erroneous, and should be modified. As we have already stated, prior to said February order in the divorce action there was due the plaintiff the sum of $335 for wages and cash advances, on which was paid the sum of $100 on January 1, 1922, leaving a balance of $235.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment heretofore entered herein be reduced to $235, and that, as so modified, it be affirmed, each party to pay his own costs on this appeal.

YORK JUNCTION TRANSFER & STORAGE CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 9811.)★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1927.

Rehearing Denied with Modification Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨367—Furniture repairer held employee of transfer company, and not independent contractor.

In workman's compensation proceeding, facts held to warrant finding of Industrial Accident Commission that claimant, employed to repair furniture at $.75 per hour for transfer and storage company, under an agreement to do all its repair work at its shop or at houses to which company would transport him, was an employee, and not an independent contractor, at the time of accident.

2. Master and servant ⇨367—Right of control determines whether workman is independent contractor or employee.

Right of control, and not the actual giving of specific directions or control of method of doing work, determines whether workman is independent contractor or employee.

3. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Industrial Accident Commission's finding is conclusive, if sustained by evidence.

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that relation of employer and employee exists, if warranted by the evidence, is binding on reviewing court.

4. Master and servant ⇨403—Burden was on employer to show compensation claimant performing services was independent contractor, and not employee (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, § 8, subd. [b]).

Where compensation claimant was rendering services for employer at time of his injury, there was a presumption under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, § 8, subd. (b) (St. 1917, p. 835) that he was an employee, until employer and insurer proved that he was an independent contractor, and burden of proof was on them.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act for injuries by Arthur Eckstrom, claimant, opposed by the York Junction Transfer & Storage Company, employer and the Zurich Accident & Liability Insurance Company, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded the claimant compensation, and the employer and insurance carrier bring certiorari. Award affirmed on hearing after LANGDON, J. This is an application by an employer and its insurance carrier for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to respondent Arthur Eckstrom for injuries which he received in an automobile collision. The commission found that Eckstrom sustained these injuries in the course of and arising out of his employment; that he was performing services as an employee of the Transfer & Storage Company, and was not, at the time of his injury, acting as an independent contractor. The award made was of the sum of $20.83 weekly, during the period of disability.

The petition for review shows the facts to be that Eckstrom was a furniture repairer and finisher and operated a shop in the city of Los Angeles, where his work was generally done; that he held himself out to the public as an expert cabinetmaker and furniture repair man, furniture polisher, upholsterer, and mattressmaker, and that he did work for the general public; that the Transfer & Storage Company, in their business of moving furniture, from time to time, broke or damaged some of this furniture and, thereupon, would take such furniture to the shop of Eckstrom, where it would be left for repair at a fixed price; that on or about the 2d day of October, 1925, one of the copartners of the Transfer & Storage Company went to the shop of Eckstrom and informed him that some furniture had been damaged by the company, and asked Eckstrom to accompany him to the house into which the furniture had been moved and there repair such furniture; that no price was agreed upon for such work, but Eckstrom based his charges upon an hourly rate of pay; that the Transfer & Storage Company transported Eckstrom to the house in which the damaged furniture was to be repaired, and Eckstrom completed the work without advice or direction from the Transfer & Storage Company as to method of work; that after the work had been completed the Transfer & Storage Company undertook to transport Eckstrom back to his shop, and in doing so the collision and injury occurred.

It is alleged in the petition that after the award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Eckstrom, the employer and insurance carrier petitioned said commission for a rehearing, which petition was denied.

The grounds urged for a reversal of the award by this court are that the commission acted in excess of its jurisdiction, and that the facts established do not support the award; that the award is unreasonable, and there is no evidence that Eckstrom was an employee of the Transfer & Storage Company at the time of his injury.

[1, 2] The determination of the status of Eckstrom is the key to all the objections. The facts with reference to such status were that Eckstrom did not work "full time" for the Transfer & Storage Company, but he had made an agreement with that company whereby he was to do all their repair work, either at his shop or at houses to which they would transport him, and he was to be paid for such work at the rate of 75 cents an hour for the time spent upon the work and in going back and forth when the work was outside of his shop, and he had been working under this agreement for three years. On the occasion in question he was taken to the house where the work was to be done by the employer and the employer remained there, indicating the work to be done, until it was finished, and then undertook to transport the employee to his shop. It does not appear that there was any occasion for specific directions or control of the method and manner of doing the work, or that control was exercised by the Transfer & Storage Company. However, this is not vital to the status of Eckstrom as an employee, if the right of control existed. As was said in Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570:

"One of the best tests to determine whether the relation between the parties is that of an independent contractor or of employer and employee is the right of control; and it is not the fact of actual interference with the control but the right to interfere, that makes the difference between an independent contractor and a servant or agent."

[3] It is conceded by the respondent commission that the situation would support a finding either that Eckstrom was an independent contractor or that he was an employee, and we think that is the most that can be said in favor of petitioners. Under such circumstances, the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission is binding upon this court. Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Com., supra.

The case of Victory Auto Painting Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 75 Cal. App. 729, 243 P. 61, presents a situation similar in many respects to the situation in the instant case, and in the case cited the injured man was held to be an employee, although working for the employer at an hourly rate of wage and merely on occasional jobs, while maintaining his own shop in which to do work for other persons when not engaged in work for the employer.

Moreover, section 8, subd. (b) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 835) creates a presumption of status of employee upon a showing of services rendered. "Any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, is presumed to be an employee within the meaning of this act."

[4] It is not disputed that Eckstrom was rendering services for petitioner at the time of his injury. This raises a presumption that he was an employee until the petitioner has proved the defense that he was an independent contractor. The burden of proving that Eckstrom was an independent contractor was upon the petitioner. Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570; County of Monterey v. Ind. Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 221, 248 P. 912, 47 A. L. R. 359; Victory Auto Painting Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., supra.

The commission has found, upon facts sufficient to sustain the finding, that the injured man was an employee and not an independent contractor.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

JACKSON v. DOLAN et al. (L. A. 9060.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 345(1)—On reversal of order granting new trial, judgment stands as originally entered, as regards time for appeal (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, as amended by St. 1915, p. 205).

On reversal of order granting new trial, no new judgment is entered, but judgment as originally entered stands as judgment in action, and has effect from date of its original entry in determining time for appeal under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, as amended by St. 1915, p. 205.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 345(1)—Appeal from judgment more than three months after entry, but within one month after going down of remittitur on reversal of order granting new trial, held not timely; "other termination" (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 660, as amended by St. 1923, p. 234, $\S$ 939, as amended by St. 1915, p. 205).

Appeal taken from judgment more than three months after entry, but within one month after going down of remittitur on reversal of order granting new trial, held not taken within "thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion for new trial or other termination," and therefore subject to dismissal as not taken in time under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 660, as amended by St. 1923, p. 234, $\S$ 939, as amended by St. 1915, p. 205, where motion was improperly granted after judge's term had expired; "other termination" including termination of new trial proceedings by operation of law.

SHENK, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff rendered by the superior court in and for the county of Imperial. The action is one to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, which were alleged to have been caused through the negligent operation of an automobile. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict in the sum of $1,000 was returned in favor of the plaintiff. Judgment was entered on the verdict on December 15, 1920. On December 17, 1920, the defendants moved for a new trial. The minutes of the court as originally recorded showed that the motion was granted as to the defendant Ashe and denied as to the defendant Dolan on Friday, December 31, 1920. Within due time the plaintiff served and filed his notice of appeal from the order granting the motion for a new trial to the defendant Ashe. On March 23, 1921, and pending the determination of his appeal from the order granting the new trial, the plaintiff filed in the trial court a notice of motion to direct the clerk of said court to correct its minutes so as to show that the order purporting to grant a new trial to the defendant Ashe had in fact been made and entered on Sunday, January 2, 1921, and not on the preceding Friday, as the minutes of the court then indicated. The significance of the motion to have the minutes corrected lies in the fact that the term of office of the superior judge who made the order granting the new trial had expired on December 31, 1920, the day the order bore date. After hearing, the trial court made an order denying the plaintiff's motion to correct the minutes. Upon an appeal therefrom the District Court of Appeal reversed said order, with directions to the trial court to ascertain the true date of the order granting the new trial and to correct its minutes accordingly. Jackson v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315. Thereafter the plaintiff renewed in the trial court his motion to correct the minutes, whereupon, on May 16, 1924, the court made its order correcting its minutes. As corrected, the minutes show that the order granting the new trial was made and entered on Sunday, January 2, 1921, which was two days after the expiration of the term of office of the judge purporting to make the same. The defendant Ashe appealed from the order of the trial court correcting its minutes, and this appeal terminated in an affirmance of the order. Jackson v. Dolan, 72 Cal. App. 48, 236 P. 318. On the same day, to wit, March 27, 1925, the District Court of Appeal filed its decision reversing the order of the trial court granting the defendant Ashe a new trial. Jackson v. Dolan, 72 Cal. App. 51, 236 P. 319. On May 21, 1925, and within 30 days after the decision reversing the order granting to him a new trial had become final, the defendant Ashe filed his notice of appeal from the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff on December 15, 1920. The appeal last mentioned is the one now sought to be dismissed. The ground of the motion is that the appeal was not taken within the time prescribed by law in which an appeal may be taken from a judgment.

The respondent contends that, as the District Court of Appeal has declared that the order purporting to grant the new trial was a nullity, and that the motion for a new trial was denied by operation of law at the expiration of two months after the rendition of the verdict (section 660, Code Civ. Proc.;

Jackson v. Dolan, 72 Cal. App. 51, 236 P. 319), the time within which an appeal could have been taken from the judgment began to run from such denial, and expired 30 days thereafter, under section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant contends that, as his motion for a new trial had been granted, the time for taking an appeal from the judgment was suspended until the order granting a new trial was reversed and the remittitur had gone down, at which time, and not until then, he contends, the time for taking an appeal from the judgment began to run. He bases his contention on the provisions of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1915. The portion of the section inserted by the amendment is as follows:

"If proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until 30 days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion for a new trial, or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion."

It is insisted that the going down of the remittitur to the trial court reversing the order granting the new trial was other termination in the trial court of the proceedings on said motion as contemplated by the amended Code section.

[1, 2] We think that the position of the respondent must be sustained. When the trial court enters an order denying a new trial, the time for an appeal from the judgment immediately begins to run. This is the established practice, and, of course, is not disputed. Prior to the amendment of 1915, in cases where the court entered an order granting a new trial, the time for appeal from the judgment likewise immediately began to run. True, there is confusion in the earlier authorities on this point. For example, in the case of Kower v. Gluck, 33 Cal. 401, a case relied on by appellant, it was said that an order granting a new trial had the effect to vacate the judgment from which the defendants appealed, "and hence their appeal is inconsequential, and must be dismissed." In that case the order granting a new trial was affirmed, and under such circumstances the appeal from the judgment was necessarily inconsequential. But that case was cited with apparent approval in Knowles v. Thompson, 133 Cal. 245, 65 P. 468, as authority to the effect that an order granting a new trial has the effect of vacating the judgment, "and the party cannot thereafter proceed on said judgment by appeal therefrom or otherwise." In the last case cited, Bronner v. Wetzlar, 55 Cal. 419, was approvingly cited to the effect that an order granting a new trial vacated the judgment, and the judgment no longer existed for the purpose of appeal. In the Knowles Case it doubtless escaped the attention of the court that in Pierce v. Birkholm, 110 Cal. 669, 43 P. 205, this court held that the statement in Kower v. Gluck was not authoritative because unnecessary to the determination of the question involved in the appeal. The same may be appropriately said of the Knowles Case and the Bronner Case. In the case of Puckhaber v. Henry, 147 Cal. 424, 81 P. 1105, this court discussed a situation almost identical with the one involved herein. It was there held that an appeal from a judgment taken within the statutory time would be dismissed, unless the appeal so taken was perfected within the time limited by the rules of court. In that case the trial court had granted a new trial. The adverse party had appealed from the order granting the same, and such appeal was then pending. In her opposition to the motion to dismiss her appeal from the judgment, the appellant contended that she should be protected so that, in the event the order granting a new trial be reversed, she might then proceed with her appeal from the judgment. This court said:

"If an appellant from such a judgment is not satisfied to rest upon the subsequent order which he obtains granting him a new trial, it remains his duty to prosecute his appeal from it with diligence. If, upon the other hand, he is satisfied with the security afforded him by the order granting him a new trial he may submit with complaisance to a dismissal of his appeal from the judgment. It would subject the adverse party to an unjust and unwarranted delay if, as here, after prevailing upon his appeal from the order granting him a new trial, he was still to be confronted with the postponed appeal from the judgment which had been left slumbering to abide the issue of the appeal from the order."

In Mountain Tunnel G. M. Co. v. Bryan, 111 Cal. 36, 43 P. 410, it was held that an order of the trial court granting a new trial, until affirmed on appeal or until the time to appeal therefrom has expired, does not have the effect of vacating the judgment so as to prevent an appeal from being taken therefrom. Certain rights under the judgment are suspended, but it is still a potential judgment sufficient to support an appeal taken from it. Puckhaber v. Henry, supra. Upon a reversal of an order granting a new trial, the law does not provide for the entry of a new judgment in the trial court on the going down of the remittitur, but the judgment as originally entered in that court stands as the judgment in the action, and has effect from the date of its original entry. Pierce v. Birkholm, supra; 2 Cal. Jur. 148.

In determining the effect of the amendment of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1915, a reference to the statutes of that year discloses that, by an amendment to section 660 of the same Code, it was provided that the power of the court to pass on a motion for a new trial should expire within three months after the verdict of a jury without further order of the court. Stats. 1915, p. 202. By amendment in 1923 the time was changed from three months to two months. Stats. 1923, p. 234. In 1915 the Legislature amended said section 939 by enactment subsequent to the enactment amending said section 660 (Stats. 1915, p. 205), and inserted the language especially relied on by appellant. It would seem to be clear that the words "other termination in the trial court" were intended by the Legislature to refer to the termination in the trial court of the proceedings on motion for a new trial by operation of law, as the same had been provided for in the prior enactment at the same session amending said section 660. There is no indication in the statute of an intention to enlarge the time for an appeal from the judgment. If it were intended to postpone the time for such an appeal until the final determination of the new trial proceedings on appeal, it would have been an easy matter for the Legislature to have so indicated. On the contrary, it was provided that the termination of such proceedings in the trial court should set the time for an appeal from the judgment in motion. We conclude that the going down of the remittitur was not such termination of the new trial proceedings in the trial court as was contemplated by the amended section. Furthermore, such a prolonged extension of time for taking an appeal from the judgment as is now claimed by appellant, would seem to be entirely out of harmony with the manifest purpose of the legislative branch to expedite and hasten the disposition of causes on appeal.

It is earnestly insisted by appellant that to dismiss his appeal under the circumstances here shown would be tantamount to a denial of the right to appeal. But such is not the case. He had his right of appeal from the judgment within the statutory time, and, not having availed himself of that right, he must be deemed to have assumed the consequences of his failure to act. The motion is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy and Franklin J. Cole, Judges.

Action to quiet title by Kathryn W. Hutton against William Chapman and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 253 P. 942.

Charles Lantz, W. P. Hyatt, and F. C. Huber, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles S. Conner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to quiet her title to certain real property situate in the county of Los Angeles. The court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and entered judgment as prayed for. From this judgment the defendants prosecuted their appeal.

It appears that a mortgage had been executed upon the said real property at a time prior to the commencement of this action to quiet title, which is based in part upon respondent's asserted redemption of the property after foreclosure sale. The foreclosure sale was conducted by an elisor regularly appointed by the superior court, wherein the foreclosure proceedings had been litigated. In this connection the court in this action found, among other things:

That "it is true that, prior to the expiration of the time for redemption, the plaintiff herein became seized and possessed of the title to said real estate and was desirous of redeeming said real estate from the lien of said mortgage and the said judgment and decree and the said sale. That she was ignorant of and not informed of the appointment of said Garroway as elisor, and did not know that a sale had been made by him as elisor, and did, on the 25th day of November, 1922, apply to Messrs. Charles Lantz, W. P. Hyatt, and F. C. Huber, attorneys for said William Chapman, at their office at 314 Wilcox building, city of Los Angeles, to make the said redemption. That for the purpose of such redemption and that the plaintiff herein might receive a certificate of redemption it was agreed by and between Charles S. Conner, attorney for the plaintiff herein and the attorneys for said William Chapman, aforesaid, at their office aforesaid, that the attorneys for the plaintiff, Kathryn W. Hutton, and the defendant William Chapman should meet on the 27th day of November, 1922, at the office of the sheriff of said Los Angeles county in the city of Los Angeles and perfect said redemption, and the plaintiff, by and through her said attorney, Charles S. Conner, at the time agreed upon and at the office of said sheriff as agreed upon, appeared for the purpose of said redemption, but the attorney for the said defendant William Chapman did not appear as agreed or at all and the plaintiff, acting by and through her attorney duly authorized thereunto, the said Charles S. Conner, and being ignorant as to the whereabouts of the said Garroway, applied to this honorable court, to wit, Frank R. Willis, judge thereof, as to how and in what manner such redemption might be made, and the said court, on the 27th day of November, 1922, made and entered its order of redemption in said cause No. B44611 in the words and figures, following, to wit:

"Good cause being shown, it is ordered that the entered amount of money in the case necessary for the redemption be paid by Kathryn W. Hutton as successor in interest to certain defendants herein and be paid to the county clerk of this county in lieu of the payment to the purchaser or the elisor who made the said sale. [Signed] Frank R. Willis, Judge."

"That pursuant to the said order and the provisions thereof the plaintiff herein did deposit and paid to the clerk of said court the sum of $2,000 for the use and benefit of said William Chapman in the redemption of said real estate and the whole thereof sold as aforesaid. That the sum of $2,000 was sufficient and more than sufficient to redeem the said property from said sale, and that by reason of such payment the plaintiff herein claims the right to have the title of said real estate and the whole thereof quieted in her favor and against the defendants."

Our examination of the record discloses that the foregoing finding has ample support therein.

It is contended by the appellants that the respondent's purported redemption of the property was ineffective for any purpose in that she failed to comply with the provisions of section 704 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which require that redemption payments "be made to the purchaser or redemptioner, or for him, to the officer who made the sale." As appears from the above-quoted finding, the respondent's redemption payment was, pursuant to order therefor, made to the clerk of the superior court wherein the foreclosure proceedings had been heard. While we are aware that the right and procedure to redeem property sold under execution are statutory (Bangham v. Michael, 179 Cal. 390, 177 P. 161), yet we are of the view that respondent's payment into court of the redemption money, though not a strict compliance with the provisions of section 704 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was sufficient compliance therewith to accomplish the desired result. An elisor is but an officer of the appointing court, and it would seem, therefore, that respondent's payment into court, under the circumstances presently to be narrated, should be held to constitute payment to such officer. There is evidence in the record which tends to disclose that earnest effort had been made on behalf of the respondent to ascertain the whereabouts of the officer who had conducted the foreclosure sale in order that the contemplated redemption might be successfully effectuated. Inspection of the Los Angeles city directory revealed to counsel for respondent that the elisor maintained a joint office with counsel for the appellant Chapman, the then holder of the certificate of sale issued by such elisor. The testimony of the elisor likewise indicates that his office address was, for a time at least, identical with that of counsel for the appellant Chapman. Inquiry for the elisor at that office failed to bring the parties together. In view of this apparently sincere but fruitless effort to find the officer who had conducted the foreclosure sale, and in view of the finding of the trial court that appellant Chapman's counsel neglected to keep an appointment with respondent's counsel to complete and effectuate a redemption of the property, we are of the opinion that respondent's payment into court was sufficient compliance with the statutory provisions to work a redemption of the property here involved. We have examined and considered the numerous other contentions advanced by the appellants, and have found therein nothing that would suggest a conclusion differing from that announced.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MILLS v. PFEIFFER.

1. Wills ⇐55(7)—Evidence held not to show testamentary incapacity of man 93 years of age.

Evidence that man of 93 years of age took interest in management of property, and made decisions respecting it, and kept track of his money matters in general way, but not showing he was unable to understand nature and extent of property or natural objects of his bounty, held not to show testamentary incapacity.

2. Wills ⇐55(1)—Where testimony as to mental incapacity conflicted, trial court had discretion to resolve conflict one way or another.

Where testimony in will contest conflicted as to mental condition of testator at the time of execution of will, trial court had discretion to resolve conflict one way or the other.

3. Wills ⇐52(1)—Contestant had burden to show testator's mental incapacity.

Where will was contested for testator's mental incapacity, burden to show incapacity was on contestant.

★Rehearing denied.

4. Evidence $\S$ 553(4)—Hypothetical question, assuming that testator drafted will unassisted, held improper under evidence.

In will contest, hypothetical question, propounded by contestant to expert, which assumed that testator drafted will unassisted by any one, was improper, where evidence showed testator did not prepare draft of will unassisted.

5. Wills $\S$ 166(2)—Evidence held not to show that 93 year old testator was unduly influenced by manager of his household.

In contest of will, where man of 93 years of age distributed his property by will, leaving bulk thereof to widow who managed his household, evidence held not to show that legatee unduly influenced making of the will.

6. Wills $\S$ 286—Proponent of will, not having denied allegation that contestant was beneficiary, thereby admitted that contestant had interest to contest.

Where proponent of will did not deny allegation of written opposition that contestant was beneficiary under prior will, by her failure to deny allegation of interest, she admitted that contestant had sufficient interest to contest subsequent will, and hence finding of trial court that contestant lacked interest was without supporting evidence.

7. Wills $\S$ 384—Contestant was not prejudiced by finding he had no contesting interest, where, had court found otherwise, judgment admitting will to probate would nevertheless stand.

In will contest finding that contestant had no interest to contest will was without prejudice to contestant since, if court had found contestant had interest, judgment admitting will to probate would nevertheless stand.

8. Executors and administrators $\S$ 16—Where contestant named as executor refused to sign petition for probate of will, he renounced right to serve as executor.

Evidence that contestant, named as executor in will, refused to sign petition for probate of will, held to authorize finding that contestant renounced his right to serve as executor and to authorize appointment of proponent, named as executrix, as sole personal representative.

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 77(2)—Minute order denying probate of prior will and admitting last will to probate, but providing for submission of findings and conclusions, was not appealable.

Where minute order, stating that testator's prior will be denied probate, and that last will be admitted to probate, was not a final determination of trial court, since there was incorporated therein a direction for proponent to submit draft of findings of fact and conclusions of law, appeal from such minute order was improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Fred Phillips, deceased, Kathryn Pfeiffer petitioned for probate of decedent's will, and George E. Mills contested. From a judgment admitting the will to probate, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment admitting to probate the last will and testament of Fred Phillips, deceased. The proponent and respondent, Mrs. Kathryn Pfeiffer, and the contestant and appellant, George E. Mills, are strangers to the blood of the deceased. They will be referred to as the proponent and contestant.

On the 10th day of January, 1925, the proponent filed in the superior court, in and for the county of Los Angeles, her petition for the probate of a will of decedent dated February 3, 1922. In addition to formal allegations, she alleged that Fred Phillips died on the 15th day of December, 1924, in the county of Los Angeles, leaving an estate therein, consisting of real and personal property producing an approximate annual revenue of $10,000; that she and the contestant were named in said will as executrix and executor thereof; that the contestant refused to sign the petition for probate of said will, and had renounced his right to appointment as executor; that the decedent left no next of kin or heirs at law, and was, at the time of his death, of the age of about 95 years. A copy of the will, sufficient in form to entitle it to probate, was attached to the petition. By the terms of the will the following bequests and devises were made: To Fred Phillips Turton of Garfield, Utah, $500; to Mrs. Bennett Botsford of Chicago, $3,000; to Mrs. Adalade Young of Chicago, $3,000; to Mary Holman of Los Angeles, $500; to Clara Williams and Jessie Shoup, both residing in Idaho, the testator's interest in a group of mines and mining properties located in Lemhi county, Idaho; to Kathryn Pfeiffer, the proponent, a residence property, the home of the decedent, and the furniture therein, located at the corner of Twenty-Fifth street and Gramercy place, in the city of Los Angeles; also an interest in certain mines and mining properties in Custer and Lemhi counties in Idaho. The proponent was also made the sole residuary legatee and devisee. She and the contestant were nominated executrix and executor, and all former wills were expressly revoked. Donald M. Redwine and M. M. McPherson were the subscribing witnesses. By this will no portion of the estate was left to the contestant.

On January 13, 1925, the contestant filed his written opposition to the probate of said will, wherein it was alleged that, at the time the decedent executed said will, he was wanting in testamentary capacity by reason of unsoundness of mind; that said will was obtained from the decedent through undue influence and fraud on the part of proponent. It was further alleged that the decedent left a will of date October 12, 1914, wherein he devised and bequeathed a large portion of his estate, to wit, a portion in excess of $10,000, to the contestant. On March 11, 1925, the contestant filed his amended contest, wherein he realleged substantially, but more in detail, the matters set forth in the original opposition, and further alleged that in and by said will of 1914 the decedent had made Mrs. Pfeiffer and himself the residuary devisees and legatees, to share equally, and that the contestant's interest in the residuum was in excess of $50,000, and that said will of 1914 had never been revoked. In her answer to the amended opposition the proponent made certain admissions, hereinafter noted, but denied that the will of 1914 had never been revoked, and specifically denied the contestant's allegations with reference to the incompetency of the decedent, undue influence, and fraud.

The contest was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The court found in favor of the proponent on all the issues presented, and admitted the will of February 3, 1922, to probate. The contestant contends that the findings are unsupported by the evidence and that the court committed prejudicial error in a number of its rulings. The trial was protracted, and the record is voluminous. Some 42 points are presented by the contestant for determination. To discuss them all would unduly prolong this opinion, and would serve no useful purpose as a basis for our conclusions. Only those necessary for a determination of the appeal will be discussed.

[1-4] The evidence disclosed without conflict that the testator was a man of very advanced age at the time of his death. The weight of 95 years naturally bore down upon him. Physically he was suffering an impairment of sight and hearing, but it may be said that he was well preserved for a man of his age. He died about two years after the will of 1922 was executed, not because of his advanced age, but more directly as the result of complications which developed after a fall, which occurred about ten days or two weeks before his death. As to his mental condition, it was in evidence that he was absent-minded, and repeated questions already asked and answered a short time previously, and at times seemed confused and unable to recognize those about him. The proof, even on behalf of contestant, however, fell short of the requirements of the law necessary to establish testamentary incapacity. While the testator required assistance as to his personal wants and constant care, he continued to take an interest in the management of his property, and was able to make decisions respecting the same. He kept track of his money matters in a general way and signed checks until shortly before his death. It was not shown that he was afflicted with general insanity nor that he was unable to understand the nature and extent of his property, nor that he did not have in mind those who would be the natural objects of his bounty. It was not shown that he suffered delusions which would affect the testamentary act, nor was it disclosed that he was unable to comprehend the nature and purpose of the testamentary act when the will of 1922 was executed. In the preparation of the will he had the assistance of Mr. McPherson, an old-time friend, who devoted parts of four days in going over with the decedent the terms of the proposed will and perfecting it as to form. The testimony of the lay witnesses as to the mental condition of the testator at or about the time of the execution of the will of 1922 presented a conflict in the evidence. It was the province of the trial court to resolve that conflict one way or the other in the exercise of its discretion. The burden was upon the contestant, and a review of the record discloses that there was no abuse of such discretion. The testimony of the expert witnesses for both parties in response to a hypothetical question propounded by counsel for proponent was in substantial accord to the effect that, at the time of the execution of the 1922 will, the testator was not suffering such a degree of mental incapacity as would prevent him from making a valid will. The contestant objected to the form of this hypothetical question, but we find that, in substance, it was based upon facts proved during the trial. The expert witnesses, produced on behalf of contestant, testified, in response to a hypothetical question propounded by counsel for contestant, that, assuming the facts incorporated in the question to be true, the testator was mentally incapable, unassisted, of drafting the will of 1922. But the question propounded to those witnesses by contestant was improper, in this, that it assumed that the testator drafted the will unassisted by any one. The will was correct and precise in form and phraseology, and was complete in its description of real and personal property. The evidence was undisputed that the testator did not prepare the draft of the will unassisted, but, on the contrary, was afforded the assistance of McPherson, who remained in the company of the testator in the preparation of the draft of the will. In this preparation there were exemplars at hand available for comparison consisting of copies of former wills, one of which had been prepared under the supervision of a lawyer. There was also at hand a handbook of forms showing the proper language to be used in preparing a will. In view of this undisputed testimony, the hypothetical question propounded by contestant to his expert witnesses assumed facts not supported by the record. The evidence in support of the issue of incompetency of the testator was not only insufficient to establish testamentary incapacity as required by numerous decisions of this court, but supported abundantly the finding of the trial court on the subject. A few of our more recent decisions reiterating the rule in such cases are Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45; In re Shay's Estate, 196 Cal. 355, 237 P. 1079; Estate of Gunther, 199 Cal. 119, 248 P. 514; Estate of Sexton (Cal. Sup.) 251 P. 778; Estate of McDonough (Cal. Sup.) 251 P. 516; Estate of Haupt (Cal. Sup.) 252 P. 597, and Estate of Smith (Cal. Sup.) 252 P. 325.

[5] Nor was the finding of the court on the issue of undue influence unsupported by the evidence. In this connection the relationship existing for many years between the proponent and the testator is worthy of note. The testator was born in England, and came as a young man to the United States. He found his way to Idaho, where he engaged for a long period of time in the general merchandise business. He prospered and accumulated a considerable fortune. He married, but had no children. He and his wife knew the proponent from her childhood in Idaho, and were deeply attached to her. His acquaintanceship continued through the years. Mrs. Phillips died in 1911. It was in evidence that on her deathbed she exacted from proponent a promise to remain with, and care for, Mr. Phillips as long as he should live; that at the same time Mrs. Phillips exacted from her husband a promise to provide well for proponent; that, in accordance with such promises, Mr. and Mrs. Pfeiffer took up their residence at the home of Mrs. Phillips, and remained there until the death of the testator in December, 1924. During those 13 years Mr. Pfeiffer, although regularly employed elsewhere, spent much time in caring for the grounds, garden, and flowers at the testator's home. The proponent devoted herself to the care of Mr. Phillips. She managed the household, did the ordering and buying, nursed Mr. Phillips when he was ill, looked after his clothing, and attended to his wants and necessities as a daughter would do for her father. For this service neither the proponent nor her husband received any compensation.

Prior to 1919, and before the execution of the 1914 will, the testator owned another residence property located at 919 South Burlington avenue in Los Angeles. In the will of 1914 he devised this property to the contestant, whom he had known for many years, and with whom he had been associated in business. In 1919 the testator conveyed this property to the contestant by deed of gift. Early in the year 1922 Mr. McPherson came from his home at Pacific Grove to visit Mr. Phillips, at the latter's request, communicated by letter through the proponent. In this letter Mr. McPherson was advised that Mr.

Phillips desired to see him and to have him assist in redrafting the will. During the days when the will was in the course of preparation, the proponent was attending to her household duties. Her part in the preparation of the document was to copy the same in pen and ink from the pencil notes prepared by McPherson. When this was done, the draft was taken to a public stenographer to have the same typewritten. When the will was ready for execution, it was read to the testator by McPherson. Just before the will was signed the subscribing witness Redwine, who was well known to the testator, had occasion, without special prearrangement, to call at the testator's home. He was requested to sign as a witness to the will. The evidence as to whether the proponent was at the side of the testator or was elsewhere in the house when the will was signed was conflicting, and the court undoubtedly resolved this conflict in favor of the proponent. It found that no undue influence had been exercised by her bearing upon the testamentary act. "In order to set aside a will for undue influence, there must be substantial proof of a pressure which overpowered the volition of the testator at the time the will was made." Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 4, 120 P. 762; In re Langford, 108 Cal. 608, 41 P. 701; Estate of Mauvais, 43 Cal. App. 779, 185 P. 987. A confidential relationship, assuming that one existed between the proponent and the testator, as contended by contestant, was not sufficient, in the light of the facts disclosed and found, to require a finding of undue influence. Estate of Presho, 106 Cal. 639, 238 P. 944; Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 121 P. 733. Under well-recognized rules, the evidence was insufficient to support a finding of undue influence. On the contrary, the contrary finding is well supported.

The issue of fraud tendered by the contestant is entirely lacking in evidentiary support on the record presented.

[6, 7] The court further found that the contestant had no interest in the estate sufficient to enable him to contest the will of 1922. It is contended that this finding is without support in the evidence. The will of 1914 was not produced, and no attempt was made to establish it as a lost or destroyed will. The written opposition, however, alleged the interest of the contestant as a beneficiary of a substantial portion of the estate under the will of 1914. The answer of the proponent admitted "that some time about the year 1914 said Fred Phillips executed a will, but she alleges that she has no knowledge as to the date or year of the execution thereof." She denied that the will of 1914 had never been revoked and denied that the same was a subsisting will. She further denied that contestant was entitled to receive any portion of the estate under the said will. There was no denial of the allegation of the written opposition that the contestant was a beneficiary under that will. The interest of the contestant must therefore be deemed to have been admitted by proponent by her failure to deny the allegation of interest, and the finding of the court to the effect that the contestant lacked sufficient interest to contest the will of 1922 is without support in the evidence. The insufficiency of the evidence to support this finding, however, cannot prejudice the contestant, for the reason that, if the court had found that contestant had the necessary interest, the judgment would otherwise have to stand.

[8] It is further contended that the court was in error in holding that the contestant had renounced his right to serve as executor and in appointing the proponent as the sole personal representative. The evidence is sufficient to justify the conclusion that the contestant refused to sign the petition for the probate of the 1922 will. Such being the case, the court properly exercised its discretion in making the order holding in effect that the contestant's attitude was so inimical to the best interests of the estate as to exclude him from his right to participate in its administration.

[9] There is an appeal in the record from an order entered in the minutes of the court on the 15th day of December, 1925, stating that the will of 1914 be denied probate; that the will of 1922 be admitted to probate and appointing the proponent sole executrix without bond. This minute order, however, does not purport to be a final determination of the matter in the trial court, for there is incorporated therein a direction to counsel for proponent to prepare and submit to the court a draft of findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the proponent and against the contestant. The decision and judgment subsequently filed and entered pursuant to the minute order constituted a final determination of the matter in the trial court. The appeal from said order was therefore improper, and the same should be dismissed.

Other points made by the contestant do not require specific treatment.

While this controversy throughout has been spirited, the contestant's criticism of the trial judge is unwarranted. His opening brief contains disrespectful matter unjustified by the record. If our attention had been drawn to the same prior to the submission of the cause, some action might have been required to the extent, at least, of striking the brief from the files.

The appeal from the minute order of December 15, 1925, is dismissed, and the judgment admitting the will of February 3, 1922, to probate is affirmed.

In re PHILLIPS' ESTATE.

MILLS v. PFEIFFER.

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1927.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, F. C. Valentine, Judge.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. E. Oster, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment for costs entered March 3, 1926, against the contestant, George E. Mills, following a judgment admitting to probate the will of date February 3, 1922, as the last will of the decedent. The contest was determined in the trial court, and on appeal in favor of the proponent of the will. Estate of Phillips, 200 Cal. —, 261 P. 709. In ordering that said will be admitted to probate, the court further ordered that the proponent recover her costs, and the judgment from which this appeal was taken was entered after the court had retaxed the costs on motion. It does not appear from the record that the judgment for costs was made a part of the judgment admitting the will to probate. It is therefore assumed that said judgment for costs is separately appealable. The proponent concedes that the allowance of costs so made to her was premature and improper in view of the decision of this court in Estate of Johnson, 198 Cal. 469, 245 P. 1089.

The judgment for costs is therefore reversed.

HOWARD v. HOWARD et al. (Civ. 6019.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 18, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1145—"Judgment of affirmance" is determination that judgment "appealed from" be affirmed.

A judgment of affirmance is a determination that judgment "appealed from" be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Affirmance.]

2. Appeal and error ⇐803—Dismissal for reason that appeal has not been prosecuted as required by statute operates as "affirmance" only to extent of precluding further appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 955).

Dismissal of appeal by Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal, for reason that appeal has not been prosecuted as required by statute and rules governing appeals, operates as an affirmance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 955, only to extent of precluding further appeal and leaves judgment appealed from unimpaired.

3. Appeal and error ⇐803—Dismissal for want of prosecution of appeal from judgment conflicting with later judgment involving same parties and subject-matter, and which was affirmed on merits before dismissal of other appeal, is not "affirmance" annulling later judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 955).

Where subject-matter of controversy was fully and fairly determined in trial court and this determination was affirmed by Supreme Court after hearing on merits, subsequent dismissal of appeal from a former judgment of trial court conflicting with later judgment between same parties, and involving same subject-matter, could not be deemed an affirmance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 955, in sense of overriding and annulling latter judgment, when dismissal of former appeal was based upon failure to further prosecute same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Mack Howard, administrator of the estate of Rachel Howard, deceased, against W. H. Howard and others. Judgment for defendants was affirmed on appeal. From an order of sale and a writ of assistance, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles A. Shurtleff, of San Francisco, and A. L. Wessels, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Rachel Howard, deceased, from an order of sale made on the 8th day of May, 1925, and entered of record on July 3, 1925, granting a writ of assistance in favor of Lucia C. Hopkins, as administratrix of the estate of Ann Cleveland, deceased, and in favor of Lucia C. Hopkins, in her individual capacity directing the sheriff of Mendocino county to remove said Mack Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachel Howard, deceased, and said Mack Howard individually from certain lands and premises, and to put said Lucia C. Hopkins as administratrix and individually in possession of said lands and premises.

The lands constituting the subject-matter of this litigation have been the source of much dispute between the parties. A rather complete and detailed history will be found in the reported case of Howard v. Howard, 67 Cal. App. 56, 226 P. 984. At the oral argument in the instant case it was stated that the case cited correctly set forth the facts of the present controversy up to the date thereof, namely, April 30, 1924. A petition for hearing before the Supreme Court was denied on June 26, 1924. Therefore no detailed recital of the same facts will be made here. However, some facts may be stated to illustrate the present issue.

The parties involved here for some years were in dispute as to the title to certain tracts of land. For convenience here these tracts of land will be hereinafter referred to as "Cleveland lands" and "Lucy Howard lands." In 1917 Lucia C. Hopkins, as administratrix of the estate of Ann Cleveland, deceased, commenced an action against Mack Howard, as administrator of the estate of Rachel Howard, seeking therein to have her title to the "Cleveland lands" determined. The action was in the usual form of quiet title actions. In that case issue was joined, and on August 20, 1918, judgment was filed and entered in said cause decreeing that the plaintiff therein had no ownership or right or rights whatever in or to said lands or any part thereof, and further adjudging the title to be in defendant as administrator. To retain the identity of this action, it was entitled Hopkins v. Howard, and involved the "Cleveland lands." Thereafter the plaintiff duly served and filed notice of appeal to the Supreme Court on November 12, 1918, and on the same day duly filed a request for transcript, and the court duly ordered such transcript to be prepared.

On November 12, 1918, the parties to the Hopkins Howard suit filed a stipulation, the essential recitals and terms thereof being as follows: Reciting the pendency of the appeal and the fact that there were other lands, for convenience called the "Lucy Howard lands," concerning which there were title defects similar to those involved in the action of Hopkins v. Howard; stipulating then that defendant in Hopkins v. Howard should immediately commence and diligently prosecute to final judgment an action to have it determined that the "Lucy Howard lands" belonged to defendant as administrator; further stipulating that plaintiff Hopkins need take no further step in the appeal until after the judgment in the later action shall have become final, extending her time to file transcript or to take any other step necessary on the appeal to and including 30 days after the said final judgment in the action agreed to be commenced—stating "It is the intention hereof that the said plaintiff and appellant shall have the right, and she is hereby given the right to have the said judgment appealed from reviewed on appeal on the facts and merits in case the final judgment in the contemplated action shall be that the Lucy Howard land is not the property of defendant in his capacity as administrator"; and further stipulating that, should it be finally adjudged that the Lucy Howard land is the property of the estate of defendant as such administrator, then the appeal in Hopkins v. Howard shall be immediately dismissed and the land in controversy deemed to be in defendant as administrator aforesaid.

Thereafter no further proceedings were had affecting the appeal in Hopkins v. Howard until disposition of the second suit now to be referred to.

The defendant Howard in the Hopkins Howard suit did commence an action in the superior court of Mendocino county, which is the action in which was issued the writ of assistance now before us and which will be definitely referred to as Howard v. Howard. That action was commenced on February 28, 1921. By it plaintiff sought to quiet his title to the Lucy Howard lands and also the Cleveland lands as against the defendants named, and also as against the said Lucia C. Hopkins. In other words, in this latter action plaintiff went beyond his stipulation in the Hopkins Case to the effect that he would bring an action to quiet title to the Lucy Howard lands and included in this action the Cleveland lands. Issue was joined, and the said issue embraced exactly the same questions and involved the identical properties litigated in the former action of Hopkins v. Howard. The judgment of the trial court was made and entered on December 12, 1921, and by said judgment it was decreed that plaintiff take nothing and that the defendants were the owners of the lands involved, and that plaintiff be debarred and perpetually enjoined from asserting or making any demand or claim to said real property or any part thereof.

In this case of Howard v. Howard, the instant case, an appeal was taken as noted and the judgment affirmed. Howard v. Howard, 67 Cal. App. 56, 226 P. 984. Thereafter on February 7, 1925, by order of the Supreme Court, on motion of respondent, the appeal in the case of Hopkins v. Howard was dismissed.

The chronology of events is as follows:

Hopkins v. Howard: Date of judgment of trial court, August 20, 1918; stipulation holding appeal in abeyance, November 12, 1918; appeal dismissed by Supreme Court, January 6, 1925. Howard v. Howard: Date of judgment of trial court, December 12, 1921; affirmed by appellate court, April 30, 1924; appellant's petition to have cause heard by Supreme Court denied June 26, 1924; order for writ of assistance herein, May 8, 1925.

Throughout the foregoing outline we have omitted all reference to the fact that the rights of the parties are as administrators rather than in individual capacities. No particular point is urged in that respect, and, owing to many cases of similarity of names, the record would become quite confusing if continual reference to all of the heirs was being made throughout.

The point urged by appellant, and upon the determination of which the case depends, may be stated thus: The dismissal of the appeal in the Hopkins Howard Case was an affirmance of that judgment, and such affirmance was a final judgment and final as of the date of affirmance, January 6, 1925; that the date of the final judgment in the Howard v. Howard Case was as of the date of affirmance by the District Court of Appeal April 30, 1924. It being conceded that there is a conflict between said judgments, then appellant contends that the Hopkins v. Howard judgment, later in time, prevails. It is further contended by appellant that, irrespective of his other contention, a fair conflict of claims was presented in the court below, and in such case a writ of assistance should not issue, but the parties should be left to pursue their remedies in separate actions.

Inasmuch, however, as it is evident that the claim last urged rests wholly upon the first point, a determination on the propriety of the issue of the writ of assistance as a separate question would be of little importance. If we conclude that the appellant is entitled to claim under the Hopkins Howard judgment, that disposes of all questions. If we determine otherwise, then the next question becomes moot in so far as the record discloses that the rights urged were based solely on the Hopkins judgment and no other claims presented in the court below.

It may be admitted that in the case of Howard v. Howard the defendant Lucia C. Hopkins could, had she chosen, have set up the pendency of the appeal in the Hopkins Case and demanded an abatement as to such issues as were already in that controversy. The fact is she did not do so but went to trial. Accordingly the case of Howard v. Howard went to trial and judgment and affirmance without regard to what was determined in the Hopkins Case. The record before us and the stipulation entered into regarding the appeal in the Hopkins Case show clearly that it was the intent of all the parties that their rights should be concluded by the Howard v. Howard final judgment, assuming at the time of the stipulation that the Cleveland lands would not be involved in the subsequent proceedings. By the stipulation, as noted, if it was held that plaintiff prevailed in the second case as he had in the former (there being defendant), then his rights would be conceded; if he lost and the basis of his title was removed, then the appeal should go on, evidently more of a formality than otherwise. Yet it is apparent that the consideration of the stipulation failed, or the purpose thereof, rather, removed, when plaintiff herein deliberately chose to litigate again the same issues involved in the first case. We think, upon an analysis of this stipulation and from the facts pertaining to the case at that time, it could be well shown that the appellant here is not entitled to be further heard. Surely there are no equities on his side, nor does he attempt to present any.

[1] No hard and fast definition of "final" judgment applicable to all situations can be given, since its finality depends somewhat upon the purpose for which and the standpoint from which it is being considered, and it may be final for one purpose and not for another. Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) § 27. This is so manifest that it would be idle to attempt any exhaustive examination into the different cases in which the word "final" is employed. If we should take the word as used in one instance and attempt to formulate any rigid definition to stand in all cases, we would find a condition of hopeless confusion and obvious inconsistency. In any event we feel that such an analysis is unnecessary to this discussion. However, it might not be amiss to state that a judgment of affirmance, even if given all of the attributes of finality contended for, is, as it purports to be, a determination that the judgment appealed from be affirmed. We think that the question here may be and should be determined from a construction of section 955 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads:

"The dismissal of an appeal is in effect an affirmance of the judgment or order appealed from, unless the dismissal is expressly made without prejudice to another appeal."

[2] The section is merely declaratory of what must be obvious. In the case of Hopkins v. Howard no record on appeal was ever prepared. The trial court, on motion of the defendant in that case, made its order that the proceedings therein pending were terminated, and the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal for failure of appellant to prosecute the same. Even in the absence of the statute the necessary effect of this dismissal would have been to leave the judgment as though no appeal had been taken, and the judgment of the trial court then stood unassailed. It is manifest that this had the same effect, considered simply as a result, as would have followed had the Supreme Court disposed of an appeal perfected, heard and affirmed. The section, as noted, simply announces the effect of the dismissal, but in no sense attempts to enlarge the meaning of the term "dismissal" or declare the same to be in the strict sense a judgment on the merits. Possibly, in the absence of the section, after an appeal had been dismissed the appellant could again appeal and thus prolong the litigation interminably, unless restricted by other provisions of the statute. It was undoubtedly the intent of the lawmaking body to preclude such a course and give to an order of dismissal the effect of an affirmance, at the same time reserving in the appellate tribunal the power to make express provision that a dismissal might be ordered without prejudice to the right of another appeal. An appeal dismissed because there was nothing to appeal from will not preclude another appeal in the same case when a record shall have been made up from which an appeal can be taken. In re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 P. 86. In our opinion, a dismissal of an appeal by the Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal for the reason that the appeal has not been prosecuted as required by statute and the rules governing appeals operates as an affirmance only to the extent of precluding further appeal and leaves the judgment appealed from unimpaired. No court is permitted to pass upon issues not before it for determination; and when the appellate court in its order of dismissal concludes that there is no question presented to it for hearing, and in effect that the appellate jurisdiction has not been invoked, it would seem difficult to say that this is a solemn judgment per se, determining the questions which the court refuses to consider.

[3] The precise point involved here has never been passed upon directly, as far as our research discloses. The briefs of counsel cite no authority exactly in point. As a case of first impression we would announce the rule as applicable to the case at bar. Where the subject-matter of a controversy is fully and fairly determined in the trial court, and this determination affirmed by the Supreme Court after a hearing on the merits, the subsequent dismissal of an appeal from a former judgment of the trial court, conflicting with the later judgment between the same parties and involving the same subject-matter, will not be deemed an affirmance in the sense of overriding and annulling the latter judgment when the dismissal of the former appeal is based upon a failure to further prosecute the same. The status of the former judgment will be as though no appeal had been taken therefrom.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: KNIGHT, Acting P. J.; CASHIN, J.

CALIFORNIA BEAN GROWERS' ASS'N v. SANDERS. (Civ. 3212.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 14, 1927.

- 1. Damages ⚡79(5)—Contract for liquidated damages for failure to deliver crop to marketing association held valid and enforceable (Civ. Code, § 1671).

Contract for liquidated damages for grower's breach of agreement to deliver his bean crop to co-operative marketing association held valid and enforceable under Civ. Code, § 1671; it being impracticable or extremely difficult to fix actual damage.

- 2. Appeal and error ⚡1122(2), 1175(5)—Appellate court may make proper findings and enter correct judgment, where trial court's findings are contrary to evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a added by St. 1927, p. 583).

Where trial court's findings are contrary to evidence, proper findings may be drawn from evidence and correct judgment entered by appellate court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, added by St. 1927, p. 583.

- 3. Agriculture ⚡6—Finding marketing association, alleging breach of contract did not eliminate waste, prevent speculation, effect economies, or stabilize prices, held contrary to evidence.

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to plaintiff, finding that plaintiff did not eliminate any waste, prevent any speculation, or effect any economies or stabilization of prices in handling, marketing, or distribution of beans, held contrary to evidence.

- 4. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding marketing association was damaged by grower's sale of crop to others.

In co-operative marketing association's action for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to it, evidence held to require finding that plaintiff was damaged by defendant's sale of beans to others.

- 5. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding marketing association, alleging breach of contract, was always ready, willing, and able to perform.

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to it, evidence held to require finding that plaintiff was at all times ready, willing, and able to perform all the conditions, covenants, and terms of its agreement.

- 6. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding association could not secure crop it contracted to sell, or prevent price manipulation, because of grower's fault.

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to it, evidence held to require finding that plaintiff was unable to secure amount of beans it had contracted to sell or to prevent manipulation of prices by speculators because of defendant's failure to deliver beans.

- 7. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding member's failure to deliver crop to marketing association raised other member's pro rata marketing costs.

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to it, evidence held to require finding that pro rata cost of marketing of members delivering beans to plaintiff, in accordance with contract, was raised because of defendant's failure to deliver beans.

- 8. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding cost of handling crop was raised by grower's failure to deliver to marketing association.

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to plaintiff, evidence held to require finding that cost of handling beans was raised by defendant's failure to deliver.

- 9. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding marketing association was damaged in incalculable amount, authorizing recovery of liquidated damages, from grower's breach of contract (Civ. Code, § 1671).

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to plaintiff, evidence held to require finding that plaintiff was damaged in incalculable amount, so as to authorize recovery of liquidated damages under Civ. Code, § 1671.

- 10. Agriculture ⚡6—Evidence held to require finding marketing association could not fill contracts for sale because of grower's failure to deliver crop.

In action by co-operative marketing association for grower's breach of contract to deliver his entire bean crop to it, evidence held to require finding that plaintiff, by terms of contract, accepted delivery of beans only from its members, could not go into open market therefor, and was unable to fulfill contracts for sale of beans to others because of defendant's failure to deliver.

- 11. Agriculture ⚡6—Marketing association held entitled to $100 attorney's fees in action for liquidated damages for failure to deliver crop.

Co-operative marketing association held entitled to recover $100 from grower for attorney's fees in prosecution of action for liquidated damages of one cent per pound for breach of contract to deliver to it 23,000 pounds of beans produced by defendant in certain year.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by the California Bean Growers' Association, a corporation, against Frank S. Sanders. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with direction.

Sapiro & Hayes, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff is a nonprofit marketing association without capital stock, and was organized by a large number of bean growers to co-operate in the business of growing and marketing beans. The defendant is one of its members. On June 14, 1921, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff agreed to market, and defendant agreed to consign and deliver to plaintiff, as his agent, all of the beans produced by him, except those which the plaintiff might release in writing for personal use or garden seed varieties. The agreement covered a series of years commencing with, and including, the year 1921. The agreement is very full and complete, and sets forth the obligations of the respective parties in minute detail. One of its provisions is for liquidated damages in case the defendant shall fail to deliver to the plaintiff his crop of beans, and is set forth in the following language:

"Inasmuch as it is now and ever will be, impracticable and extremely difficult to determine the actual damage resulting to the association should the grower fail to so consign and deliver their beans, the grower hereby agrees to pay to the association one cent ($.01) for each pound of beans produced or acquired by or for him which he has failed to deliver to the association in accordance with the terms hereof, as liquidated damages for the breach of this agreement, all parties agreeing that this agreement is one of a series dependent for its value upon the adherence of each and all of the contracting parties to each and all of the said contracts."

It is also provided in said contract:

"If the association brings any action to enforce any provision hereof or to secure specific performance hereof or to collect damages of any kind for any breach hereof, the grower agrees to pay to the association any reasonable attorney's fees expended or incurred by it in any such proceeding, together with any other costs incurred in such action."

[1] The complaint is based upon an alleged violation of defendant's obligation to deliver to the plaintiff his 1921 bean crop, and also for an attorney fee for the prosecution of this action. The general features of the plaintiff organization and the agreements which it makes with its members are similar to those considered in Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93; California Canning Peach Growers' Ass'n v. Downey, 76 Cal.

App. 1, 243 P. 679; Poultry Producers, etc., v. Murphy, 64 Cal. App. 450, 221 P. 962; Anaheim Citrus Fruit Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, 197 P. 959; and California Bean Growers' Ass'n v. Rindge L. & N. Co., 199 Cal. 171, 248 P. 658, 47 A. L. R. 904. The foregoing cases hold that a contract for liquidated damages such as the one here sued upon is valid and enforceable, and falls within the rule of section 1671 of the Civil Code, which provides:

"The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage."

In the case of Anaheim Citrus Fruit Ass'n v. Yeoman, supra, it is held:

"The association was organized for the purpose of the better handling of citrus fruits through the co-operative and joint effort of its members. From the nature of the organization and the statement of its purposes as found in its articles and by-laws, it can be fairly and reasonably inferred that by the cooperation of its members, mutual advantages would accrue to all through greater economy in handling and shipping and the securing of more advantageous marketing facilities. These results would be dependent directly upon the performance by the members of their agreement to deliver their fruit into the hands of the association for the purposes declared. Defendant sought to show at the trial that the damage which would accrue to the association by reason of any of its members failing or refusing to market their fruit through the association could be easily and exactly ascertained, and that such damage would consist wholly of a proportionate amount of overhead operating cost. By the line of questioning pursued, it was made clear that the association would suffer an actual monetary loss by reason of the failure of defendant to deliver his fruit at the association packing house for market, as he had agreed to do, but in the very nature of the case we do not think that such damage should be the only damage considered to have been suffered by the plaintiff. Other elements have already been suggested. The existence and life of the association itself depended upon its being furnished fruit to dispose of in the public market. A reduction in the amount of fruit so handled would not only tend to increase the overhead cost to the non-transgressing members, but, we may assume, to some extent affect the prestige and standing of the association as a marketing concern. * * * Enough has been said, we think, to show that the case falls within the class as to which the law permits damages to be liquidated by contract in advance of their occurrence. It follows as a necessary conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to recover the exact amount fixed in its contract as the sum per box which defendant should pay by reason of his failure to market this fruit in the manner agreed."

These authorities are conclusive that the contract here sued upon is enforceable.

The cause was tried by the court and judgment entered in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The cause has been submitted to this court by stipulation of the parties upon the appellant's opening brief; there being no appearance by the respondent either through the filing of a brief or oral argument.

The court made the following findings adverse to the plaintiff:

"Second. * * * That it is not true that the said plaintiff did, in the handling of its business, eliminate any waste, or prevent any speculation, or give any benefits of any economies, or that there were any economies, or any stabilization in the collective or co-operative handling, or marketing or distribution of beans."

"Fourth. * * * That it is not true that said plaintiff was damaged as the result of the acts of the said defendant in selling said beans to persons other than the plaintiff, and that said plaintiff suffered no damage on account of the said acts of the said defendant.

"Fifth. That it is not true that the plaintiff was at all times ready, or willing, or able, to perform all of the terms or conditions, covenants, or terms of said agreement.

"Sixth. That it is not true that, by the defendant's failure to deliver beans under said agreement, the plaintiff was unable to secure the amount of beans it had contracted to sell, or that, by reason of such act of the defendant, the plaintiff was unable to prevent manipulation of the price of beans by speculators.

"Seventh. That it is not true that, because of the defendant's failure to deliver said beans to the plaintiff, the pro rata cost of marketing of the members of plaintiff who delivered beans in accordance with their contract was raised.

"Eighth. That it is not true that the cost of handling beans was raised by defendant's failure to deliver.

"Ninth. That it is not true that the plaintiff was damaged in an incalculable amount, or any amount, by reason of the failure of the defendant to deliver said beans."

"Eleventh. * * * But it is not true that, by reason of the failure of the defendant to deliver said beans, the said plaintiff was unable to fulfill any contract made by it in connection with the sale of any beans by it to other persons.

"Twelfth. That it is not true that plaintiff is entitled to attorney's fees in this action.

"Thirteenth. That the defendant never signed any by-laws as a member of said association, but that plaintiff has adopted by-laws as provided by law."

The pleadings admit that the defendant raised 23,000 pounds of black-eye beans during the season of 1921, which were subject to the terms of the contract, and which were sold to other parties. C. L. Danly, secretary-treasurer of the plaintiff, testified that during the year 1921 he was employed by the plaintiff, and ever since said time has been in its employ, and the custodian of the records of the plaintiff corporation. He produced the stub book of certificates of membership, which shows that on June 14, 1921, certificate of membership No. 1712 was issued to the defendant. The witness testified that the certificate was signed by the secretary and forwarded to defendant. He further testified that Sanders did not deliver any beans of the 1921 crop to the association; that the association during 1921 had an office in San Francisco with a sales department, a warehouse department, and an accounting department; that it had arrangements with about 300 brokers throughout the United States who assisted in disposing of its crops, and it had arrangements with warehouses to receive and clean beans. It also had clerks in its various departments and department head managers, and it had prepared all the necessary paper work, printed forms, and reports in expectation of handling all the beans of its members who had signed contracts. The form of contract signed by Mr. Sanders was a standard form signed by all the members. He further testified that, if Mr. Sanders had delivered his 23,000 pounds of beans to the association, they could have been handled without any additional overhead expense or cost, and that the portion of overhead that should have been borne by Sanders was paid by those members who delivered their beans to the association; that the failure of Sanders to deliver the beans caused the unit cost of operating the association to increase; that the plaintiff was able and willing to receive the beans, and made demand for them, and was ready to market them in accordance with the terms of the general contract; that the association receives beans from its members only, and that, if a member fails to deliver it affects the trade standing and prestige of the company; that, when contracts were made with the trade throughout the United States, they were informed of the nature of the association and the source from which the beans were obtained. He further testified that they relied upon the beans of its members, and, if they failed to deliver, the association was unable to carry out its contracts, and lost prestige with the trade; that from the 1921 crop the association contracted to deliver black-eye beans at a specific time, and were unable to do so because the members did not deliver, and the association got in difficulties with the trade; that, if the defendant Sanders had delivered his beans in time, the association would have been in a position to have filled some of its contracts. He further testified that the breach of a contract by one member caused others to breach, and thus created dissatisfaction and demoralization in the association. The witness further stated that he did not know just what effect Sanders' failure to deliver his bean crop had upon other members, but there were other members at that time who did not deliver their crops. Further, that by Sanders' failure to deliver his bean crop to the association, said bean crop came into competition with the beans of the association, and prevented the association from maintaining a stable market and stable price.

It was stipulated that, if Robert Frazier, a grower member and director of the association, and for a period of two years its general manager, were present, his evidence would be the same as that of Mr. Danly in reference to the effect of a breach of the agreement on the part of a member-grower of the association.

It was stipulated that, should the plaintiff recover a judgment, the amount of the attorney's fee should be fixed by the court.

[2] The foregoing is all of the evidence bearing upon the findings of the court hereinafore set out, and, as said findings are contrary thereto, proper findings may be drawn from the evidence, and a correct judgment entered thereon, and this cause terminated without further litigation by this court exercising the authority conferred by section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1927, p. 583).

[3] It is therefore ordered that the second finding be amended by striking therefrom the following:

"That it is not true that the said plaintiff did, in the handling of its business eliminate any waste or prevent any speculation or give any benefits of any economies, or that there were any economies or any stabilization in the collective or co-operative handling or marketing or distribution of beans."

[4] It is further ordered that finding 4 be amended to read as follows:

"Fourth. That in the year 1921 defendant produced 23,000 pounds of beans, and that the said beans were not delivered to the said plaintiff, and were not used by the said defendant for seed nor released by the association for personal use. That demand was made upon the said defendant by said plaintiff to deliver said beans, but that said defendant did not deliver any of said beans produced by him in the year 1921, and that said defendant sold said beans to persons other than the plaintiff. That it is true that said plaintiff was damaged as a result of the acts of said defendant in selling said beans to persons other than the plaintiff, and that said plaintiff suffered damage on account of said acts of said defendant."

[5] It is further ordered that finding No. 5 be amended to read as follows:

"Fifth. That it is true that the plaintiff was at all times ready, willing and able to perform all of the terms or conditions, covenants, and terms of said agreement."

[6] It is further ordered that finding No. 6 be amended to read as follows:

"Sixth. That it is true that, by the defendant's failure to deliver beans under said agreement, the plaintiff was unable to secure the amount of beans it had contracted to sell, and that, by reason of such act of the defendant, the plaintiff was unable to prevent manipulation of the price of beans by speculators."

[7] It is further ordered that finding No. 7 be amended to read as follows:

"Seventh. That it is true that, because of the defendant's failure to deliver said beans to the plaintiff, the pro rata cost of marketing of the members of plaintiff who delivered beans in accordance with their contract, was raised."

[8] It is further ordered that finding No. 8 be amended to read as follows:

"Eighth. That it is true that the cost of handling beans was raised by defendant's failure to deliver."

[9] It is further ordered that finding 9 be amended to read as follows:

"Ninth. That it is true that the plaintiff was damaged in an incalculable amount by reason of the failure of the defendant to deliver said beans."

[10] It is further ordered that finding No. 11 be amended to read as follows:

"Eleventh. That it is true that by the terms of said agreement the plaintiff accepts delivery only of beans delivered by its members and that it is not so constituted that it can go into the open market and obtain beans, and it is true that, by reason of the failure of the defendant to deliver said beans, the said plaintiff was unable to fulfill contracts made by it in connection with the sale of beans by it to other persons."

[11] It is further ordered that finding No. 12 be amended to read as follows:

"Twelfth. That the plaintiff has incurred a reasonable and necessary expense of $100 as and for attorney's fees in the prosecution of this action."

It is further ordered that finding No. 13 be stricken out.

It is further ordered that the conclusions of law be amended to read as follows:

"That the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant in the sum of $230, together with $100 attorney's fees, and its costs of suit herein expended."

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant in accordance with the aforesaid findings and conclusions of law, the appellant to recover its costs of appeal.

86 Cal. App. 523

CLARK v. CONLEY SCHOOL DIST. OF KERN COUNTY. (Civ. 5921.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Contracts ⇨176(11)—Court, finding repudiated contract employing architect, which was indefinite regarding compensation, was executed, properly refused to allow full amount demanded in cause of action alleging contract.

Where court found that repudiated contract, fixing no compensation for plaintiff's services as architect in drawing plans for buildings, but fixing his compensation for supervising construction of buildings at 6 per cent. of total cost of construction, was executed, court did not err in refusing to render judgment for full sum demanded under cause of action alleging contract, in view of indefinite nature of contract.

2. Evidence ⇨571(7)—Court was not bound to believe plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony regarding value of his services as architect, where contract was evidence thereof.

Where architect, suing for value of services in drawing plans for buildings not constructed, testified that his services were reasonably worth $14,348, which was 6 per cent. of total estimated value of buildings, and there was no testimony contradicting it, but contract calling for payment of 6 per cent. on total cost of construction not only for preparation of plans but for supervision of construction was evidence of reasonable value of services, court was not bound to accept plaintiff's testimony, but was justified in reaching conclusion of reasonable value of services from all facts before it.

3. Interest ⇨19(2)—Where amount due for services could not be determined by mere calculation, claim could not bear interest from time services were rendered (Civ. Code, § 3287).

Where judgment was based on cause of action in quantum meruit and upon evidence offered under that cause of action amount due thereunder could not be determined by mere calculation, claim could not bear interest from date services were rendered, under Civ. Code, § 3287, but should bear interest from rendition of judgment only.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action for services by Orville L. Clark against the Conley School District of Kern County. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver O. Clark, of Los Angeles, and Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Claffin & Lambert, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for services rendered, praying for judgment in the sum of $13,552. The cause was tried before the court without a jury and resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $3,000.

From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed on a typewritten record.

The complaint pleaded three distinct causes of action. The first was based upon a written contract with the members of the board of trustees of the defendant district wherein the plaintiff was employed as the architect of the district for the preparation of plans and specifications for new buildings and additions and alterations to present buildings, and also to supervise the construction, completion, and alteration of said buildings as required by the board. The second cause of action pleaded the same facts and added allegations covering the conduct of the defendant district for the purpose of invoking an estoppel upon the defendant from asserting any invalidity in the contract. The third cause of action was in the ordinary form of quantum meruit. Following the trial, upon which the validity of the contract was vigorously attacked upon the ground that it had not been authorized or approved by the board of trustees in a legally called meeting, the trial court made its findings in which these defenses were not touched upon, but in which it was found that the contract was executed at the time alleged in the complaint; that plaintiff commenced the performance of services under it, prepared and delivered certain plans and specifications for new buildings, expended certain moneys in the performance of this labor, and was prevented from completing the contract because of its termination by the trustees. It was then found that the reasonable value of the services rendered by the plaintiff under the contract was the sum of $5,000, of which sum $2,000 had already been paid, and judgment was accordingly given for the balance.

[1] On this appeal the appellant attacks the judgment upon two grounds: First, that the trial court erred in disregarding the uncontradicted evidence of appellant that the reasonable value of his services was $14,348; and, second, that he was entitled to interest upon the amount found due for the period during which payment was withheld. In his reply brief the appellant has for the first time argued that the trial court having found that the contract was executed as alleged in the first cause of action he was entitled to the full sum demanded, under that cause of action irrespective of any question of the reasonable value of his services. Although we are not inclined to consider points which are raised for the first time in the final brief, it is sufficient to say that the contract which is the basis of the first cause of action is so indefinite in its terms that we cannot say that the trial court erred in this respect. The contract seems to have been drawn with the intention of employing appellant in two capacities—as an architect to advise the board of trustees, and to prepare plans and specifications for new buildings and alterations in the present buildings, and, secondly, as a supervising architect in the construction, completion, and alteration of such buildings. For the services mentioned under the first heading no compensation was fixed, while for the services mentioned under the second heading the appellant's compensation was fixed at 6 per cent. of the total cost of construction and alteration of the buildings. It may be assumed that, under the general custom covering the services of architects, the fee fixed in the contract would cover the services rendered in the preparation of the plans and specifications. It should be noted, however, that under the contract the appellant was called upon to perform such services "as may be required of him," and that the fee fixed was to be based upon the total cost of the construction and alteration of the buildings, and not upon the estimated cost of that work. Therefore, whether the contract contemplated payment to the appellant for services rendered merely in the preparation of plans and specifications for new buildings or for alterations of present buildings if none of such buildings or alterations were made, was a question which should have been determined by the trial court upon issues properly drawn. Again, if these services were to be paid for on the basis of 6 per cent. of the actual cost of construction and alteration of the buildings, the trial court must determine upon what basis the appellant should be paid for services rendered in the preparation of plans and specifications only. The appellant lays stress upon the fact that he was prevented from completing the services under the contract by the action of the trustees in bringing about its termination, but it appears that this action was prompted by the determination of the trustees that the buildings could not be constructed because the electors of the district had refused to authorize the issuance of bonds for that purpose, and because the district was otherwise financially unable to raise the fund for that purpose. This is a fact which must have been contemplated by all parties at the time the contract was executed. It explains the insertion in the contract of the proviso that the services were to be rendered as required by the trustees.

[2] The trial court found that the reasonable value of appellant's services was $5,000. It is said that because the testimony of the appellant that his services were reasonably worth $14,348 was not contradicted, the trial court was bound to find in that amount. The appellant was asked:

"What was the reasonable value of your services in preparing these plans and specifications?" Answer: "Six per cent. on the total estimated value of each of the three buildings, * * * that was a total of $398,000, and the value of my services would be 6 per cent. of that amount, * * * $14,348."

But the contract itself was some evidence of the reasonable value of these services and that called for a payment of 6 per cent. on the total cost of construction, not only for the preparation of the plans and estimates, but for the supervision of the construction of the buildings. The trial court was not therefore bound to accept this testimony of the appellant, but was justified in reaching its conclusion of the reasonable value of the services rendered by the appellant from all the facts and circumstances before it. Ehlers v. Wannack Bros., 118 Cal. 310, 50 P. 433; Meyer v. Buckley, 22 Cal. App. 96, 98, 133 P. 510.

It is argued that the trial court erred in refusing to allow the appellant interest from the time when the services were rendered until the date of the judgment. The argument is based upon the rule that appellant's recovery was capable of being made certain by calculation (Civ. Code, § 3287) because the contract fixed his compensation at 6 per cent. of the cost of construction of the buildings. We have already said that this fee was based upon his services to be rendered not only in the preparation of plans and estimates, but also in the supervision of the construction of the buildings. If the cause were being tried upon the first cause of action alone, it may be that evidence could be had of the prevailing customs and of the surrounding circumstances which would justify an interpretation of the contract fixing a promise to pay for the services rendered in the preparation of plans and estimates in the event the building program was abandoned and in such a case the certainty of the amount due might be easily determined by mere calculation. But so far as appears from this record, such evidence was not before the trial court, and in any event no finding was made thereon. The judgment was manifestly given on the third cause of action alone—an action in quantum meruit.

[3] The reasonable value of services rendered was the precise question to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence offered under that cause of action, and the amount due thereunder could not be determined by mere calculation. Such being the case, the claim should bear interest from the rendition of the judgment only. Meyer v. Buckley, 22 Cal. App. 96, 99, 133 P. 510.

Judgment affirmed.

CLARK v. CONLEY SCHOOL DIST. OF KERN COUNTY. (Civ. 5932.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Contracts ⚡313(1)—Where happening of event upon which payment became due under contract was prevented by defendant's repudiation, plaintiff could recover damages for breach.

Where happening of event upon which payment for architect's drawing plans for buildings and supervising construction would become due was wrongfully prevented by repudiation of contract by defendants, architect could recover damages for breach.

2. Schools and school districts ⚡86(2)—School board's resolution authorizing contract employing architect sued on held properly admitted, without showing whether meeting was general or special.

Resolution of board of trustees of school district authorizing execution of contract with architect sued on held properly admitted, without showing whether resolution was passed at general or special meeting, where counsel had offered official minute book of board in which resolution was recorded as having been adopted at "meeting of the board of trustees," since board was authorized to act at either special or regular meeting.

3. Evidence ⚡158(17)—Minutes of school board showing adoption of resolution authorizing contract sued on were best evidence.

In action by architect for services, minutes of board of trustees of school district showing adoption of resolution authorizing contract with architect were best evidence of this fact.

4. Evidence ⚡87—Where evidence showed school board adopted resolution authorizing contract, presumption that official duty had been regularly performed cast upon board burden of showing irregularity.

In action by architect for services rendered to school district under contract, minutes of board of trustees showing adoption of recorded resolution authorizing contract with architect were best evidence of this fact, and presumption that official duty had been regularly performed cast upon board burden of proof to show any irregularity in proceedings of board.

5. Schools and school districts ⚡86(2)—Where prior to school board's repudiation of contract, district made use of architect's report and he performed services requested, he could recover reasonable value of services.

Where prior to repudiation of contract with architect, by board of trustees of school district, whereby architect was to furnish plans for buildings and supervise construction, the district received and made use of report and survey of school facilities made by architect, and architect performed all services required by him under contract and at request of district, and he expended in preparation of plans and specifications for new buildings under contract sum of $9,000, he was entitled to reasonable value of his services to district, which court found to be $5,000, of which $2,000 had been paid.

6. Schools and school districts ⚡86(2)—School district could not refuse to pay for architect's services accepted on ground of irregularity in proceedings for employment of architect.

School district could not make use of report and survey of school facilities made by architect employed under contract and accept services performed by him under contract at request of district, and then refuse to pay for same on ground that there were irregularities in giving notice of meeting of board of trustees of school district, in adoption of resolution authorizing architect's employment, or in execution of contract in suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action for services rendered by Orville L. Clark against the Conley School District of Kern County. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clafin & Lambert, of Bakersfield for appellant.

Oliver O. Clark and W. W. Kaye, both of Los Angeles, and Alfred Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for services rendered as an architect in preparing plans and specifications for new buildings to be erected by the district and for additions to and alterations of existing buildings and to supervise the construction of the same. The trial court found that the reasonable value of the services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant was the sum of $5,000; that the defendant had paid to the plaintiff on account thereof the sum of $2,000; and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the balance of $3,000, for which sum judgment was accordingly rendered. From this judgment the defendant has appealed upon a typewritten record.

Appellant's opening brief consists entirely of a reprint of the reporter's transcript, with a few running interpolations stating that error has occurred. These specifications of error are generally not followed by any argument or citation of authority, while the authorities which are cited are all from other jurisdictions and are either wholly beside the point at issue or directly contrary to the authorities in this state interpreting the statutes under which the issues arise.

The complaint was framed in three causes of action. The first pleaded a written contract executed by the qualified trustees of the defendant district on October 7, 1920, whereby the plaintiff was employed to perform the services mentioned. It was then alleged that immediately thereafter the plaintiff began work under the contract, made and filed with the defendant the survey report and recommendations called for, prepared and filed the plans and specifications requested by the defendant, incurred a large expenditure of money, labor, and time in the performance of his services and held himself at all times ready, willing, and able to perform everything incumbent upon him under the contract; that on September 10, 1921, the defendant discharged plaintiff, repudiated and abandoned the contract, and refused to pay him for the services rendered, all to his damage in the sum of $13,552. The second cause of action pleaded the same material facts and added facts showing a ratification and estoppel on the part of the defendant. The third cause of action was framed in the form of a common count for the reasonable value of services rendered.

[1] On this appeal the appellant urges that the complaint does not state a cause of action because it does not appear that in the written contract with the district a time of payment for the services was specified, and that, because of this, payment would become due only upon the completion of the buildings, which event it appears did not occur. The specification goes only to the first cause of action and is wholly without merit because it does appear in the pleading of that cause of action that the happening of the event upon which payment would become due was wrongfully prevented by the repudiation of the contract by the district and that that cause of action was one for damages for this breach. But aside from this no attack is made upon the pleading of the second or third causes of action, and either one of these is sufficient to support the judgment.

[2-4] It is said that the trial court erred in the admission into evidence of the resolution of the board of trustees of the appellant district authorizing the execution of the contract in question because it had not been previously shown that the resolution was passed at either a regular or special meeting of the board. The objection is wholly without merit. Counsel had offered the official minute book of the board of trustees in which the resolution was recorded as having been adopted at a "meeting of the board of trustees." Inasmuch as the board is authorized to act at either a special or a regular meeting, it was not necessary for the respondent to show what kind of meeting was being held at the time the resolution was passed. The minutes of the board showing the adoption of the recorded resolution were the best evidence of this fact, and the presumption that official duty had been regularly performed cast upon the appellant the burden of proof to show any irregularity in the proceedings of the board. Running through the appellant's brief are statements to the effect that the action of the board should have been taken on a regular meeting day, or that notice should have been given of a special meeting to the outgoing trustee, but no evidence is offered to show that either one of these things had not been done.

[5, 6] Aside from anything which may be said as to the impropriety of any judgment under the first cause of action because of any irregularity in the giving of notice of the meeting of the trustees, in the adoption of the resolution authorizing the employment of respondent, or in the execution of the contract in suit, the pleadings and findings under the second and third causes of action are in themselves sufficient to support the judgment. The trial court found that prior to the repudiation of the contract the district received and made use of the report and survey of the school facilities made by the respondent; that the respondent performed all the services required by him under the contract and at the request of the district; that he expended in the preparation of the plans and specifications for new buildings under the contract the sum of $9,000; and that the reasonable value of his services to the district was $5,000, of which sum $2,000 had been paid. On this phase of the case the judgment is within the rule announced in McCormick Lumber Co. v. Highland School District, 26 Cal. App. 641, 643, 147 P. 1183, and Warren Bros. Co. v. Boyle, 42 Cal. App. 246, 261, 183 P. 706. It is said in the case last cited:

"Even if it be that certain provisions of the charter, or ordinances, were not strictly complied with, the city, under well-settled legal principles, should not be allowed to accept, use, and retain the benefit of petitioner's property, and then refuse to pay for it upon the plea that in making the contract it has not proceeded in strict conformity with some part of the complicated internal machinery of its complex corporate organization" (citing cases).

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte SCOTT. (Cr. 1432.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 21, 1927.

1. Habeas corpus ☞30(3)—Habeas corpus will not be granted for committing magistrate's error in designating offense.

Where evidence before committing magistrate established the making of false pretenses, their falsity, obtaining of property, reliance of victim upon representations, inducing her to part with her property, intent to defraud, and conspiracy, defendant will not be granted a writ of habeas corpus merely because of error in committing magistrate in designating offense as grand larceny by trick and device.

2. Habeas corpus ☞111(1)—Petitioner on habeas corpus will not be discharged for defects in form of charge against him, when probably guilty of criminal offense.

It is not the duty of court to discharge the petitioner on habeas corpus where it appears that, notwithstanding defects in form of charge against him, he is probably guilty of criminal offense.

Original application by H. W. Scott for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Alameda County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Frank P. Webster and Keith Ferguson, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Earle Warren, Dist. Atty., and R. H. Chamberlain, Jr., Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, and Stanley C. Smallwood, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Pleasanton, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petition recites that applicant is restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Alameda county. That said restraint is illegal in this, that petitioner has been committed on a criminal charge of grand larceny of an automobile without reasonable or probable cause therefor, as the evidence of the prosecuting witness taken at the preliminary examination shows that she voluntarily delivered title to and possession of the automobile to petitioner. The return of the sheriff shows that petitioner was received by him into custody by virtue of a commitment issued out of the police court of the city of Oakland charging grand larceny by trick and device. That thereafter and on September 7, 1927, the district attorney of Alameda county filed an information charging petitioner with the commission of grand theft, based upon the same transaction shown at the preliminary examination. That on the following day, September 8, 1927, the superior court in and for Alameda county issued a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of petitioner, returnable September 12th, and on said day, after hearing, discharged the same. That on September 12, 1927, petitioner was duly arraigned on the information above mentioned and pleaded not guilty. The case was set for trial for September 26, 1927, by consent. Prior thereto, on September 23d, petitioner filed the present application in this court. Pending the hearing thereof trial was had which resulted in conviction.

The facts elicited at the preliminary examination show that petitioner in May, 1927, bought 80 acres of land from the Central Pacific Railway Company. This land, which was unimproved, was situated in the county of Butte, and according to the testimony of the assessor of the county it was assessed for $2.50 per acre. After the purchase of the land, petitioner, with one John J. Martin, who was charged with the same offense, appeared at the office of a title insurance company in Oroville and inquired for and procured insurance of title upon the same. At that time petitioner stated that he was going to sell the property and take back certain trust deeds thereon, the sale to be made to Martin, who was introduced as Mr. Clark. Thereafter advertisements appeared in an Oakland newspaper wherein petitioner announced that he was willing to trade or exchange certain trust deeds for secondhand automobiles. In answer to these advertisements, the complaining witness, Mrs. Cumbers, telephoned petitioner at his apartment in Oakland and made an appointment to see him. A meeting of the parties was had, at which time petitioner informed Mrs. Cumbers that he had sold a 10-acre tract in Butte county to a man named Clark for $2,500, and had taken back a promissory note and trust deed from Clark for $1,350. This land was a portion of the tract above referred to. He represented that the trust deed was a first lien upon the land which was worth $3,000; that it was improved with a bungalow and other buildings and was planted to fig trees which were four years old. After some negotiations, Mrs. Cumbers, relying upon these representations as to the land, traded her Dodge sedan automobile to petitioner for the note and trust deed which he assigned to her. During the negotiations, and before the transaction was consummated, petitioner referred Mrs. Cumbers to a "Mr. Martin," who, petitioner stated, could be found at the Key Route Inn, in Oakland, and petitioner also stated that Martin had seen the land and would verify his statements with reference to it. The person to whom Mrs. Cumbers was referred was John J. Martin, jointly accused with petitioner. Mrs. Cumbers endeavored to get in touch with Martin, but without success. A witness, Snyder, testified to a similar transaction had with petitioner Scott, during the course of which transaction Scott made the same representations. Snyder visited Martin at the Key Route Inn, and during the course of the conversation had between the parties

Martin informed Snyder that Scott owned property in Los Angeles and was worth from seventy-five to eighty thousand dollars and that if Snyder made a trade with Scott to have him indorse the note and he would cash it for a 10 per cent. discount. Martin further stated that he was familiar with the land in Butte county and that it was valuable. It further appeared in evidence that there were no buildings upon the land, nor were there any fig trees or any improvements whatsoever. Petitioner Scott and Martin were identified as being the parties who acknowledged the notes and deeds of trust transferred to Snyder and Mrs. Cumbers. It was also shown that Martin had signed and acknowledged these notes and trust deeds as James Clark. Other testimony was to the effect that the value of Mrs. Cumbers' automobile was between $950 and $1,000, and that it was accepted by petitioner upon that value.

At the close of this testimony the committing magistrate, as above stated, held petitioner to answer for the crime of grand larceny by trick and device. It seems to be conceded that the evidence fails to show that petitioner was guilty of grand larceny and should have been held for the crime of fraudulently obtaining property by false pretense. The commitment was dated August 24, 1927. Prior thereto and on July 29, 1927, the statute defining the crime of grand theft (Pen. Code, § 484 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1]), went into effect. This statute merged into the crime of grand theft the offenses which were formerly known under the names of larceny, embezzlement, and obtaining money by false pretenses. Section 487 of the Penal Code (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 4), which took effect on the same day, defines grand theft as being "1. When the property taken is of a value exceeding two hundred dollars. * * *" It was under these circumstances that the district attorney filed the information against petitioner for grand theft.

It is here contended that petitioner should have been held, if at all, for the crime of fraudulently obtaining property by false pretense, as the testimony clearly shows that he was not guilty of the crime of larceny. It is further claimed that his trial was a nullity for the reason that it occurred after the ex parte writ of habeas corpus issued out of this court, as such writ acted as a supersedeas; and, finally, that the statute defining the crime of grand theft, under which petitioner was prosecuted, is ex post facto as to the crime charged as it occurred prior to the taking effect of said statute. It is respondent's contention that after the rendition of a verdict of guilty the sufficiency of the evidence before the committing magistrate is not open to inquiry by means of the writ of habeas corpus; that the verdict rendered against petitioner is a valid one and the statute under which he was convicted is not ex post facto, it being procedural merely; that the trial court was not deprived of jurisdiction to try petitioner by reason of the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus out of this court. It is further contended that the objection, that there was no reasonable or probable cause for holding petitioner to answer, has been waived, for the reason that no objection was made to the information by way of demurrer or motion to set aside. We do not deem a discussion of these various questions or the manner in which they may be taken advantage of, to be necessary, as we are of the opinion that we are here only concerned with what transpired up to the time the commitment was made to the sheriff.

[1, 2] There can be no question but that the preliminary examination discloses a clear case of obtaining property by false pretenses. Every element of this crime is shown. The prosecution proved the making of the false pretenses, their falsity, the obtaining of the property, the reliance of the victim upon those representations, which induced her to part with her property, the intent to defraud, and the conspiracy between Scott and Martin. The error of the committing magistrate was merely in the designation of the offense upon which petitioner was held to answer. In Ex parte Severin, 188 Cal. 348, 205 P. 101, it is held that it is never the duty of the court to discharge a petitioner on habeas corpus where it appears that, notwithstanding defects in the form of the charge against him, he is probably guilty of a criminal offense. In that case the petitioner had been held to answer to the superior court on a charge of embezzlement. The evidence taken at the preliminary examination, so the Supreme Court held, could not sustain a commitment for that crime, but as was said:

"The evidence shows probable cause to believe that the petitioner is guilty of either one or the other of three distinct crimes: (1) Larceny by trick and device * * *; (2) embezzlement of money obtained by trick and device, * * * or (3) obtaining money by false pretenses."

The language of the late Justice Beatty in Ex parte Nicholas, 91 Cal. 643, 28 P. 48, is there quoted as follows:

"He has been examined upon a charge which the committing magistrate has denominated larceny, but it may well be that the depositions prove embezzlement. It not infrequently happens that the facts of a particular case leave it extremely doubtful under which definition the offense falls—that of larceny or embezzlement; and if the committing magistrate should give it a wrong designation in his order of commitment, that would not prevent the district attorney from charging it correctly in the information."

The petitioner was accordingly remanded. The instant case presents the identical situation. See, also, In re Moore, 70 Cal. App. 483, 233 P. 805.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner remanded.

Ex parte RISSMAN. (Cr. 1575.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1927.

Habeas corpus §30(2)—Defendant held not entitled to discharge on habeas corpus where complaint in municipal court contained attempt to charge crime (Const. art. 6, §§ 1 and 12).

Since Const. art. 6, §§ 1 and 12, provides that municipal courts are courts of record, as distinguished from inferior courts, where complaint therein charged at least attempt to commit crime, failure to state facts necessary to constitute such crime did not entitle defendant to discharge by means of writ of habeas corpus.

Original application by Daniel Rissman for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Petition denied.

William M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. The complaint in the municipal court contained at least an attempt to charge defendant therein with commission of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, a misdemeanor. Where this is so, and the jurisdiction challenged is that of a court of record, the failure to state all of the facts necessary to constitute such crime does not entitle the defendant to discharge by means of the writ of habeas corpus. Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 P. 605. The writ is available for that purpose in an inferior court. In re Hernandez, 64 Cal. App. 71, 220 P. 423.

But the Constitution, in providing for municipal courts, has made them courts of record, and has plainly distinguished them from "inferior courts." Const. art. 6, §§ 1 and 12.

Assuming, without deciding, that the complaint against defendant, in the count on which he was convicted is defective in the particulars stated by him in his petition herein, and that thereby the facts stated in said count are not sufficient to constitute the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, this does not entitle him to the writ. He must be content with the ordinary remedies, including his right of appeal.

The petition is denied.

WYLIE v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF SANTA BARBARA.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SANTA BARBARA v. WYLIE et al.

(Civ. 5517.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1927.

As Corrected Feb. 2, 1928.

Escrows §9—Plaintiff not complying with agreement to convey land free of incumbrance was not entitled to delivery of C.'s deed placed in escrow.

Where plaintiff owed $2,500 on land contract and executed deed to C. purporting to convey part of land without reference to any incumbrance, and thus failed to comply with his agreement with C. to convey land free of incumbrance, plaintiff was not entitled to delivery of C.'s deed for other land in exchange, placed in escrow, even if there was agreement between C. and R., purchaser of another part of plaintiff's land, that C. should pay part of $2,500, and R. should pay part, where R. did not pay any of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Joseph R. Wylie against the First National Bank of Santa Barbara, in which defendant filed cross-complaint making Otto B. Colley and wife, and others, cross-defendants. From the judgment, cross-defendants named appeal. Reversed with directions.

George Appell, of Los Angeles, and E. V. Van Bever, of Santa Barbara, for appellants. Fred A. Shaeffer, of Santa Maria, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This is an action in the nature of replevin to recover from the defendant bank two deeds alleged to have been deposited in escrow with it to be delivered to the plaintiff at such time as the bank should receive from plaintiff deeds executed by him conveying severally to the grantors in the deeds so deposited with the bank tracts of land described in the complaint. The complaint alleges that plaintiff deposited with defendant the deeds, duly executed and acknowledged by him, his demand for the deeds deposited in escrow, the refusal of the bank to deliver them, and prays judgment enforcing their delivery. The defendant answered denying the allegations of the complaint upon information and belief, and filed a cross-complaint making the plaintiff and the grantors, and their wives, in the deeds deposited in escrow with it, cross-defendants, disclaiming any interest in the controversy or knowledge of the rights of the several parties, tendering all documents into court, and asking that it be dismissed and that the parties to the deeds be required to set forth and litigate their controversies between themselves. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff made no answer, but the cross-defendants Oliver C. Ricketts and Ada L. Ricketts, his wife, and Otto B. Colley and Catherina Colley, his wife, grantors respectively in the escrow deeds, answered jointly. Upon the trial the defendant bank was dismissed from the action, and the answers to the cross-complaint were apparently considered as answers to the plaintiff's complaint. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, directing the clerk to deliver to him the deeds executed by Ricketts and wife and Colley and wife, respectively. No order was made in the decree as to the disposition of Wylie's deeds to these parties. From this judgment only the defendants Colley and wife appeal, and the evidence and proceedings at the trial are incorporated in a bill of exceptions.

The evidence discloses that on March 27, 1922, plaintiff and Colley entered into an agreement in writing by which plaintiff agreed to sell and convey to Colley, and Colley agreed to buy, a tract of 70 acres of land in San Luis Obispo county "free and clear of all incumbrance" and to "give deed and title to the same." Colley agreed "to give in exchange for the above-described property of the first part property located at 1809 Orange avenue free and clear of all incumbrances" and to "give deed and title for same." The two parcels of land which plaintiff agreed to sell and convey to Ricketts and Colley, respectively, are parts of a tract which plaintiff had contracted to purchase from Los Berros Land & Water Company, on which there was an unpaid balance owing from plaintiff to the company, the title to which stood in the latter. The contract for title to Ricketts was by its terms made subject to the contract with the company; that with Colley made no reference to it except the following:

"This agreement is subject to the approval of the Los Berros Land & Water Company for the transfer of the contract given to Joseph R. Wylie July 30, 1921."

On April 4, 1922, Ricketts and wife and Colley and wife executed deeds to the plaintiff and his wife as joint tenants of the lots of land agreed by them respectively to be conveyed. On the same day by mutual understanding the deeds were deposited by A. L. Page, who had negotiated the transactions as plaintiff's agent, with the bank, with written instructions to "deliver these deeds to the grantee upon the receipt from him of two deeds conveying property in San Luis Obispo county described in an agreement which you now hold in escrow made July 13, 1921, between Los Berros Land & Water Company and J. R. Wylie." On April 25, 1922, Los Berros Land & Water Company executed a deed conveying to plaintiff a tract of land including that agreed to be sold by him to Ricketts and Colley, and deposited the deed with the bank with instructions to deliver it to Wylie upon payment to its account of $2,500, balance of the purchase price due from Wylie. This was not paid and the deed never delivered. On May 15, 1922, Ricketts and Colley each severally gave to the bank written notice of rescission, and each notified the bank not to deliver the deed executed by him to Wylie. On May 18, 1922, Wylie and his wife executed to Ricketts an assignment of his contract of purchase with Los Berros Land & Water Company. It does not appear from the evidence what was done with this assignment. On May 19, 1923, about a year after the latest of the above-recited transactions, Wylie and his wife executed deeds to Ricketts and Colley respectively of the lands to be conveyed to them. The deed to Ricketts recited that it was made subject to the contract with Los Berros Land & Water Company; that to Colley purported to convey title without reference to any incumbrance.

Oral evidence was introduced tending to show that after the contracts of March 27 were entered into between the several parties negotiations were begun between Wylie and Ricketts and Colley for a division between the latter of the payment of the $2,500 owing to the land and water company, but there was no pleading or proof that Colley entered into any written agreement with Wylie changing the terms of the original contract. There is no evidence in the record to show that there was any understanding by any of the parties that Colley was to assume any of the indebtedness to the land and water company, until after his contract was entered into. If there had been, it was of course concluded by the contracts. The subsequent actions of Wylie in signing and acknowledging an assignment of the land and water company contract to Ricketts and executing his deed to Ricketts subject to that contract, and his deed to Colley without any reference to it, indicate that there was no such understanding or agreement.

It would appear from the evidence that there may have been some subsequent agreement between Ricketts and Colley that the latter should pay some part of the $2,500, but Ricketts did not pay or offer to pay any part of it. Certainly the plaintiff could not evade performance of his obligation to convey to Colley a title free and clear of incumbrance and throw the burden upon Colley of forcing Ricketts to clear the title, and yet this is the position in which the judgment of the trial court leaves the appellant.

The plaintiff, having failed to comply with his agreement to convey to Colley the land free and clear of all incumbrance, was not entitled to the delivery of the deed.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, with directions to revise its findings as to the appellants Colley, in accordance with the foregoing, and to enter judgment in their favor.

ATLANTIC FISH CO. v. DOLLAR S. S. LINE. (Civ. 5854.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 4, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1927. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 3, 1928.

1. Novation ⇐12—Freight solicitor's statement that shipment would come under refrigeration held not novation of bill of lading reciting shipment was by cool stowage.

Where bill of lading for shipment of dried fish by vessel recited that shipment was to be carried by "cool stowage, not refrigeration," evidence that vessel's freight solicitor subsequently stated in conversation with shipper that it would come under refrigeration held not to show novation.

2. Shipping ⇐108—Conversation as to shipping fish under refrigeration held not to constitute oral contract superseding bill of lading to ship by cool stowage.

Where bill of lading for shipment of dried fish recited that shipment was to be by cool stowage, statement of vessel's freight solicitor to shipper that shipment would come under refrigeration held not to constitute oral contract superseding bill of lading, where bill of lading was not mentioned and alleged oral agreement was not executed.

3. Carriers ⇐52(1), 53—"Bill of lading" is receipt and contract of carriage between parties.

A bill of lading is a receipt and also a contract of carriage between parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bill of Lading.]

4. Carriers ⇐53—Bill of lading as contract of carriage can be altered only by contract in writing or executed oral agreement (Civ. Code, § 1698).

As a contract of carriage between parties, a bill of lading can, under Civ. Code, § 1698, only be altered by a contract in writing or an executed oral agreement.

5. New trial ⇐137—Combining notice of intention to move for new trial and notice of motion for new trial held not error.

Notice by defendant that it intends to and will on named day move that new trial be granted, being a combination of notice of intention to move for new trial and notice of motion for new trial, held not erroneous practice.

6. New trial ⇐163(1)—Order granting motion for new trial for "insufficient evidence" held not at variance with statute authorizing new trial for "insufficiency of evidence" (Code Civ. Proc. § 656, subd. 6).

Order granting motion for new trial on ground of insufficient evidence held not to be at variance with Code Civ. Proc. § 656, subd. 6, authorizing new trial for insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Fish Company, a copartnership composed of H. M. Colety and others, against the Dollar Steamship Line. Verdict for plaintiff. From order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Milton L. Schmitt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Nathan H. Frank and Irving H. Frank, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover damages for detriment caused to a shipment of dried fish. The defendant answered and a trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial. The motion was granted, and the plaintiff has appealed.

By written correspondence the Atlantic Fish Company bought from the Gorton-Pew Fisheries Company a quantity of salt fish. The fish were packed at Gloucester, Mass. By the terms of the contract of purchase the fish were to be sent to Boston, Mass. At that port they were to be reshipped under refrigeration.

eration to the purchaser at San Francisco on the President Hayes, one of the defendant's vessels which touches at Boston and New York. On August 13, 1924, the day before the President Hayes left Boston, the seller advised the purchaser that the refrigeration department of the President Hayes was broken down, and that it could not carry the goods in refrigeration, and the seller asked for further instructions. On the same day the seller received a reply to "authorize Hayes shipment to come through under ventilation." Thereupon the goods were shipped on that steamer. A bill of lading was issued which recited, among other things, "cool stowage, not refrigeration." When the bill of lading was delivered to the shipper no objection was made by it. The shipper sent the bill of lading to the plaintiff, and when it received the document no objection was made.

The telegram dated August 12, 1924, authorizing the shipment "under ventilation," was sent by Mr. Colety, Jr., one of the members of the plaintiff copartnership. Mr. Colety, Sr., was out of town and returned August 14, 1924. On the next day about 9 a. m. he called at defendant's office in San Francisco and talked to Mr. Herman, a person who solicits freight. The record is silent as to whether he has any other authority. Mr. Colety exhibited to Mr. Herman the telegram received by the plaintiff from the shipper and stated that the shipment must come under refrigeration. Mr. Herman left the room and returned, saying it would come under refrigeration. Neither in that conversation, nor in any other conversation, nor in any other manner, was any attempt made to have the bill of lading recalled and an amended bill of lading issued, nor to have the shipment stopped at New York and reshipped. No new consideration passed.

No claim is made that the goods were not in fact carried under "ventilation" or "cool stowage." The plaintiff's sole claim is that they were not carried under "refrigeration."

[1] The plaintiff claims the facts show a novation. The claim is not supported by the facts. Assuming that Mr. Herman was thereunto duly authorized to issue, amend, or alter bills of lading (facts nowhere contained in the record), the utmost that the plaintiff could assert is that the clause, "cool stowage—not refrigeration," was, by Mr. Herman, changed to "refrigeration," and otherwise that the bill of lading remained wholly unaltered.

[2] Again, the plaintiff claims that the oral conversation between Mr. Colety, Sr., and Mr. Herman constituted an oral contract which superseded the bill of lading. It did not. All of the evidence received at the trial tending to show the oral contract did not constitute a contract of carriage. The parties to that conversation did not agree on and determine (1) what goods were to be carried; (2) what place they were to be received and to what place they were to be carried; (3) what was to be the cost of the transportation; or (4) what was to be the manner of transportation except that it was to be in refrigeration. No one of these factors can be ascertained except by an examination of the bill of lading which was then outstanding and which was not even mentioned in the conversation. In this same connection the plaintiff speaks of an executed oral agreement. It is perfectly clear that, under the facts, there was no execution whatever on either side of the alleged oral agreement. The very nature of the plaintiff's claim is that the defendant did not execute what the plaintiff says the defendant promised to do. By the terms of the oral agreement, it is not claimed the plaintiff promised to do anything, and it is not alleged that it did anything. There was not, therefore, an executed oral agreement on the part of either of the parties.

[3, 4] It is settled law that a bill of lading is (1) a receipt, and (2) it is the contract of carriage between the parties. 10 C. J. 192, § 251. As the contract of carriage between the parties, the bill of lading could be altered only by a contract in writing or an executed oral agreement. Civ. Code, § 1698. This fundamental rule has been held applicable to the alteration of bills of lading. 10 C. J. 198, § 260. The evidence introduced at the trial showed no cause of action against the defendant. The trial court did not err in granting a new trial and the order should be affirmed if there is no other infirmity.

[5] The jury returned its verdict on September 15, 1926. The judgment was entered September 16, 1926. On the fifth day thereafter the defendant served and filed a notice that it "intends to and will, on Friday, the 24th day of September, 1926," move that a new trial be granted. In other words, it combined its notice of intention to move for a new trial and its notice of motion for a new trial. The practice was not erroneous, and such speed is to be commended. The contention of the plaintiff that, because the paper was a notice of motion, it was not therefore a notice of intention is without merit.

[6] The second ground of the motion for a new trial was "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." That is the language of the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 656, subd. 6. The order ruling on the motion was worded as follows:

"Motion for new trial granted on ground of insufficient evidence."

The plaintiff contends the ground stated in the order is not contained in the statute. We think it is. The variance is so slight as to lead to no confusion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte VENABLE. (Cr. 999.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 4, 1927.

1. Habeas corpus $\S$ 92(1)—Commitment under which petitioner was held when writ was issued, having become functus officio, will not be further considered.

Where commitment, under which petitioner for habeas corpus was held at time writ was issued, had become functus officio, it will not be further considered on hearing of such petition.

2. Habeas corpus $\S$ 29—Petitioner for habeas corpus on ground of unreasonable delay in criminal prosecution held not entitled to release unless judgment was void.

Petitioner for habeas corpus to secure release on ground of unreasonable delay in criminal prosecution held not entitled to release unless judgment of conviction therein was void, since fact that defendant had not been given a speedy trial does not affect jurisdiction of court.

3. Habeas corpus $\S$ 30(1)—Denial of motion to dismiss prosecution is not ground for petitioner's release on habeas corpus.

Denial of motion to dismiss criminal prosecution held not to constitute ground for release on petition for habeas corpus from imprisonment whether or not such denial constituted ground for reversal of judgment on appeal therefrom.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 576(2)—Epidemic of infantile paralysis held "good cause" for continuing criminal prosecution beyond 60-day period.

Prevalence of an epidemic of infantile paralysis in town wherein court was held, which prevented calling of juries during such period, and which commenced within period of 60 days after first trial on charge of possessing intoxicating liquor resulting in disagreement of jury, held to constitute "good cause" for continuing trial beyond 60-day period.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Cause.]

5. Habeas corpus $\S$ 85(1)—Habeas corpus will be denied if reasonable deduction from evidence supports trial court's action in denying motion to dismiss.

Writ of habeas corpus will be denied if, on the conceded facts in evidence, a reasonable deduction would support action of trial court in denying motion for dismissal.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 576(2)—Trial on October 14, continued by agreement from October 6, held not unreasonable delay after cessation of epidemic in middle of September, warranting discharge on habeas corpus.

Where after termination of epidemic of infantile paralysis about the middle of September, prosecution on charge of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor was set for trial on October 6, and continued to October 14, by agreement of counsel, there was no unreasonable delay in bringing case to trial after cessation of epidemic, warranting discharge on habeas corpus.

Original application by James Venable for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the sheriff of Glenn county. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

H. W. McGowan, of Willows, for petitioner.
Guy L. Louderback, Dist. Atty., of Willows, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. July 7, 1927, the petitioner was tried in the justice's court on a charge of the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. The trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury. On the 30th of that month he was released on bail. October 3d his sureties surrendered him into custody. On the same day he moved the justice's court to dismiss the action on the ground that he had not been given a speedy trial. October 10th, on his application therefor, the Supreme Court issued a writ of habeas corpus, returnable before this court October 24th. On application of petitioner the matter was continued to November 3d. October 14th the petitioner was again placed on trial and was convicted of the offense charged. He was thereupon sentenced to pay a fine of $225, or, in default of payment thereof, to be imprisoned in the county jail until satisfaction of the fine at the rate of one day for each dollar of the fine. He has not paid the fine and is now imprisoned in the county jail under the judgment of conviction.

[1] It is clear that the commitment under which the petitioner was held at the time the writ herein was issued has become functus officio, and it need not be further considered.

[2, 3] The petitioner is not entitled to his release by this proceeding unless the judgment of conviction is void. The fact that a defendant has not been given a speedy trial does not affect the jurisdiction of the court. People v. Hawkins, 127 Cal. 372, 374, 59 P. 697. Whether the denial of the motion to dismiss the action constitutes ground for reversal of the judgment on appeal therefrom is not a question before the court in this proceeding. It is sufficient to say that such denial is not a ground for petitioner's release on habeas corpus from imprisonment under the judgment. In re Todd, 44 Cal. App. 496, 499, 186 P. 790.

[4-6] The return shows and the petitioner admits that from the first to the middle of September an epidemic of infantile praralysis was prevalent in the town wherein the sessions of the justice's court were held, and that for that reason no juries were called during that period. In the case of In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 352, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178, relied on by petitioner, it is said:

"It is sufficient for the defendant, in order to make out his case upon a motion for a dismissal in the trial court, to show that he has been detained without a trial for more than 60 days. Upon such showing the court should dismiss the case, unless good cause for detaining the defendant and for continuing the prosecution is shown on behalf of the people."

It cannot be said that the prevalence of the epidemic, which commenced within the period of 60 days after the first trial, did not constitute good cause for continuing the trial to a day beyond the 60-day period. The writ will be denied if, "on the conceded facts in evidence a reasonable deduction therefrom would support the action of the trial court in denying the motion." 8 Cal. Jur. 209; Matter of Ford, 160 Cal. 334, 349, 116 P. 757, 763 (35 L. R. A. [N. S.] 882, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1267). The case was set to be tried October 6th, and was on that day continued, by agreement of counsel, to October 14th, on which day it was tried. It cannot be held, therefore, that there was an unreasonable delay in bringing the case to trial after the cessation of the epidemic.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

BROWN v. HOWARD et al. (Civ. 4978.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Judgment $\S$ 401—Defendant, from whom money was collected under execution on judgment obtained against several defendants, held, under stipulation, entitled to reimbursement from all sums collected in action.

Where, after plaintiff had obtained money on levy on property of one of defendants, under execution pursuant to judgment obtained against several defendants, stipulation was entered into vacating judgment and providing for reimbursing defendant from sums levied and collected, held, that said defendant was entitled to be reimbursed from all sums levied and collected in action, and not merely from that obtained from other defendants in the future.

2. Evidence $\S$ 471(9)—Question for explanation of reason for entering stipulation held properly excluded as calling for conclusion.

Though, in case of ambiguity, parol evidence of circumstances surrounding execution of stipulation is admissible to show intent of parties, such circumstances cannot be shown by asking one signing stipulation to explain reasons for entering into it, since question would call for a conclusion of the witness.

3. Attorney and client $\S$ 26—Attorney holding money collected on levy under execution held liable only for amount held by him when judgment was set aside.

Attorney collecting money pursuant to levy under execution, on subsequent setting aside of judgment, was liable only for such sum remaining in his hands at time judgment was set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Lillian Brown against Leota Howard and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified, and affirmed as modified.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry K. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for money had and received. Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered for plaintiff.

In the year 1922 an action was commenced by Leota Howard, one of the defendants herein, to foreclose a chattel mortgage, in which action the plaintiff and respondent was one of the parties defendant. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff herein as defendant in that action. Execution was issued thereon, and under the said execution the sheriff of Los Angeles county levied upon the property of the plaintiff herein, and collected the sum of $907, which sum, on December 20, 1922, was turned over to Harry Lyons as attorney for the plaintiff in said action. Lyons testified that all of said money was immediately paid by him to Leota Howard, one of the defendants herein, except a sum not exceeding $100, which Lyons retained as his attorney's fee. On January 5, 1923, upon stipulation of counsel in open court, it was ordered that the judgment in said cause be set aside, and plaintiff therein given leave to file a supplemental complaint in said action. On January 6, 1923, pursuant to the foregoing order, the court ordered the sheriff to release all property, money, or securities of any kind belonging to Lillian Brown and in the hands of any bank or trustee, which was levied upon by virtue of the writ of execution issued in said matter. On June 30, 1923, Harry Lyons, as attorney for plaintiff, and Harry K. Smith, as attorney for defendant, Lillian Brown, in said action, entered into a stipulation "that the complaint against Lillian Brown be dismissed, and that the said Leota Howard reimburse the said Lillian Brown in the sum of $900, and no interest from sums levied and collected in the within entitled action; that everything which is above the sum of $1,600, and any moneys collected by the plaintiff against the property of any of the defendants, except Lillian Brown, in excess of the said sum of $1,600, be immediately turned over to the said Lillian Brown until the sum of $900, and no interest will be repaid to said Lillian Brown. That the attorney for the plaintiff file a dismissal against Lillian Brown, and that said Lillian Brown waiving any and all claims against Leota Howard in the within entitled action; except the sum of $900 to be paid as above provided." The defendant and appellant subsequently paid to the plaintiff herein the sum of $118. In the present action the appellant Harry Lyons filed an answer denying the allegations of the complaint, and Leota Howard, defendant and appellant, in addition to her denial, pleaded specially the said stipulation as a defense.

[1, 2] It is urged by appellants that under the terms of the stipulation the plaintiff and respondent herein was not entitled to any moneys excepting from the funds to be levied against, and collected from, the other defendants in the future. Appellants' position is, in our opinion, untenable. When the judgment was vacated the defendants herein held in trust for the use of the plaintiff all the money which had been turned over to them by the sheriff by virtue of the execution issued under said judgment so vacated and set aside. This money was a sum which had been levied and collected in said action, and it was stipulated that the plaintiff be reimbursed "from sums levied and collected" in the said action. The additional clauses in said stipulation merely provided a further source from which plaintiff might be reimbursed. Plaintiff was not limited to this further source for her reimbursement, but it was expressly stipulated that plaintiff be reimbursed from all sums levied and collected in the action. The stipulation is sufficiently clear and definite to support the finding that, by the terms of said stipulation, it was intended that the money collected by the defendants from the funds of plaintiff should be repaid to plaintiff, and that the parties so agreed. True, if there be any ambiguity in the stipulation, parol evidence of the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the instrument would be admissible to show the intent of the parties in signing the stipulation, but such surrounding facts and circumstances could not be shown by the question addressed to opposing counsel who signed the stipulation asking him to explain the reasons for entering into the stipulation. We see no error in the ruling of the trial court sustaining an objection to the foregoing question as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, since the question called for a conclusion of the witness.

[3] The evidence is undisputed that all the money collected under the execution against the respondent herein, excepting a sum not exceeding $100, was turned over by the defendant Harry Lyons to his codefendant immediately after the same was collected, and before the judgment under which the execution was issued was set aside. Presumptively that judgment was regular and valid on its face, and the execution was likewise valid. Consequently the money collected under the said execution came into the hands of defendant Harry Lyons lawfully. It was not until the judgment in said action had been set aside that plaintiff became entitled to the return of said money and that defendants could be said to hold said money for the use and benefit of plaintiff. Bank of United States v. Bank of Washington, 6 Pet. 19, 8 L. Ed. 299. Consequently the liability of defendant Lyons cannot exceed the sum of $100 which was remaining in his hands at the time said judgment was set aside. Rickert v. Pollock, 46 Misc. Rep. 275, 92 N. Y. S. 89.

The judgment is ordered affirmed, except that the judgment against defendant Harry Lyons shall be modified so that the judgment against said defendant shall be in the sum of $100 only.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action to recover rentals due under a lease and sums due under a promissory note brought by Ella W. Peasley and husband against the Producers' Market Company, Inc., and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Daly, Daly & Todd, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Herbert Moore, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. In this case the appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action brought by the plaintiffs for the collection of certain payments on a lease and the note for $1,200, given for the last six months' rental under said lease, which lease purported to rent lots 13 and 15 of block 91, Long Beach township, county of Los Angeles, state of California, for a period of four years and four months, at a total rental of $9,800, and was signed, "Producers' Market Company, a corporation, per T. W. Burnam," without seal. The date of both note and lease was the 10th day of November, 1921. Lease rentals were payable at the rate of $150 a month on the 1st day of each month for the first year, beginning December 1, 1921, and at the rate of $200 per month on the 1st day of each month thereafter during the term of the lease. Plaintiffs prayed for judgment for $1,200 and interest at 8 per cent. and a further sum of $120 attorneys' fees and an additional sum of $600 for four months' accrued rentals. This action was filed on March 31, 1922. The note was signed, "Producers' Market Company, per T. W. Burnam." The Producers' Market Company, Incorporated, and T. W. Burnam, defendants, failed to answer, and a default judgment was taken in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, which default judgment was later set aside and vacated by stipulation of counsel. The answer of the defendants was that the lease and note were signed, "Producers' Market Company, per T. W. Burnam," but for no consideration and without any authority on the part of the said T. W. Burnam, and further alleged that on or about the 6th day of February, 1922, the said plaintiffs were notified by the Producers' Market Company that said note was executed without authority and written notice given to the plaintiffs in the following language:

"Long Beach, Cal. Feb. 6, 1922.

"Samuel C. Peasley and Ella W. Peasley, 419 East 5th Street, Long Beach, Cal.—Dear Sir and Madam: You will take notice that that certain lease entered into by yourselves as lessors on November 10th, 1921, whereby certain premises described as follows: Lots thirteen (13) and fifteen (15), in block ninety-one (91), of Long Beach township, in the city of Long Beach, county of Los Angeles, state of California, as per map recorded in Book 19, page 91 et seq., Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles County, was leased to the Producers' Market Co., a corporation, for a term of four (4) years and four (4) months, commencing on December 1st, 1921, and ending on March 31, 1926, at an aggregate rental of nine thousand eight hundred dollars ($9,800), was done without the authority and consent of the board of directors of said Producers' Market Co., a corporation. You will further take notice that at a meeting of the board of directors of said Producers' Market Co., a corporation, held on February 6, 1922, in the city of Long Beach, California, a resolution was duly passed by said board of directors dis-affirming the action of the president in signing said above-mentioned lease, and that said lease was declared to be null and void and not binding on said Producers' Market Co., a corporation, and that notice in writing of such action by the board of directors be given you. You are, therefore, notified that the Producers' Market Co., a corporation, disclaims any and all interest in and to said lease, and likewise refuses to be bound by any of the terms, conditions and covenants contained therein. Dated this 6th day of February, 1922. Producers' Market Co., a corporation, By T. W. Burnam, President. [Seal.]

"Attest: Y. Mizuno, Treasurer T. B."

No money was ever paid on account of the note nor on account of the lease except $150, paid by T. W. Burnam, which, it is alleged, was by check of the Producers' Market Company, signed by T. W. Burnam personally, whether in his official capacity or not is not disclosed by the transcript.

The lots 13 and 15, described in the lease, are stated to be directly across the alley from lots 14 and 16 occupied by the Producers' Market Company.

There seems to be no dispute in the evidence nor between counsel about the location of the two properties, nor as to the fact that T. W. Burnam signed the name "Producers' Market Company, per T. W. Burnam," to both the note and the lease, and that at the time of signing was president of the Producers' Market Company.

The evidence shows that Mrs. Peasley, plaintiff, asked Burnam if it was all right for him to sign it and make it and have another signature, and he answered that he was secretary and president and main stockholder, and what he said went. This shows knowledge of irregularity.

From the minutes of the Producers' Market Company of February 6, 1922, and from all the evidence in the transcript it would appear that there was never any formal authorization to said T. W. Burnam to enter into a lease or to sign a note, and that when the matter was presented to the company at their meeting on the 6th day of February, 1922, it was voted to reject the lease signed by said T. W. Burnam, therefore the decision in this case rests almost entirely upon the question of the implied or ostensible authority of the said T. W. Burnam to act as agent for the Producers' Market Company by virtue of his position as president and secretary of said company.

From the reporter's transcript of the testimony given in this case the only evidence that authority was given T. W. Burnam to obtain a lease, was an agreement under date of August 15, 1921, between two of the Japanese who were directors of the company with said T. W. Burnam, which designates, among other things, that the said Burnam was to take steps to organize the Producers' Market Company, and further to obtain a lease to lots 14 and 16 in block 91 for five years for the sum of $1,200, which is equivalent to about $20 per month for the two lots. The evidence, however, shows that all that was done was done in the name of T. W. Burnam and that the Japanese refused to enter into the contract on the building, which was afterwards constructed, and that that was done in the name of T. W. Burnam.

The evidence further shows that of the five directors of the Producers' Market Company, four were Japanese. It further shows that on the 10th day of November, 1921, the assets of the Producers' Market Company were only what had been realized on the 15 shares of stock subscribed upon incorporation, and that what they then had on hand was about $100. It further shows that the Producers' Market Company never had a lease and did not at the time of this action hold a lease to the property occupied by them, as it stood in the name of T. W. Burnam at that time. The evidence does not show that any of the Japanese directors had knowledge of the lease obtained from the plaintiff until about the 6th day of February, 1922, at which time they rejected the same. The evidence does show that there was some talk about leasing said lots 13 and 15 at a rental not exceeding $50 per month, which it would appear was about 2½ times the local rate of rental for such property as agreed to by the Japanese directors in the event of rental of lots 14 and 16 in said block 91. It is further well to note that at the time of the lease by the said Burnam from the plaintiffs, there was no building nor business conducted on lots 14 and 16, and that had the plaintiffs known all that there was to know, as shown by the evidence, there would have been no authorization either by act or consent or waiver on the part of the Japanese directors for leasing, signing notes, or making agreements of any kind without their action as a board, other than in the regular buying and selling of produce. The mere fact that certain checks of the company were used by T. W. Burnam and signed by him as president and secretary, and especially the one which was given as a first payment of rental under the lease from the plaintiffs, would, if carefully examined, have shown that they were irregularly used and not in accordance with the by-laws of the company or the ordinary usages and customs of business. The evidence which shows that the plaintiffs received $150 on account of rental does not show that this was known to the Japanese directors or any one but Mr. Burnam, connected with the Producers' Market Company. It further shows no consideration received by the Producers' Market Company whatever, nor does it show that plaintiffs saw either Mr. Burnam or any of the Japanese directors or any of the customers or employees of the Producers' Market Company upon the said lots 13 and 15.

Their only testimony being that they had seen Japs there whom they did not know, and that there had been some market trucks on said lots and some rubbish burned there by Japanese, but the evidence neither shows that the trucks belonged to the Producers' Market Company nor to any of their employees nor that even the burning of rubbish was by any one authorized by the Producers' Market Company. Neither is there anything in the evidence to show that if all the acts of the company during the period of 87 days from the time the lease was entered into with Mr. Burnam and the rejection of the lease and notice by the Producers' Market Company had been known to the plaintiffs in this action that it would have in any manner warranted them in believing that T. W. Burnam had authority to sign either notes or a lease or that any one on behalf of the Producers' Market Company had taken any possession of said lots 13 and 15, nor in any manner shown any knowledge of the lease of said property on the part of the company other than the said T. W. Burnam.

A portion of the by-laws of the Producers' Market Company appears as follows:

"The president shall be the chief executive officer, head of the company, and shall have general control and management of its business and affairs, subject to the control of the board of directors and executive committee; he shall sign all certificates of stock and all conveyances of real property executed in its behalf for the company and all contracts and documents required by the board of directors or necessary to carry on the business of the company. * * * The treasurer shall safely keep all moneys of the company which may come into his hands from time to time and pay out the same upon check or draft of the president, countersigned by the treasurer or otherwise signed in pursuance of the order of the board of directors; keep accurate books of account of the transactions of his office, and generally perform all other duties pertaining to his office, or which may be required of him by the board of directors; he shall countersign all documents requiring the signature of the president as hereinbefore provided."

These by-laws might, upon a first reading, indicate also authority to the president to sign certain documents, but if read carefully it will be noted that while the president is given general control of the business it is subject to the control of the board of directors and the executive committee, and neither the lease nor the note were ever approved by the board of directors or any executive committee. It is further to be noted that the treasurer of the company has charge of all moneys and may pay the same upon check or draft of the president, countersigned by the treasurer or otherwise signed in pursuance of the order of the board of directors, but so far as the evidence shows neither the treasurer nor the other members of the board of directors ever acted with the said T. W. Burnam in the matter of signing either the lease, the note, or the check of the company with which Burnam paid the first month's rental.

The law in this respect is best shown by the following citations: In the case of Northwestern Packing Co. v. Whitney, 5 Cal. App. 109, 89 P. 982, it is said:

"Where a corporation is sought to be charged for a breach of an agreement which has not been performed, and there is no question as to estoppel or ratification, the by-laws of the corporation are admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing that the contract was not executed as the by-laws provide."

In the case of Crowley v. Genesee Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273, 275, it is also said:

"The common-law rule, that a corporation has no capacity to act, or to make a contract, except under its common seal, has been long since exploded in this country. * * * In the United States, nothing more is requisite than to show the authority of the agent to contract. That authority may be conferred by the corporation at a regular meeting of the directors, or by their separate assent, or by any other mode of their doing such acts."

In the case of Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 81, 21 P. 555, 556, 12 Am. St. Rep. 131, it is said:

"In order to maintain his action, it was necessary for the plaintiff to allege an assignment to him by the California Powder Works of the claim sued on. And the denial of that allegation by the defendant cast the burden of proving it upon the plaintiff. This he attempted and failed to do. The secretary of the company, who executed the assignment on which plaintiff relies, is not shown to have had any power to make it. The ratification of the board of directors was not given until after the commencement of the action,—too late to avail the plaintiff anything, as he could not recover for a cause of action accruing after he commenced his action."

Also in the case of Fudickar v. East River Irr. Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 41 P. 1024, the following language is found:

"Being real property the interest sued for could be conveyed only by deed; and, to support the deed of a corporation (when, as in this case, it does not bear the corporate seal) it is incumbent on the party relying on it to show affirmatively that it was executed by authority of a resolution of the board of directors, entered on the records of the corporation, or that it was ratified by such a resolution."

In the case of Fontana v. Pacific Can Co., 129 Cal. 54, 61 P. 581, we find the following statement:

"Plaintiffs do not claim that there was any evidence, and there was none, showing that the directors of the corporation had, by resolution or by any other action, official or otherwise, authorized the president and secretary to make the contract; there is no evidence that either of these officers was clothed with general or special powers to make such a contract, or had any powers from which it might be inferred that they or either of them could make such a contract; there was no corporate seal attached;

there is no evidence or claim of subsequent ratification by the directors of the corporation. The Pixley Case is not authority for the broad proposition that the partial execution of a contract by a corporation raises the presumption of authority to make it. The presumption in that case arose from the established acts of the directors of the corporation, as well as from the part execution of the contract. In the case here there is no evidence that the directors ever knew of the contract, much less authorized it by their conduct or acts. * * * It is affirmatively shown that the contract bears no seal of the corporation, and its absence is not accounted for in any way. * * * Besides, whatever presumption arose that the seal was attached was overcome by the admission that in fact no seal was attached."

The foregoing citation practically fits the facts of this case.

Other cases cited in the briefs of counsel in this case are based upon actions in which the evidence shows ratification, as appears in Western Lithograph Co. v. Vanomar, 185 Cal. 366, 369, 197 P. 103, or, presumptive authority, as is brought out in the case of Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., 181 Cal. 510, 185 P. 388, where the action of the president warranted a presumption of authority but the granting of a non-suit was not warranted without further hearing, or include matters not involved here.

[1] It has been stated in various ways that a corporation is an artificial person without either mental or moral powers and cannot act except through its officers, and that it can only act in accordance with their by-laws by affixing the mark of its artificial body—its seal—by the act of an officer or a person duly authorized by resolution passed by at least the majority of its directors or in accordance with the signatures of a majority thereof, although the said corporation may be bound by acts or usual methods of business indulged in by its officers or agents, which, although irregular, are either through negligence or otherwise apparently acquiesced in by the directors of said corporation. It therefore behooved the plaintiffs in this case, as well as in all other dealings with corporate bodies, to give careful attention to the formalities of the execution of the lease, in conjunction with which the note was given, and if they relied upon implied or ostensible authority, everything calculated to put them upon their guard should also have been carefully observed.

[2] After considering the above citations, we would again call attention to the fact that the lease and note in question herein were signed by the president without seal and without any formal authorization from the board of directors and that no knowledge of any authorization for such acts on the part of the said T. W. Burnam were shown to have been had by the plaintiffs, nor was there any evidence to show that any such authorization had ever been given the said T. W. Burnam by the board of directors, and particularly that no consideration was received by the corporation nor any possession entered into under the lease in question. Therefore, we feel that the decision of the court in favor of the defendant was fully warranted by the evidence in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

P. W. WOOD, Inc., v. BLALACK. (Civ. 6032.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 4, 1927.

1. Principal and agent ⇨22(1)—Declarations of one claiming to be agent held inadmissible to prove agency.

Declarations of one claiming to be an agent, not made under oath or in presence of principal and not communicated to or acquiesced in by him, are inadmissible to prove fact of agency.

2. Principal and agent ⇨147(2)—One dealing with another on mere statement that he is agent of third person has risk of showing agency.

Person dealing with another upon his mere statement that he is agent of third person takes upon himself the risk of showing that such agency existed, and if, instead of satisfying himself by independent investigation, he accepts such statement and is deceived, he is victim of his own credulity.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Admitting testimony that person claimed to be agent of another held harmless, in view of other evidence.

In action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, admission of testimony of statement of one claiming to be agent for owner held harmless, in view of defendant's testimony that there was no agency and testimony of claimed agent to effect that he made no such statement.

4. Mechanics' liens ⇨63—Judgment establishing lien for improvement ordered by tenant cannot be sustained without proof of agency or conduct estopping owner to deny validity (Mechanic's Lien Law [Code Civ. Proc. § 1183]).

Under Mechanic's Lien Law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183), judgment establishing lien against apartment house for repairs ordered by tenant cannot be sustained, in absence of proof of actual agency of tenant or that real owner had by his conduct so far concurred in such improvement as to be estopped to deny validity of lien.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨78—Owner having no knowledge of work ordered by tenant held not liable under lien law for failure to post nonresponsibility notice (Mechanic's Lien Law [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1192]).

Where owner of apartment house had no knowledge that work ordered by tenant was being done and was in no position to disclaim responsibility as provided by Mechanic's Lien Law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192), liability was not created under section 1183 for failure to post nonresponsibility notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by P. W. Wood, Inc., against P. E. Blalack. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, of San Francisco (H. A. Judy, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Laurenz J. Krueger, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Plaintiff, the lien claimant, alleged that it had furnished to defendant as owner, at his special instance and request, certain labor and materials in the improvement and repair of an apartment house known as the "Inverness Apartments," at No. 1405 Van Ness avenue, San Francisco, and alleged further that the defendant had agreed to pay a stipulated sum for such improvements. By his answer, defendant admitted ownership of the premises, but denied that he had ordered any repairs to be done or that he had agreed to pay for the same. As a separate defense, he alleged that at all the times referred to in plaintiff's complaint, the premises known as the "Inverness Apartments" were in the exclusive possession of one Fred. W. Hollman, Inc., a corporation, and Thomas J. Pearce, as lessees, under a written lease from him as owner and lessor, and that any work done by plaintiff and any materials furnished were rendered and furnished without his knowledge. It appeared in evidence at the trial that the labor and materials for which suit was brought were rendered and furnished by plaintiff in the repair of a boiler, a part of the heating system of the building. Some years prior to this repair defendant had leased the apartment house for a term of years, some ten of which were yet to run at the time in question, to one Thomas J. Pearce and to F. W. Hollman, Inc. This lease was in writing, and it specifically provided that the lessees should keep the house in good repair at their own expense, without any charge to the owner. At the time of the making of the lease, the house was in good condition, as was the boiler. Just prior to the repairs in question a nightman employed by the tenants had permitted the water to run out of the boiler, with the result that two sections, front and rear, had burned out. The injury to the boiler occurred at night, and, because of the cold weather, immediate repair was necessary. Pearce procured the necessary parts from a wholesaler, the Stulsaft Company, and a representative of that company telephoned from the Inverness Apartments to Mr. Wood, president of plaintiff company, requesting that the repairs be made. Mr. Wood proceeded to the premises and conferred with Mr. Pearce, one of the lessees, with reference to the work. He made inquiry concerning the ownership of the building, and asked Pearce what authority he had to order the work done. He informed Pearce that it was an expensive job and that it would cost approximately $300. He was told by Pearce to go ahead with the work and not to worry about the charge. The work was performed, and plaintiff rendered its bill to "Mr. Pearce, Manager, Inverness Apartments." No bill was ever rendered to Mr. Blalack, the owner, defendant herein, nor did defendant ever know or hear of the repairs being made, until some three weeks thereafter, at which time Pearce informed him that he could not pay the monthly rent on account of the expense of the repairs. No claim was made at the trial that defendant ever directly ordered the work to be performed, nor was there any competent proof of the existence of an agency, but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that none ever did exist. It was proved that defendant had paid a repair bill to the sidewalk elevator amounting to the sum of $20 some two years prior to the work in question. It was also shown that defendant had paid for electrical improvements in the apartment house which were in their nature permanent and which he had especially contracted with the tenants to do. Aside from this evidence, which does not show an ostensible agency, there is no evidence in the record upon which an agency by estoppel could arise, and, indeed, if we understand the position of respondent, no such claim is made, his contention being that the findings show that plaintiff furnished the labor at the special instance and request of Pearce, who at the time was acting as the agent of defendant under his authority. But these findings are not supported by the evidence. For the purpose of proving that an actual agency did in fact exist, plaintiff offered and there was received in evidence, over the objection of defendant, testimony to show that Pearce had told Wood that he was the agent of defendant and to go on and do the work and there would be no question about the pay. This evidence was improperly admitted.

[1-3] The declarations of one claiming to be an agent, not made under oath or in the presence of the principal, and not communicated to, or acquiesced in by him, are inadmissible to prove the fact of agency. One who deals with another, upon his mere statement that he is the agent of a third person, takes upon himself the risk of being able to show that such agency existed. If, instead of satisfying himself by independent investigation, he accepts such statement and is deceived, he is the victim of his own credulity. Pease v. Fink, 3 Cal. App. 371, 85 P. 657. The admission of this testimony, however, was harmless, for defendant denied Pearce was his agent and Pearce testified that he had made no such statement, and the findings of the court upon this subject were to the effect that Pearce was in the exclusive possession of the premises at the time the repairs were made as one of the cotenants of defendant under a written lease, by the express terms of which Pearce had no authority from defendant to make repairs on his behalf, or to incur any expense for labor or materials on the building or in the improvement thereof; that defendant was ignorant of the fact that labor and material had been furnished until some three weeks thereafter. It is manifest from this finding of fact upon the question of agency that the further finding to the effect that plaintiff furnished labor and materials for the repairs in question at the special instance and request of Pearce, while acting as the agent of and under the authorization of Blalack, the owner, is based upon an erroneous construction of the Mechanic's Lien Law (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1180 et seq., as amended). Section 1183 thereof provides, in substance, that a materialman shall have a lien whether the labor and material are supplied at the instance of the owner, or of any other person acting by his authority or under him, as contractor or otherwise; that every contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder, or other person having charge of the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair, either in whole or any part of a building, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purpose of the enforcement of a lien. It is well established in this state that the fee in leased premises may not be impressed with a mechanic's lien for repairs made by a tenant, where the owner has no knowledge that the work is being done.

[4, 5] In the absence, therefore, of proof of actual agency, or that the real owner of the premises had by his conduct so far concurred in such improvement as to be estopped to deny the validity of the lien, no lien can exist. McGinn v. Pritchard, 32 Cal. App. 75, 161 P. 1171; Moses v. Pacific Building Co., 58 Cal. App. 90, 207 P. 946. It being expressly found that defendant had no knowledge that the work was being done, and that no agency existed, a lien could not be created under the statute, for there was no one acting under the authority of the owner who could bind him. This being so, the judgment establishing a lien cannot be sustained. Lorenz v. Rousseau (Cal. App.) 258 P. 690. We are cited by respondent to the case of Donohue v. Trinity Min'g Co., 113 Cal. 119, 45 P. 259, as holding a contrary view. In that case there was evidence sufficient to support a finding of agency. No useful purpose would be subserved by a review of the facts. Nor is there any merit in the claim that defendant, not having posted a nonresponsibility notice, a liability was created under the act invoked. Defendant, having no knowledge that the work was being done, was in no position to disclaim responsibility as provided by section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Moses v. Pacific Bldg. Co., 58 Cal. App. 90, 207 P. 946.

For the reason given, the judgment is reversed.

GROVE v. CHARLES W. BARRETT CO.
et al. (Civ. 5469.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 29, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Corporations ⇐88—Money paid by stockholder on subscription agreement held recoverable on common count for money had and received.

Where promoter agreed in stock subscription that for each share subscribed to in advance subscriber would receive two shares, and following organization application was made to commissioner of corporations for permit to issue stock in accordance with agreement, which was refused, and stockholder brought an action for money had and received, recovery under common count was proper.

2. Money received ⇐6(4)—Recovery under common count is proper, where money is paid in consideration of unperformed agreement.

Common count will always lie for money paid to one in consideration of his agreement to deliver or do something which he is either unwilling or unable to deliver or do.

3. Corporations ⇐98—Subscribers and secretary of corporation were not estopped, by failing to object to proposal to change stock issue, to refuse stock tendered.

Where board of directors authorized asking for permit to issue one share of stock for each share subscribed instead of two as agreed in subscription, and permit was issued, certificates of stock prepared, signed by secretary, and subscribers did not object but later refused to receive stock, subscribers and secretary were not estopped to refuse stock when tendered, since corporation was not prejudiced nor were circumstances sufficient to justify agent of corporation in believing subscribers would accept change in terms.

4. Husband and wife ⇐230—Want of capacity of married woman to sue on assigned subscriptions, where husband was assignor, must be specially pleaded to be available as defense.

Where one of plaintiff's assignors in action on stock subscription agreements was her husband, contention that claims became community property subject to sole dominion of husband and that he only could maintain action held without merit, since plaintiff's capacity to sue was not issue of pleading, and, being a dilatory plea not affecting liability of defendant, must be specially made to be available.

Action by Lora V. Grove against the Charles W. Barrett Company and another for the recovery of money paid. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. O'Neill, of Oakland, and Frank McGowan, of Eureka, for appellants.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff in this action had judgment against the defendants for the recovery of moneys paid by her and her assignors on account of subscriptions made for stock of the defendant corporation. From this judgment defendants appeal.

It was specifically provided in the subscription agreements, entered into between the several subscribers and the defendant Marchus, that the subscribers should receive in consideration of their advance subscriptions for the stock two shares for the par value of one. The payments were made to Marchus, one of the promoters of the company, as "interim trustee," the interim being the time between the subscription and the incorporation and organization of the defendant Charles W. Barrett Company. Following the organization of the defendant company, application was made to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to issue stock to the subscribers in accordance with the agreements with them, but it was refused. Thereafter the action of the commissioner of corporations was explained to the subscribers, and they were asked to accept one share of stock instead of two for the par value of one, but none of them either agreed to or refused to consent to the change. A meeting of the board of directors of the corporation was then held, and an amended application was authorized, asking for a permit to issue one share of stock for each amount of par subscribed. Plaintiff's husband, one of her assignors, was a member of and secretary of the board and voted for the amendment. A permit was issued by the commissioner in accordance with the amended application, certificates for the stock were prepared and signed by Grove as secretary, and tendered to the subscribers, who refused to receive them. They assigned their claims to the plaintiff, and this action was brought.

The complaint sets out each of the claims in several counts, some for money had and received, and some alleging the facts of the transaction.

Numerous assignments of error are made by appellants in a bill of exceptions both as to the findings of the court and its conclusions therefrom. They are all, however, directed to a few propositions of law which are contended for by appellants.

[1] It is contended that the court erred in finding upon the common counts for money had and received. Appellants say:

"In this case the contracts do not call for the direct payment of money, and appellants contend that under these circumstances and in the absence of the characteristic last-mentioned plaintiff cannot maintain an action for money had and received."

It is needless to say that this is not a correct statement of the law, else the common counts would never lie. Appellants are relying upon a misapprehension of the meaning of the language of the court in cases cited by them. In Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 659, 185 P. 979, the court say:

"It is well-nigh elementary that a common count will not lie to recover damages for the breach of an unexecuted contract where the obligation breached is something other than the payment of money," and "damages are sought because of the failure of defendant to do that something else."

[2] In this case plaintiff is not asking for damages for breach of the contract, but for the return of the money. The common count will always lie for money paid to one in consideration of his agreement to deliver or do something which he is either unwilling or unable to deliver or to do.

Appellants also argue that such contracts are made in view of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), and that the subscribers are tacitly agreeing to accept whatever the commissioner of corporations should see fit to grant. It might more plausibly be argued that the effect of the act would be to make such contracts as those under consideration void from the beginning, in which case the action would certainly lie.

[3] It is contended that the subscribers, having failed to object to the proposal to change the terms of the stock issue, will not be permitted to refuse the stock tendered to them. This is a matter of estoppel which, if relied upon should have been specially pleaded, but there was not sufficient evidence to support such a plea. It did not appear that the corporation was induced thereby to change its position in any way to its detriment or did anything that it could have done otherwise, nor were the circumstances sufficient to justify the corporation's agents in believing that the subscribers would accept the change in terms. This applies also to the contention that Grove is estopped.

[4] Appellants make the point that as it appeared from the evidence that Grove, one of plaintiff's assignors, was plaintiff's husband, the claims became subject to the sole dominion of the husband as community property, and he only could maintain an action for recovery on them.

No issue was made by the pleadings as to plaintiff's capacity to sue. Such a plea, being dilatory in its nature and not affecting the liability of the party defendant, is not favored and must be specially made to be available. Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 151 Cal. 1, 89 P. 1097.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MURRAY. (Cr. 1528.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 25,

1. Criminal law §301—Withdrawal of not guilty plea held properly denied to file motion to set aside whole information.

Where defendant was charged before committing magistrate with having procured money under false pretenses, and subsequently an information was filed against him, which charged him with that offense and two others, refusal of leave to withdraw plea of not guilty, for purpose of moving to set aside information, held not an abuse of discretion, as it would have been idle, since motion to set aside an information under such circumstances must be directed to defective counts of information, and not whole information.

2. False pretenses §49(1)—Evidence held to show corroborating circumstances, in prosecution for obtaining property under false pretenses (Pen. Code, § 1110).

In prosecution for obtaining property by false pretenses, evidence held to show corroborating circumstances satisfying requirements of Pen. Code, § 1110, providing that conviction may be had, if false pretense is shown by one witness and corroborating circumstances.

3. Witnesses §372(2)—Ruling out questions on cross-examination of complaining witness, tending to show civil action as ground of bias affecting credibility, held not error.

In prosecution for obtaining property under false pretenses, where complaining witness was cross-examined as to commencement of civil suit against defendant to show witness' hostility, and thus affect her credibility, ruling out questions when objected to held not error, since testimony of complaining witness showed claims on which civil action might be brought, and fact of commencement of action would have added nothing for purpose of showing bias.

4. False pretenses §49(2)—Evidence held sufficient to show value of share of stock in prosecution for obtaining property under false pretenses.

In prosecution for obtaining property under false pretenses, where defendant contended that value of shares of stock which he induced complaining witness to take was not shown by prosecution, evidence held sufficient to show value.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Franklin A. Murray was convicted of obtaining property by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond E. Hodge and A. S. Maloney, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Pursuant to the preliminary examination, which resulted in the filing of information against appellant, the committing magistrate held him to answer on a charge of procuring money under false pretenses. The information which was filed thereafter charged him with that offense and with two others, the pleading consisting of three counts. At the trial, under a claim that they had first been informed of the contents of the information immediately before the hearing commenced, the counsel for appellant asked leave to withdraw a plea of not guilty, which had theretofore been entered, for the purpose of moving to set aside the information. The request was refused, and it is contended that the court abused its discretion in not granting it. The courts of review of the state have decided in many cases, among which is People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490, that a district attorney has no power to file an information charging an offense different from that for which a defendant is held to answer by a committing magistrate. Without deciding whether the present case is within the rule thus declared, or whether the request of appellant for leave to withdraw his plea came too late, we think the refusal of the trial court to grant the request was proper. As stated by counsel to the court, appellant desired an opportunity to "move to set aside this information entirely on the ground" stated in the decisions to which we have referred. It was said at another time that a withdrawal of the plea was desired "for the purpose of making a motion to set aside the information" on that ground. It will be observed that appellant indicated no desire to move to set aside the counts of the information other than the false pretenses count, which latter was in accord with the order of the magistrate. In a case in which, under circumstances similar to those here presented, a motion was actually made to set aside an entire information, the court said: "To be effective the motion should, in our judgment, have been directed to the second count alone, and not to the entire information" (People v. Danford, 14 Cal. App. 442, 112 P. 474), the second count being the one that pleaded a charge upon which defendant had not been held by the committing magistrate. In a later case of the same nature it was contended that under the provisions of the Code a motion to set aside less than an entire information would not lie, and the court said in disposing of the point: "We find no valid reason why an order to set aside a separate count of the information may not be made." People v. Hudson, 35 Cal. App. 234, 169 P. 719.

As the motion suggested by appellant here could not have been granted, it would have been idle for the trial court to grant leave to withdraw the plea. It was therefore proper for the court to refuse the leave. People v. Staples, 149 Cal. 405, 86 P. 886.

[2] It is provided by section 1110 of the Penal Code that under such a charge as that of which appellant was found guilty here "the defendant cannot be convicted if the false pretense was expressed in language unaccompanied by a false token or writing, * * * or unless the pretense is proven by the testimony of two witnesses, or that of one witness and corroborating circumstances." In the present instance the false pretenses were proven by the testimony of but one witness, and appellant contends that neither the corroborating circumstances nor the giving of the false token mentioned in the statute was shown by the prosecution.

The property which appellant was charged with procuring was acquired by him under false pretenses as to the assets and financial worth and standing of a certain corporation, his representations being made for the purpose of inducing the complaining witness, a woman, to purchase shares of the capital stock of the organization. At the time of the making of the misrepresentations he gave to her an envelope with a list of names written upon it. One of these names was that of A. E. Hanna. The complaining witness testified that, at the time the list was passed to her by appellant, he told her that Hanna was a stockholder in the company, that he was a retired surgeon, and that he made his headquarters at a certain club in Los Angeles. At the trial Dr. E. A. Hanna—the difference in the initials is to be observed—was called as a witness by the prosecution. He testified that he was a physician; that he resided at the club above mentioned, and had lived there for three years, that he had heard of the corporation concerning which appellant made the false representations to the complaining witness, but that he had never been a stockholder of it.

The difference between the name upon the list given the complaining witness by appellant and the name of the witness called by the prosecution—a difference between A. E. and E. A.—might possibly give us concern in a solution of the question now about to be determined, if it were not for the testimony of the appellant himself. He said, in response to a question whether he represented to the complaining witness that E. A. Hanna—the name of the witness called by the prosecution—was a stockholder in the corporation:

"I didn't tell her that E. A. Hanna was a stockholder in our company. I told her that there was an E. A. Hanna that had bought some stock in our company."

It is contended by respondent that the testimony of Dr. Hanna tended to show that the envelope upon which was written the name A. E. Hanna, among others, was a false token, as that term is employed in the statute. We doubt, although it is unnecessary for us to decide, whether the envelope was susceptible of that designation, for there was nothing on it with which the testimony of Dr. Hanna was at variance. He merely disputed something that appellant had said, according to the complaining witness, about the person whose name was on the envelope, granting that A. E. Hanna and E. A. Hanna were the same, a fact which the jury justly might have inferred from the testimony of the complaining witness and of appellant, taken together. We do think, however, that the envelope, the testimony of the complaining witness, of Dr. Hanna, and of appellant, all considered together, show sufficiently a corroborating circumstance within the statute. "The corroborating circumstances, required by the rule, may be proved by circumstantial evidence; and the entire conduct of the defendant and declarations made by him may be looked to to furnish the corroborative evidence contemplated by law." 12 Cal. Jur. 475, § 23, and cases cited. See, also, cases cited Cal. Jur. Suppl. 1926, p. 803. The corroborating circumstances here shown were slight, but we think they were sufficient to satisfy the statute.

[3] On the cross-examination of the complaining witness it was sought to elicit from her answers showing that she had commenced a civil action against appellant for the purpose of recovering the property of which he had defrauded her. The questions put to her were asked in order to show her hostility to appellant, and thus to affect her credibility as a witness. Upon objection, the questions were ruled out. The testimony of the complaining witness tended to show that she had claims against appellant upon which she might have maintained a civil action, and we think the mere fact that she had commenced such an action would have added nothing, for the purpose of showing her bias, to the fact that such a claim existed, and to the further fact that she was at the time actually testifying in a criminal case against appellant as the complaining witness, concerning the identical transactions out of which the claim arose. In our view there was no error in the rulings.

[4] It was charged in the information that appellant represented to the complaining witness that the shares of stock which he induced her to take were worth a certain sum of money, but it was alleged that they were not worth that sum, and that they were in fact valueless. It is contended by appellant that the prosecution produced no evidence tending to show the value of the shares at the time the representations were made, but we think the contention cannot be upheld. Appellant's story about the stock of the corporation, told to the complaining witness, was most glowing. According to her, he said, among other things, that during the calendar year preceding the one in which he made his misrepresentations the corporation had paid to its stockholders dividends aggregating 42 per cent. In contrast to these attractive tales, it was shown at the trial that an individual who had installed an electric motor for the concern, at about the time appellant made his representations to the complaining witness, had been compelled to take a promissory note for the motor, and that he had been unable to collect it. The amount of the note was but $150, and the holder had been able to realize but $47 upon it, the amount having been paid by appellant. A motion to strike the testimony of the witness who covered these events was made, but it was not granted as to these particular matters, although granted in part. Another witness testified that during a period commencing three months before appellant's misrepresentations were made, and ending apparently after they were made, the plant of the corporation was never "commercially operated." Yet another witness, who became secretary of the corporation less than two months after the misrepresentations were made, and continued in the office for a period of four months, or until three weeks before the trial of appellant commenced, testified that he never knew that the corporation had any books; that he never saw any. He had been subpoenaed to bring all the books of the concern into court, and, when asked why he had not complied with the mandate, his only answer was: "I never had any books to bring." We think all this testimony was sufficient to show to the jury that the stock was worth much less than the amount stated in the information.

Other points are made by appellant, but they are not argued, and we are therefore not required to decide them. It is contended that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the trial, but the point is so obviously without merit that we think it unworthy of further consideration.

Judgment and order affirmed.

COMMERCIAL ACCEPTANCE TRUST v. BAILEY. (Civ. 5477.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting testimony are binding on reviewing court.

Findings of the trial court, where testimony was conflicting, are binding on the reviewing court.

2. Sales ☞459—Dealer's trust receipt and time draft for automobile given to acceptance corporation, held, when construed together, equivalent to conditional sales contract.

Where an automobile dealer obtained an automobile from an acceptance corporation for the purpose of selling it, and gave to the acceptance corporation a deed of trust therefor, and executed a time draft to the acceptance corporation, held, that the trust receipt and the draft should be construed together, and considered in the nature of a conditional sales contract.

3. Sales ☞473(1)—Dealer, having permission to sell automobile, which was obtained from acceptance corporation by giving trust receipt and time draft, could transfer good title to bona fide purchaser (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Where a dealer gave an acceptance corporation a trust receipt, and executed a time draft for an automobile to be sold by the dealer in regular course of business, such dealer could, under Civ. Code, § 1142, transfer to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business a good title to the automobile.

4. Sales ☞473(1)—Dealer possessing automobile for sale, on which acceptance corporation held deed of trust, and transferring same to salesman to pay commissions due, conferred good title, in absence of fraud; "transferred in the ordinary course of business" (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Salesman, having claim against dealer for commissions on cars sold by him to whom dealer transferred automobile, on which acceptance corporation held deed of trust, authorizing dealer to sell automobile and turn proceeds over to acceptance corporation, held to acquire good title to automobile under Civ. Code, § 1142, as against acceptance corporation, in absence of fraud; transfer to salesman being within phrase "transferred in the ordinary course of business" within the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by the Commercial Acceptance Trust, a corporation, against Joe Bailey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John L. Richardson and T. E. Parke, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Defendant, the respondent herein, sold automobiles on commission for Schmidt & Mead Auto & Tractor Company, a corporation, of Edwardsville, Ill., and on the date of the transaction herein involved had owing to him on such account the sum of $1,400. An automobile was delivered to defendant by said corporation, and the defendant drove it to Los Angeles, where plaintiff, the appellant herein, demanded possession of it, and, upon defendant's refusal to deliver, took possession thereof through an action in claim and delivery. No redelivery bond was given. Schmidt & Mead Auto & Tractor Company (for brevity hereinafter called Schmidt & Mead) did not own the automobile, but held it under a so-called "trust receipt" signed by them and a so-called "time draft" drawn upon them. The "trust receipt" acknowledged Commercial Acceptance Trust, plaintiff herein, as the owner of the automobile, and prescribed the terms under which Schmidt & Mead held it for sale. Among other provisions of the receipt was the permission of the owner that Schmidt & Mead could exhibit and sell the automobile for not less than $831, and the requirement that, upon such sale, the proceeds were to be kept separate from other funds, and to be paid over immediately to owner. Up to sale thereof the automobile was to be returned to owners unused upon demand. The "time draft" was an accepted draft from the owner of the automobile (plaintiff and appellant herein) upon Schmidt & Mead "as security for acceptor's obligations under negotiable trust receipt."

The trial court found that the automobile did not belong to plaintiff on the date of the institution of the claim and delivery action, and that defendant, upon receiving the car from Schmidt & Mead, did not take it wrongfully or without right or title, and ordered it redelivered to him.

[1] Plaintiff contends that no consideration ever passed from defendant to any one for the automobile, but this point cannot here be considered, for defendant testified at the trial that Schmidt & Mead owed him $1,400 on account of commissions earned, and that the transaction of delivering the automobile to defendant was upon the basis of crediting $820 on this account. This is corroborated by another witness, Ernest Del-tour. Plaintiff contends that this testimony is negated by the testimony of defendant that he later filed a claim in a subsequent bankruptcy proceeding of Schmidt & Mead's for $1,400, less $320, but that, in truth and in fact, he filed his claim for the full $1,400. However, that may be, the whole circumstance does not rise above an ordinary conflict of testimony, and, of course, the trial court's decision ends the argument.

Plaintiff also contends that defendant was aware that Schmidt & Mead did sell most of their cars subject to an outstanding lien, and intimated that he took the automobile in question, not as an innocent purchaser, but aware that there was a limitation upon the right of Schmidt & Mead to transfer it; but there is substantial testimony on this point against plaintiff's contention, and, if the point is material to the decision, must have been determined adversely to the contention by the trial court when the case was decided for defendant and against plaintiff, and therefore cannot be considered by us.

[2, 3] We are in agreement with plaintiff that the two documents, the trust receipt and the time draft, should be construed together and considered in the nature of a conditional sales contract, and that the possessor of personal property which is held under a conditional sale contract cannot ordinarily convey title thereto. But the right to display the same for sale and to sell injects another material element into the problem. "The consent of the owner to a disposition of his property may be inferred from act, as well as given in direct terms. It may be inferred when he gives such evidence of authority of disposal as usually accompanies such authority, according to the custom of the trade and the general understanding of business men. The delivery of goods to a merchant engaged in the sale of similar articles is such evidence of authority to sell the same as to protect the purchaser from the possessor. The possession, under such circumstances, is evidence, not that the possessor is the owner, but that he has authority from the owner to sell." Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64, 79 Am. Dec. 196. "Where the possession of personal property, together with a power to dispose thereof, is transferred by its owner to another person, an executed sale by the latter, while in possession, to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, for value, transfers to such buyer the title of the former owner, though he may be entitled to rescind, and does rescind the transfer made by him." Section 1142, Civ. Code.

[4] Under the doctrine just quoted from Wright v. Solomon and from the Civil Code, the transfer of title to the automobile was perfect, if the circumstances of the credit on the antecedent debt is within the meaning of the phrase in the Code section, "transferred in the ordinary course of business." An antecedent debt is a valuable consideration for the purchase of personal property held by a consignee of such property with the power of sale. Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Pacific Acceptance Corporation, 70 Cal. App. 41, 232 P. 489. Defendant could have purchased the automobile for cash without question of its legality, and, in the absence of fraud, he had as good a right to purchase and pay for it through the cancellation of a debt owing to him.

Judgment affirmed.

STANDARD BOND & MORTGAGE CO. v. BOYD et ux. (Civ. 4673.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Appeal and error §1008(1)—Whether defrauded party rescinded promptly, within statute, held question for trial court (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Whether defrauded party in exchange of lands rescinded promptly, as required by Civ. Code, § 1691, on discovering facts entitling him to rescind is a question primarily for trial court.

2. Exchange of property §3(1)—Plaintiff investigating value of land received in exchange and not prevented from making full investigation, could not rescind for defendant's fraud.

Where plaintiff instituted independent investigation as to value of land received in exchange, had recourse to proper means of obtaining information, and was not prevented from making full investigation by defendant, it could not complain of its own lack of diligence and seek rescission for defendant's alleged fraud in misrepresenting value.

3. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Finding of trial judge on conflicting evidence that plaintiff made independent investigation of value of land exchanged, will not be disturbed.

In suit to rescind exchange of lands, finding of trial judge on conflicting evidence that plaintiff made independent investigation to discover value of land, will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by the Standard Bond & Mortgage Company against William T. Boyd and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. McDowell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray Meacham, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal on the part of the plaintiff, Standard

Bond & Mortgage Company, from a judgment in favor of the defendants William T. Boyd and Carrie M. Boyd, his wife, in an action arising out of an attempted rescission of an agreement of exchange between the said parties of property in Long Beach, Cal., originally owned by the plaintiff, for a quarter section of land in Waterloo township, Jackson county, Mich., formerly belonging to the defendants.

It appears from the evidence: That on or about the 10th day of October, 1920, one Jackson and his wife sold to one Grames and wife a certain 160-acre farm in Waterloo township, Jackson county, Mich., for $9,500, payable $3,211.09 at date of agreement, $200 on or before December 1, 1921, $500 each year thereafter until paid, with interest at 6 per cent. That there was an incumbrance of $2,500, which was assumed by the purchaser. That this contract was assigned by the Jacksons to William T. Boyd, one of the defendants. That about February 1, 1921, the defendants, in response to an advertisement for exchange of local property for eastern property, went to the office of Hargrave & Whiteley, agents for the Standard Bond & Mortgage Company. That the defendants, through Mrs. Boyd, stated that they wished to exchange an equity in Michigan property for Long Beach property and stated the terms of their contract, describing the property as rolling, tillable, and mostly under cultivation in potatoes or corn or small grain. That it had the necessary buildings upon it, and that a man lived upon the property and made his living. That the property was worth about $9,500. And that after looking at various properties at Long Beach the defendants agreed to exchange their equity for a property in Long Beach owned by the plaintiff, the property of the plaintiff being valued at $6,500, with a mortgage thereon for $2,500, the defendants to give a second mortgage for $200 for the difference in equities, and on the said 1st day of February, William T. Boyd gave a note to Hargrave & Whiteley for $200, which reads as follows:

"200.00. Long Beach, Cal., 2-1-21. Thirty days after date without grace, we promise to pay to the order of Hargrave & Whiteley two hundred and no/100 dollars for value received, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum until paid. Principal and interest payable in United States gold coin at Nat. Bk, Long Beach, and in case suit is instituted to collect this note or any portion thereof, we promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in said suit."

In explanation of the lack of signature on this note defendant Boyd made the following statement:

"I tore the signature off so it couldn't be used when I subsequently paid the note."

That defendant's offer above referred to was refused by the plaintiff, but plaintiff offered to take the contract from defendants as collateral, which offer the defendants refused. That after meetings and discussions between Mr. Hargrave and Captain Spicer, secretary and manager for the plaintiff, a letter was sent by Hargrave & Whiteley on February 16, 1921, to the plaintiff, which reads as follows:

"Standard Bond & Mortgage Company, H. W. Hellman Building, Los Angeles, California—Gentlemen: I talked to Mr. Boyd today in regard to the sale of 2374 Pasadena avenue. He is willing to assign contract on his farm back east for $3,800, and to make it safer will agree to give us a second mortgage or trust deed on place payable at the rate of $20 per month, 6 per cent. interest, and every payment he makes will be credited on contract which he is turning in, until the amount of $500 has been paid and that amount will be credited to him on the $3,800 contract he is turning in. He says this property will easily bring $9,000 on a forced sale. If the $3,800 contract is not paid out, he is to guarantee the $3,800 or lose the $500. Will you kindly send us deed to him as per escrow instructions, also second mortgage or trust deed or second mortgage payable at the rate of $20 per month and interest. Yours truly, Hargrave & Whiteley, by B. P. H."

The transcript further shows that on March 7, 1921, the following letter was sent to plaintiff by Hargrave & Whiteley:

"March 7, 1921. Standard Bond & Mortgage Company, H. W. Hellman Building, Los Angeles, California—Gentlemen: We are inclosing herewith grant deed from W. T. Boyd and wife to you on the S. E. quarter section 5, township 2 south of Range 2 east, Jackson county, Mich. Also we are inclosing herewith deed of trust to you on 2374 Pasadena avenue of this city. We are also inclosing Boyd's papers on the property in Michigan. Will you kindly send us statement of amounts due you from Boyd such as cost of search of title on his property in Jackson, Mich., etc. Will you also kindly write the W. B. Webb Company, Webb Block, Jackson, Mich., and they will give you much valuable information on property back there, and they are the people that can discount the contract. Yours very truly, Hargrave & Whiteley, by B. P. H."

Letter was sent by W. B. Webb Company, which reads, in part, as follows:

"March 30, 1921. Standard Bond & Mortgage Co., 801 H. W. Hellman Building, Los Angeles, Cal.—Gentlemen: Your letter of March 10, in regard to the George Jackson and Edna L. Jackson property in Waterloo township, received. On taking the deed to the courthouse, we find that they cannot record it because there are taxes in the amount of $149.97 that must be paid before the deed can be recorded. There is interest due on the $500 mortgage, due in 1920, which is $17.50 and there will be due April 14, interest on the $2,000 mortgage, which is $60. Will you kindly make two checks, one payable to the county treasurer for $149.97, and another to the register of deeds for $.90 for recording the deed. Will you please give me the amount of the contract between Geo. Jackson and Ralph Grames and wife, and the terms. The title of the property is good, and I am taking the insurance policy to the agent to protect your interest as they may appear. We are inclosing the old policy, which has expired and are having it renewed, this just covers the buildings, no personal property. You will kindly mail us a check for $2.70 payable to the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Company. Attorney's fees will be $10. Very truly yours, W. B. Webb Company, Cory J. Spencer, Sec'y and Treas."

The pleadings and evidence further show that there was a slight alteration of the suggested contract in the letter of February 16th, mentioned above, so that instead of a note for $500 under the second mortgage to the plaintiff, the defendants signed a note for $489.42 on March 3, 1921, showing that a very careful calculation had been entered into at the time of the agreement of exchange.

The letter of March 30, 1921, shows that the plaintiff had written to W. B. Webb Company on March 10, 1921, concerning the recordation of the Boyd deed and other matters, and were thus in communication with one of the sources of information given them by the defendants, and that the plaintiff knew at that time that their deed had been delivered to the defendants. In response to the letter from W. B. Webb Company, who were incidentally holders of the first mortgage on the Waterloo property, plaintiff sent money to pay back taxes, interest, and recorder's fees. Further, the letter of February 16, 1921, in that regard says that:

"If the $3,800 contract is not paid out, he, Boyd, is to guarantee the $3,800 or lose the $500. * * *

According to the pleadings, at the time the action was brought defendants had paid $430 on the second mortgage or trust deed given plaintiff. From March 30, 1921, to January 30, 1922, various letters were apparently sent to Webb & Company, in Michigan. On February 13, 1922, the following telegram was received by plaintiff from El. L. Doer:

"Jackson, Mich., 1922, Feb. 13, P. M. 12. Standard Bond & Mortgage Company, Los Angeles, California. Grames still on farm crops failure practically no fences buildings poor land in poor condition soil light or low and wet farm on state road thirty dollars per acre full valuation. El. L. Doer, Appraiser, Jackson City Bank."

The plaintiffs claim misrepresentation and fraud on the part of defendants as grounds for rescission. Notice of rescission, it is alleged, was served on or about February 9, 1922, which was nearly one year after contract was entered into on March 3, 1921.

[1] The law governing cases of this class is probably best shown by quoting from various decisions in this state, and elsewhere, and as stated in a citation from the case of French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 589, 217 P. 515, 519:

"Section 1691 of the Civil Code requires the party entitled to rescind 'to rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind.' Whether or not the defrauded party has rescinded 'promptly' will depend upon all the circumstances of the particular case, and is, of course, a question primarily for the trial court."

In Hackleman v. Lyman, 50 Cal. App. 326, 195 P. 263, 264, it is also said:

"If, after a representation of fact, however positive, the party to whom it was made institutes an inquiry for himself, has recourse to the proper means of obtaining information, and actually learns the real facts, he cannot claim to have relied upon the misrepresentation and to have been misled by it. Such claim would simply be untrue. The same result must plainly follow when, after the representation, the party receiving it has given to him sufficient opportunity of examining into the real facts, when his attention is directed to the sources of information, and he commences, or purports or professes to commence, an investigation. The plainest motives of expediency and of justice require that he should be charged with all the knowledge which he might have obtained had he pursued the inquiry to the end with diligence and completeness. He cannot claim that he did not learn the truth, and that he was misled.' * * * 'If a purchaser, choosing to judge for himself, does not avail himself of the knowledge or means of knowledge open to him or his advisors he cannot be heard to say he was deceived by the vendor's misrepresentations.'"

In the case of Wyrick v. Campbell, 67 Okl. 240, 17th P. 267, it is said:

"Where the purchaser undertakes to make investigations of his own, and the vendor does nothing to prevent his investigation from being as full as he chooses to make it, the purchaser cannot afterwards allege that the vendor made misrepresentations.' * * * The law does not deny its aid in such cases because it looks upon a want of candor and sincerity with indulgence, but because it will not encourage that indolence and inattention which are no less pernicious to the interest of society, and will not relieve those who suffer damage by reason of their own negligence or folly."

[2] From the evidence quoted above, and in the light of the law cited, it is unnecessary to consider other contentions of the case as it appears, as stated in finding No. 3 of the trial court:

"That said plaintiff instituted and conducted an independent investigation as to the value of said contract of purchase and sale and the possibilities of converting the same into cash, had recourse to the proper means of obtaining such information, and that neither said defendants, or either of them, did any act or caused any act to be done to prevent or hinder said investigation of plaintiff or to prevent said investigation of plaintiff from being as full as plaintiff chose to make it."

And further, that for the same reason specifications of insufficiency of evidence to warrant portions of finding V of the trial court are immaterial, and that plaintiff, having made an independent investigation, cannot complain of its own lack of diligence.

[3] There being a material conflict in the evidence in addition to those portions discussed above, the judgment of the trial court will not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

CURTIS et al. v. NYE & NISSEN.
(Civ. 6008.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 1, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Parties ⚡51(4)—Amendment adding party to complete cause of action is proper where there is no attempt to state new cause of action.

Court has power to allow amendment to complaint by adding party plaintiff, and where there is no attempt to state new cause of action in amended complaint but merely addition of party to make original cause of action complete, amendment, adding party is proper; great liberality being indulged in to obtain justice.

2. Parties ⚡51(4)—Amendment to complaint by payee on drafts making corporation party plaintiff held proper, where defendant amended answer to show drafts grew out of contract with corporation.

In action by payee against maker on draft, payment of which had been stopped by maker, plaintiff was properly permitted to amend complaint to make corporation of same name a party plaintiff, where maker was allowed to amend answer to show that drafts grew out of contract executed between maker and corporation, and where issues were not changed and maker was not taken by surprise nor prejudiced.

3. Parties ⚡51(1)—Court must order bringing in of parties whose presence is necessary to complete determination of controversy.

When complete determination of controversy cannot be had without presence of other parties, court must order such parties to be brought in.

4. Bills and notes ⚡456—Payee of drafts sued on held proper party plaintiff, though not necessary party, under amended complaint making corporation, with whom maker contracted, party plaintiff.

In action by payee against maker on drafts, payment of which had been stopped by maker, payee was proper party plaintiff, though not necessary party plaintiff, in complaint as amended bringing in corporation of same name as party plaintiff, after maker amended answer to show that drafts grew out of contract executed with corporation.

5. Appeal and error ⚡1036(1)—Amendment adding as plaintiff to complaint on draft corporation with which defendant contracted, if error, was not prejudicial where corporation alone recovered.

In action by payee against maker on draft, payment of which had been stopped by maker, allowance of amendment to complaint by adding corporation as party plaintiff, after maker amended answer to show that draft grew out of contract with corporation, if error, was not prejudicial where verdict was in favor of corporation and not payee.

6. Judgment ⚡235—In action at law it is not necessary that both plaintiffs recover, or none (Code Civ. Proc. § 578).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 578, where two or more persons join as plaintiffs in action at law, it is not necessary that both must recover, or none.

7. Sales ⚡364(1)—Charge that value of property, in estimating damages to buyer deprived of possession, is price at nearest market within reasonable time after breach held proper (Civ. Code, §§ 3354, 3358).

In action on drafts executed for goods sold and delivered to defendant, instruction that value of property, in estimating damages to buyer deprived of possession, is price at nearest open market within reasonable time after breach was proper, under Civ. Code, §§ 3354, 3358.

8. Judgment ⚡235—Instruction to find for corporation and not payee if drafts sued on were for corporation's benefit, and refusal to instruct that neither can recover if both cannot recover, held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 578).

In action on drafts by payee, in which corporation of same name was made party plaintiff, instruction that if drafts were for use of corporation judgment should be for corporation and payee would not be entitled to judgment, and refusal to instruct that unless both plaintiffs can recover neither can recover was proper, under Code Civ. Proc. § 578, providing that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs.

9. Sales ⚡99, 364(1)—Instruction that seller could rescind contract if buyer refused to pay for shipment when due, and that buyer was liable on drafts given for adequate consideration, held proper.

In action on drafts executed by defendant under contract for sale of eggs, instruction that if defendant without fault of plaintiff refused to pay for shipment when due then plaintiff was entitled to rescind contract, and that if drafts were given for adequate consideration defendant was liable to plaintiff, held proper.

10. Trial ⚡199—Requested instructions submitting to jury questions of law held properly refused.

In action on drafts, requested instructions submitting questions of law to jury whether instruments in evidence were bill of exchange, drafts, or checks were properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by E. A. Curtis and another against Nye & Nissen, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edw. R. Solinsky, of San Francisco, and Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, for appellant.

Emmett I. Donohue, of Challis, Idaho, and G. P. Hall, of Petaluma, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment on the verdict of the jury in favor of respondent E. A. Curtis Company and from the order denying a new trial.

The action was commenced on July 25, 1923, by the filing of a complaint by E. A. Curtis, an individual, against defendant, wherein three alleged causes of action were set forth, based upon written instruments or drafts executed by defendant payable to the order of E. A. Curtis at Bank of Italy, San Francisco, and payment of which instruments or drafts was stopped. On August 29, 1923, defendant filed an answer admitting all the allegations of the complaint, but setting up a separate defense based upon the claim that the drafts were given for certain merchandise from E. A. Curtis, which it was alleged was not of the kind and character described in the agreement. The agreement, however, was in fact entered into between appellant and E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation, and not with E. A. Curtis in his individual capacity.

The case was regularly set, and on the day it was called for trial counsel for defendant asked permission of the court to file an amended answer, stating the action was being prosecuted by E. A. Curtis, as an individual, against defendant, and that defendant had filed its answer admitting all of the material allegations of the complaint and admitting the indebtedness as alleged therein to plaintiff; that as a matter of fact the admissions in the answer were of such a nature as to permit plaintiff to recover judgment without being required to offer any testimony whatever in support of the allegations of the complaint. Counsel further stated to the court that E. A. Curtis as an individual had never had any dealings whatsoever with reference to the matters alleged in the complaint, and that the claims were upon claims and causes of action in favor of E. A. Curtis, a corporation; that if the action should proceed upon the pleadings on file that E. A. Curtis, the individual, would obtain judgment against defendant and that such judgment would not pay or satisfy the claims of the real party in interest, E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation; that the instruments sued upon were intended for, accepted by, and were for, goods sold and delivered by E. A. Curtis, the corporation; and that through inadvertence, mistake, excusable neglect, and the similarity of names, defendant answered the complaint under the misapprehension that the action was being prosecuted by the corporation.

Defendant insisted that E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation, should be made a party to the suit in order to protect defendant in its rights under the contract, as the contract was entered into by defendant with the corporation.

The court permitted defendant to amend its answer and set up its alleged defense that plaintiff corporation failed to perform the conditions of its contract with defendant and deliver eggs in accordance with its terms and for which such instruments or drafts payable to E. A. Curtis were given, and permitted plaintiff to amend the complaint by making E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation, a party plaintiff. The defendant's counsel objected to the court permitting this latter amendment and refused to consent to the amendment by plaintiff. On this question the remarks of the trial court addressed to counsel for defendant are pertinent:

"The Court: They could do it with your consent, couldn't they? It is a funny situation. One party wants to stand on the record just as it is, and you are coming and saying 'I made a mistake and I want to amend so as to get justice.' And they say, 'If you want to amend, we want to amend.' Then you say, you are not willing for the other side to amend, but that you want to amend.

"Mr. Solinsky: No, that is hardly the situation, your honor.

"The Court: They want to stand on the record technically, and you want it released until you can get in, then you want to stand technically on it."

Upon the showing and representations made by counsel for defendant to obtain leave to file an amended answer, the court permitted such filing, but in granting defendant the privilege sought so that the case might be tried on its merits permitted plaintiff also to amend by adding E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation, as a party plaintiff, which defendant claimed was necessary to a proper determination of the questions involved, but which defendant urges the court could not permit, but that E. A. Curtis Company was required to bring a new action. In other words, defendant conceded that under the original action as called for trial plaintiff was entitled to judgment; that such judgment would work an injustice as defendant could not have the issues involved under the contract adjudicated; that it was necessary and justice required that E. A. Curtis Company, the corporation, be made a party plaintiff, but not in the present case in which defendant desired to amend its answer; that the action should be dismissed and a new action commenced by E. A. Curtis Company setting up the same cause of action, changing only the name of the party plaintiff.

Defendant demurred to the amended complaint in which E. A. Curtis Company was added as a party plaintiff, the principal point in the demurrer and the only one urged being that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff. The demurrer was overruled, defendant answered, and the case was set for trial on a subsequent date and tried with a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff E. A. Curtis Company.

Appellant urges as grounds for a reversal of the judgment: (1) The court erred in granting the motion of plaintiff E. A. Curtis to amend the original complaint in this action by adding as an additional party plaintiff thereto E. A. Curtis, the corporation. (2) (a) The court erred in overruling the demurrer of defendant to plaintiff's amended complaint; (b) the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit; (c) the court erred in denying the motion of defendant for directed verdict. (3) The court erred in giving the following instructions to the jury, all of which instructions were proposed by plaintiffs, to wit, instructions numbered 24, 26, 27, 28, and 30. (4) The court erred in refusing and failing to instruct the jury as proposed by defendant in its proposed instructions as follows: Proposed instructions numbered 4, 7, and 8. (5) The court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. (6) The verdict was and is against law. (7) The evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict.

All of the assignments of error, excepting those which have to do with the giving and refusing to give instructions and the claim that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, turn on the question of the right of the court to permit plaintiff E. A. Curtis to amend his complaint by adding "E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation," as a party plaintiff after allowing defendant to amend its answer showing that the drafts given E. A. Curtis and payable to him in fact grew out of a contract executed by E. A. Curtis Company, a corporation, and appellant, and if the court's action in permitting such amendment was proper—unless the court erred in its instructions to the jury or the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict—the appeal must be determined adversely to appellant's contention.

In Gray v. Alderson's Adm'r, 123 S. W. 317, in an action on certain notes, which defendant pleaded that plaintiff in his individual capacity was not the owner of, the question upon a similar state of facts as here presented is passed upon. In that case the Supreme Court of Kentucky uses this language:

"Nor is there any merit in the contention of appellant that the court erred in permitting the amended petition to be filed, wherein plaintiff discloses the true ownership of the notes. It has been so frequently held that a trial judge is authorized, at any time before trial, and even during the progress thereof, to permit amendments to be filed, in furtherance of justice, that a citation of authorities upon this point is deemed unnecessary. Certainly that rule has not been violated in this case. The defendant himself pleaded that plaintiff, C. L. Alderson, was not the owner of the notes sued on, and in response to that plea the plaintiff sets up the fact that by mistake of the draughtsman the suit had been prepared and thus far prosecuted in his own name, rather than in his name as administrator of his deceased wife. This pleading in no wise changed the cause of action. It was still an effort to collect the same notes set up and described in the original petition, and to subject the same land therein described in satisfaction of this debt. [Italics ours.] The trial judge not only did right to permit this amendment to be filed, but it would have been error for him to have refused to do so."

In this state it has been the rule since the early case of Polk & Hensley v. Coffin & Swain, 9 Cal. 58, that the court has power to allow an amendment to a complaint by adding a party plaintiff. In that case Mr. Chief Justice Terry delivering the opinion of the court and referring to an amendment adding a party plaintiff, said:

"It is always in the power of the court to allow an amendment to a complaint, so it does not affect the substantial rights of the parties; and, except there is evidence of a gross abuse of discretion in the exercise of this power, it is no ground for the reversal of the judgment."

This case has not been overruled, but, on the contrary, the principle therein enunciated has been followed. Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 244 P. 1077.

[1-3] In the present case defendant suffered no prejudice by bringing in E. A. Curtis Company as a party plaintiff, no issue being changed thereby. Where there is no attempt to state a new cause of action in an amended complaint, but merely the addition of a party to make the original cause of action complete, the amendment is proper. Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 128 P. 330. The facts set forth in the amended answer which defendant asked leave to file made it necessary to a complete determination of the issues raised by such answer to add E. A. Curtis Company as a party plaintiff. Great liberality is indulged in such cases to the end that justice will be subserved. When a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in. Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., supra. Again, defendant was not taken by surprise nor prejudiced by the amendment complained of, as the case was originally called for trial on October 1, 1923, on the original complaint and answer, and after the amendments were permitted the case was set for trial at a subsequent date and was not actually tried until October 14, 1924, a year later. What defendant desired was that the issues existing between the corporation and itself be litigated, and that was precisely what occurred.

Appellant has cited us to Thompson et al. v. Turner et al., 173 Ind. 593, 89 N. E. 314, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 740, as holding that it is a well-settled rule "that a complaint in the name of more than one person must show a good cause of action in all who join, or it will be good as to none."

[4-6] Here, however, while plaintiff E. A. Curtis was not a necessary party plaintiff in the complaint as amended, he was, in view of the fact that the drafts were made payable to him individually, a proper party plaintiff. Again, plaintiff came into court confessing that through the error of counsel for defendant who drew the answer it must suffer judgment to go against it for the amount prayed for unless it be permitted to file an amended answer, which permission was given. If the evidence did not show the right of E. A. Curtis to any judgment, defendant could have moved for a nonsuit as far as he was concerned. This for some reason it did not choose to do, and the verdict rendered was in favor of plaintiff E. A. Curtis Company and not E. A. Curtis. Should we concede appellant's objection to be sound, no miscarriage of justice has resulted and appellant was not prejudiced by reason thereof. "Judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants; and it may, when the justice of the case requires it, determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side, as between themselves." Code Civ. Proc. § 578. Where two or more persons join as plaintiffs in an action at law, it is not the law that both must recover, or none. Cullen v. Foster, 39 Cal. App. 625, 179 P. 695.

Appellant has cited us to a number of authorities, including several California cases, in support of its contention. In those cases, however, the facts are not analogous to those presented here.

[7] Appellant urges that the court erred in giving certain instructions requested by plaintiff; that instruction No. 24 was improper; and that instruction No. 26 was the only instruction that should have been given upon the question of the measure of damage. Instruction No. 24 complained of reads as follows:

"In estimating the damages, to a buyer or owner thereof, deprived of its possession, the value of the property is deemed to be the price at which he might have bought an equivalent thing in the open market nearest to the place where the property ought to have been put into his possession, and at such time after the breach of duty upon which his right to damages is founded as would suffice with reasonable diligence for him to make such purchase."

We see no error in this instruction. It finds support in the Civil Code, §§ 3354 and 3358, as, also, in Cal. Sugar & W. P. Agcy. v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 139 P. 671, and Fairchild v. Southern Refining Co., 158 Cal. 264, 110 P. 951.

[8] Instruction numbered 27, requested by plaintiff, which instructed the jury that, if it found the instruments were for the use and benefit of E. A. Curtis Company and E. A. Curtis individually had no interest in them, then any judgment found against defendant should be in favor of E. A. Curtis Company and E. A. Curtis individually would not be entitled to judgment in his favor, is objected to by appellant, as also does it complain of the refusal of the court to give its proposed instruction numbered 4 to the contrary—that is, that unless both plaintiffs can recover neither can recover. The action of the trial court in giving instruction numbered 27 and refusing to give instruction numbered 4 was proper. Code Civ. Proc. § 578; Cullen v. Foster, supra.

[9] We find no error in the giving of instructions numbered 28 and 30. These instructions are to the effect that if defendant without fault or breach of the contract by plaintiff refused to pay for any shipment of eggs as and when such payments were due and payable, then plaintiff E. A. Curtis Company was entitled to rescind its contract, and that if the three instruments were given for adequate consideration to E. A. Curtis Company by defendant, then defendant was liable to E. A. Curtis Company. Jensen v. Goss, 39 Cal. App. 427, 179 P. 225.

[10] Instructions numbered 7 and 8, proposed by defendant, were properly refused as they submitted questions of law to the jury; that is, as to whether the instruments in evidence were bills of exchange, drafts, or checks.

In our opinion, the objection that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict is without merit.

This disposes of all errors assigned, and from what has been said it follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

GALT et al. v. MURPHY et al. (Civ. 6020.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 30, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨48(1)—Nonsuit in action for breach of contract of lease as to defendant shown merely to be a dummy was properly granted.

In action for breach of contract of lease nonsuit was properly granted as to defendant who was shown merely to be a dummy in the transaction, not having taken part in any of the negotiations other than signing documents, and whose exact status plaintiffs knew.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨48(1)—Nonsuit in action for breach of lease as to defendant not shown to have received anything of value or to have entered into any agreements was properly granted.

In action for breach of contract of lease nonsuit was properly granted as to defendant who was not shown to have had any joint interest with other defendants or to have entered into any agreements with either plaintiffs or other defendants and who never received anything of value or signed any agreement.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨40—Contract of lease and agreements as to deposit of security and installation of elevators and furnishings must be read together (Civ. Code, § 1642).

Under Civ. Code, § 1642, contract of lease of apartment and agreement as to installation of elevators and purchase of furnishings executed as part of same transaction and further necessary agreement as to deposit of security are to be taken together.

4. Partnership ⇨139—Agreement signed by one of partners, relating to return of deposit for lease, held binding on the other.

Signing by one of lessees of agreement for return of deposit was binding on the other, where partnership relation existed between lessees.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨24(1)—Agreement between parties to lease, making lease subject to acquisition of title by lessor, held based on sufficient consideration.

Substitution of security for chattel mortgage on furnishings, and increasing burden of construction on lessors, held sufficient consideration for agreement between parties to lease that, if lessor was unable to obtain title, deal was ended on return of lessees' deposit.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨48(1)—Rule as to impossibility of performance held inapplicable in suit by lessees for breach of contract of lease.

Where agreement between parties to lease provided for its termination and return of lessees' deposit on lessor's inability to obtain title, and lessees accepted return of deposit, rule as to impossibility of performance was inapplicable, in suit by lessees for breach of contract of lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Maude L. Galt and another against Leland S. Murphy and others. From an order granting defendant's motion for nonsuit and from judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for respondent Paddon.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondents Murphy and Clarke.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order granting defendants' motion for a nonsuit and judgment therein entered in favor of defendants and against plaintiffs.

The action was brought to recover damages suffered by plaintiffs through defendants' breach of their contract of lease, to wit, failure to give possession.

The defendants answered jointly, though at the trial and on the appeal defendant Paddon appears through separate counsel.

The facts as appearing here and in the court below follow: In December of 1922, or thereabouts, one Thomas L. Ricks, an agent or representative of a real estate firm, called upon Leland S. Murphy, defendant, in search of an apartment house that he might lease for a client. Murphy advised him that he had just such a place as was desired, and thereupon gave to Ricks a statement covering said house, showing what the house could be made to yield, and also the amount of rent demanded. Ricks in due time communicated these facts to the plaintiffs, in whose interests, it seems, he was endeavoring to find a suitable location. After negotiations and investigation on January 26, 1923, a lease of the premises was prepared and executed by defendant Verne Clarke, as lessor, and plaintiffs Maude L. Galt and Joseph C. Bianchi as lessees. The term of the lease was for a period of five years commencing on March 1, 1923, with rent reserved at the rate of $770 per month. This lease further provided that the lessees should execute and deliver to lessor a chattel mortgage upon the furniture as security for the payment of the rent.

On the same date, and as a part of the same transaction, another agreement was entered into between the parties concerning certain improvements to be made in the premises and the sale of furnishings therein. By this latter agreement it was stipulated that the lessor should install elevators and hardwood floors and wall beds, the work to be started within ten days, and prosecuted with reasonable diligence. The lessees in this instrument agreed to purchase for the stipulated price of $1,500 the furnishings of the premises therein at the time, consisting of linoleums, etc. The tenants agreed to deposit with the landlord the sum of $5,000 as an evidence of good faith and as security for the performance on the part of the tenants of all the provisions of the lease. From this amount the first month's rent of $770 was to be deducted and paid when due, and also the sum of $1,500 covering the price of furnishings. The balance of $2,730 was to be retained by landlord as security for performance of lease until the tenants gave the landlord a chattel mortgage as security in lieu thereof, such chattel mortgage to be a first lien on complete and adequate furnishings for, and installed in, not less than 55 rooms, and such furnishings to be owned absolutely by tenants free from lien. When the mortgage, as specified, should be executed and delivered, then the moneys held as security should be returned to tenants.

There arose some discussion as to the form of this deposit of $5,000. The tenants represented that in the place of cash they could deposit Liberty bonds to the amount required. This was acceptable to all, with the exception that it was stipulated that $1,000 cash should be deposited to provide for the payment of the rent when due, and that an additional $100 in bonds should be deposited to compensate depreciation in face value of the bonds offered. Accordingly, on January 29th there was deposited the sum of $1,000 in cash and Liberty bonds in the amount of $4,100.

At the time of the deposit a receipt was given to the tenants, and this receipt was embodied in an instrument containing a clause as follows:

"It is understood and agreed by both parties that this lease is given subject to Verne Clarke acquiring title and to her being able to install an elevator as per terms of the agreement, and Verne Clarke agrees to return the security not later than two weeks from date providing she is not able to give this lease, and Maude L. Galt and Joseph C. Bianchi agree to accept same and not to hold her responsible in any way."

This last instrument, dated January 29, 1923, was signed by Verne Clarke and Joseph C. Bianchi.

Throughout the entire transaction all writings, including lease agreement and receipt acknowledgment, were signed by Verne Clarke as lessor. The names of defendants Murphy and Paddon at no time or place appeared in the instruments.

[1] The evidence disclosed that, at the time of the negotiations and throughout, the defendant Verne Clarke held merely a deposit receipt indicating some payment on the purchase price of the premises involved. This is all of the title held by her or any of the parties defendant. The evidence further shows that in the entire transaction the defendant Verne Clarke had no real interest nor any interest, even of the slightest. Verne Clarke was a stenographer and bookkeeper employed by one Wood, with which latter Mr. Murphy, defendant herein, shared an office. In her own language she was simply a "dummy" in the transaction. The money she paid on the purchase was not her money, and she did not know who advanced it. Her entire connection with the affair was to permit the use of her name in the instruments referred to. She took no part in the negotiations other than to sign the various documents when asked, and plaintiffs knew her exact status. She was not an agent for the other defendants. She was as though nonexistent; as she states, a "dummy." This is the contention of the appellants here and the theory upon which they present their appeal. Accepting this without further discussion, it is apparent that as to her the nonsuit was properly granted.

[2] As to the defendant Paddon, the evidence was not sufficient to connect him in any way with the transaction. It was not shown that he and defendant Murphy had any other joint interests or ever represented themselves as being associated. The "dummy" never acted for him at any time, and no relationship or privity is shown between Paddon and the defendant Clarke. Paddon never received any money or other thing of value, nor did he ever enter into any agreement, oral or otherwise, with the plaintiffs or either of them or either of the defendants. All that plaintiffs offer as against Paddon is the testimony of Ricks that Murphy told him there was another man associated with him in the deal, and that on two occasions during negotiations Paddon was present, though there is no evidence of his participation therein other than it appeared that once or twice Murphy asked his opinion generally, and Paddon expressed his ideas, answering Murphy. The plaintiff Galt testified that she never saw Paddon at all, and the coplaintiff Bianchi was not called. At the time when the agent for plaintiffs took Murphy and Paddon out to view the furniture upon which chattel mortgage was to be given, Paddon remained outside in the car.

Without further dilating upon, or analyzing, the testimony offered as against Paddon, it is apparent that the order of nonsuit as to him was properly granted. If under this evidence he could be forced to a defense, it would be needless in the future to specify the parties defendant in any action. It would suffice to merely file a complaint and then go out on the byways and usher in the first man met and compel him to show that he has no interest or liability in the proceeding.

This leaves the issue here as between plaintiffs and the defendant L. S. Murphy.

In support of the order appealed from, it is contended that, in order to hold Murphy, there must be evidence of some written authorization to Verne Clarke in order that the relationship of principal and agent may be created or inferred. We are not disposed to enter into a discussion of this point, for the reason that its determination is unnecessary to this opinion. We have accepted appellant's theory of the situation, from the evidence adduced, that the acts of Clarke were the acts of Murphy, described at the time by all parties to the transaction as the real actor and party in interest. We will therefore for the purpose herein take up the case from appellants' standpoint upon the assumption that throughout the entire negotiations and transactions the acts of defendant Clarke "dummy" were the acts of defendant Murphy. It is the evidence of plaintiffs that they knew Clarke was the dummy and a mere name, as it were, for Murphy.

[3] The Civil Code of this state, section 1642, reads as follows:

"Several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together."

In the case at bar plaintiffs testify that, at the very time of negotiating the lease, and as a part of the transaction, and before its execution by defendant, the parties made the agreement looking to the installation of elevators and the purchase of furnishings, and that thereby the security was essential to justify these alterations; that the deposit of security was a part of said transaction; and that a change in the terms of the lease followed the deposit. All of these instruments were executed within a period of three days, and at a date more than a month in advance of the period from which the term of the lease was to commence. All were between the same parties, and each had reference to the same subject-matter. Prior to the deposit, the lease was of no effect, and the defendants, in the absence of the deposit, were in nowise bound to further proceed. The agreement of January 29, 1923, contained the provision hereinbefore quoted. This was plain and unambiguous, and stated that the lease was dependent upon title vesting in lessor and her ability to install the elevator, and that lessor agrees to return the deposit not later than two weeks from date, if not able to give lease, and plaintiffs agree to accept return of deposit and not hold lessor responsible in any way.

The facts are that on or about February 15, 1923, defendant informed plaintiffs of his inability to proceed, and offered return of deposit, which plaintiffs refused to accept. Later, on April 9, 1923, plaintiffs demanded return of the deposit, and it was so returned on April 10, 1923.

[4] Appellant points out that the agreement of January 29, 1923, referring to return of deposit, was signed by Bianchi alone, and not by plaintiff Galt, and therefore not binding on her. The plaintiff Galt testified that Bianchi was her partner, authorized by her to make the deposit; that he was a party to the lease jointly with her. It needs no citation of authority on the point that, as a partner, in matters concerning the partnership, one partner may bind the partnership. The testimony of plaintiff Galt is:

"The money and bonds were Bianchi's, not mine. We were partners. I never saw the receipt, not until two or three months after. Mr. Bianchi never told me anything about it. He was my partner. I did request the return of the bonds and cash when I saw I could not get possession, and the bonds and cash were returned to me and Mr. Bianchi by Mr. Perry (Mr. Perry is the attorney for plaintiffs). I have received back the bonds and cash at my request."

The present action was commenced shortly thereafter.

[5] Appellants contend that there was no consideration for the agreement of January 29th, and, further, that it is incumbent on defendants to show impossibility of performance thereunder.

In answer to the first objection, the agreement is taken as part of the original transaction, and would find ample consideration therein to support it. Aside from this, the new agreement of security in lieu of the chattel mortgage and the increased burden of construction would likewise be sufficient consideration to support the written agreement.

[6] We do not think the cases cited on impossibility of performance apply here. In the instant case the agreement was that, if lessor got no title, and consequently was not able to give the lease, the deal ended upon return of the deposit. There is no showing that the lessor ever got the title or was able to give the lease, but there is the showing that plaintiffs took the benefit of the provision, and secured a return of their deposit. The plaintiffs agreed in these words as to return of deposit: "To accept the same, and not hold lessor responsible in any way." They did accept the same after their demand for it, and the judgment of the trial court fulfills for them the remaining part of the obligation; namely, not to hold lessor responsible in any way.

Judgment affirmed.

McNEELY v. CONNELL et al. ★
(Civ. 4603.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 22, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨ 1195(3) — Appellate court decision does not become "law of case" as to questions of fact.

The doctrine of the law of the case has reference only to principles of law announced by the appellate court as those to be applied to a retrial of fact, and does not embrace questions of fact themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Law of the Case.]

2. Appeal and error ⇨ 1178(6) — Limiting new trial to contributory negligence issue after appellate court decided order granting new trial was general held error, since decision became law of case.

Limiting new trial to trial of issue of contributory negligence on remand, after District Court of Appeal had determined that trial court's order granting new trial "on the ground of plaintiff's contributory negligence" was, in effect, a general order granting a new trial for insufficient evidence, held error, since such decision required new trial of whole case and became the law of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Robert McNeely against Michael J. Connell and James Hill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Hill appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Geo. F. McCulloch and Emmet H. Wilson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. A. Alderson and K. A. Miller, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal brought in an action for personal injuries after three jury trials, in which the final judgment was rendered against the defendant Hill, now appellant. The acts complained of occurred in April 1917. The complaint was filed in June 1917, later default entered and vacated, and the case was first tried before a jury in July 1918, with a verdict against both defendants for $2,400. Motion for a new trial was granted by the court, and the case was tried a second time on December 11, 1918, in which judgment was rendered against defendant Hill, appellant herein, in the sum of $2,500. Motion for a new trial was granted in January, 1919, in these words:

"It is now ordered that said motion be granted on the ground alone of plaintiff's contributory negligence."

Plaintiff appealed from the last-mentioned order in April, 1921, and the order was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal in 52 Cal. App. 184, 198 P. 427. The case was again called for trial in June, 1922, wherein, on motion of counsel for plaintiff that the evidence be restricted to the one issue of contributory negligence alone, which motion was denied by the judge, the said case was withdrawn from the calendar. On September 22 plaintiff made application for modification of the former order of the superior court, which was granted by adding the words, "and as to all other grounds and issues the said motion be and is hereby denied." The cause came on again for trial in April, 1923, at which time the court restricted the issues to be tried to the sole and single one of the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and that as to all other issues the verdict of the jury on the former trial shall be conclusive. The court placed the burden of proof on the defendant. The jury returned a verdict as follows:

"We, the jury, in the above-entitled action find for the plaintiff and find plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence."

Thereafter the judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Hill for the sum of $2,500. From this judgment the defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was on the 21st day of June, 1923, denied.

The appellant, defendant Hill, claims that the decision of the District Court of Appeal rendered in the above-entitled action on April 7, 1921, is the law of the case; that the trial court had no power to limit the trial to one issue; that the trial court erred in ruling as to evidence and in the refusal of and in the giving of certain instructions. The language of the appellate court in this action as reported in 52 Cal. App. 187, 198 P. 429 is as follows:

"Conceding that there was some evidence tending to exonerate the plaintiff from the charge of negligence, it results that the evidence upon that point was conflicting to such a degree that on appeal the decision of the lower court, either in granting or in refusing a new trial, should not be reversed. Where the evidence is thus conflicting, a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court. With its decision thereof interference is unwarranted unless there clearly appears an abuse of such discretion. We cannot say that the court was not reasonably justified in granting the motion in this case. Finally, it is suggested by appellant that if this action is to be tried a third time, the trial should be limited to the single issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence. It has long been settled that a court of appeal, in reversing and remanding a cause, may direct on what issues it shall be retried. Robinson v. Muir, 151 Cal. 118, 125, 90 P. 521. In this instance, however, since the order is to be affirmed, we deem it inappropriate to interfere with its terms as entered by the court below. The order is affirmed."

The order affirmed included the words "on the ground alone of plaintiff's contributory negligence," and in the final trial the issue was so limited and the jury found for plaintiff and that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. The court entered judgment in conformity with the judgment in the second jury trial.

[1] In regard to the law of the case, it is only necessary to cite the case of Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 P. 1000, wherein it is said:

"An unbroken line of decisions, commencing with Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 374, has established the rule in this state that a decision of this court upon any question of law in a case appealed to it from an inferior court becomes thereby the law of that case, and is thereafter in all subsequent stages of the case binding, not only upon the inferior court, but also upon this court, if again brought before it. It has never been held, however, that the decisions of this court upon a question of fact is subject to this rule. On the contrary, it has been frequently said that the rule is limited to questions of law, and is not applicable to questions of fact. In Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 629, it was said: 'It is upon questions of law that the decision of the appellate court becomes the law of the case, and not upon questions of fact.' * * * In Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 163 [37 P. 147] the court said: 'The facts disclosed by the record upon this appeal are in substance the same as those which were before the court on the former appeal; and the propositions of law there decided are, therefore, the law of this case, and we are not at liberty to reconsider them. It is true that nothing that was said in that opinion as to the facts could bind the court upon the second trial, nor be conclusive now, since the rule of the law of the case has no application to questions of fact.' And in People v. Hamilton, 103 Cal. 496 [37 P. 630], the court said: 'This rule does not apply * * * to questions of fact.' In Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514 [39 P. 200] 45 Am. St. Rep. 87, the court said: 'It is settled beyond controversy that a decision of this court on appeal as to a question of fact does not become the law of the case.'"

In Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 268, 122 P. 462, it is said:

"So well settled is the proposition that the doctrine of the law of the case, generally speaking, is applied only to the principles of law laid down by the court as applicable to a retrial of fact, that it does not embrace the facts themselves, and does not even embrace points of law not presented and determined, that no quotation from the authorities is necessary. * * *"

And in the case of Cowell v. Snyder, 171 Cal. 291, 152 P. 920, it is also said:

"The doctrine of 'the law of the case,' generally speaking, has reference only to the principles of law announced by the court as those to be applied to a retrial of fact. It does not embrace the facts themselves nor include points of law not presented and determined. Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 273 (122 P. 462), and cases cited."

[2] In view of the California decisions cited it must be conceded that to whatever extent the law of this case was settled by the decision of the Court of Appeal in 52 Cal. App. 184, 198 P. 427, it does not determine any of the facts, but we believe does determine the meaning of the order of the trial court granting a new trial to be a general order.

Calling attention to particular portions of that opinion, we quote:

"It may further be suggested that if this limitation of the reasons for the order be excluded, there still remains a general order granting the motion, and respondent would be entitled to the benefit thereof if the facts contained in the record would authorize the motion to be granted upon any ground upon which he relied in presenting his motion. However, it is our opinion that the motion was granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and for the particular reason above stated. * * * Conceding that there was some evidence tending to exonerate the plaintiff from the charge of negligence, it results that the evidence upon that point was conflicting to such a degree that on appeal the decision of the lower court, either in granting or in refusing a new trial, should not be reversed. Where the evidence is thus conflicting, a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court."

Prior to July 3, 1919, the appellate court had the right to consider that a new trial was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, if that ground was mentioned in the motion, whether the order mentioned the grounds or not, and this order was made in January, 1919, and thus while contributory negligence is mentioned, although not a ground of new trial, the court at that time had the right to say, and did say, that it was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, and that the order was general.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to proceed in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

88 Cal App. 542

PEOPLE v. KERRICK et al. (Cr. 1534.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 2, 1927.

1. Criminal law ⇨703—Motion for advisory verdict of not guilty cannot be granted at conclusion of prosecution's opening statement (Pen. Code, § 1118).

Under Pen. Code, § 1118, motion for advisory verdict of not guilty may be granted only after evidence of either side is closed, and cannot be granted at conclusion of prosecution's opening statement.

2. Homicide ⇨304—Instruction authorizing acquittal if homicide by shooting was accidental, regardless of other circumstances, was properly refused (Pen. Code, §§ 195-197).

Requested instruction, in homicide prosecution, which would authorize jury to acquit if shooting were accidental, regardless of any other circumstances, was properly refused, since in view of Pen. Code, §§ 195-197, an accidental shooting is not always excusable or justifiable.

3. Homicide ⇨289—Instruction authorizing conviction for homicide if, while defendants were engaged in unlawful act, deceased was killed by one of them, regardless of relation of homicide to unlawful act, held erroneous.

Instruction, in homicide prosecution, stating in effect that all defendants should be found guilty if they were engaged in doing some unlawful act and while thus engaged deceased was killed by one of them, regardless of whether homicide was so related to unlawful act in which they were engaged that death might have been natural and probable consequence of act, held error.

4. Homicide ⇨289—Instruction authorizing conviction for homicide if, while defendants were assembled to engage in unlawful act, one member killed deceased, regardless of their participation in design and intent of one who killed deceased, held error.

Instruction, in homicide prosecution, authorizing conviction if defendants had assembled for purpose of engaging in an unlawful act which would not in its probable consequence tend to destroy life, and one member of party departed from original purpose of gathering and killed deceased, regardless of their participation in design and intent of one who committed offense, held error.

5. Unlawful assembly ⇨1—That parties assembling did not intend to do lawful act in unlawful manner does not prevent assembly from being unlawful (Pen. Code, § 407).

In view of Pen. Code, § 407, fact that when two or more persons assembled there was no intent to do a lawful act in an unlawful manner, that is, in a violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, does not prevent such assembly from being unlawful.

6. Unlawful assembly ⇨1—Purpose or intent to do lawful act in unlawful manner may be formed either before or during assembly.

The purpose or intent rendering an assembly unlawful may be formed either before or at the time of assembling, or it may be formed with the agreement of mutual assistance after assembling, and it is immaterial at what time intent to do lawful act in an unlawful manner is formed, whether prior to or during assembly.

7. Unlawful assembly ⇨1—Not every meeting where violent, boisterous, and tumultuous conduct occurs is unlawful assembly (Pen. Code, § 407).

Notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 407, not every meeting where violent, boisterous, and tumultuous conduct occurs may be denominated an unlawful assembly.

8. Unlawful assembly ⇨1—Statute prohibiting unlawful assemblies was intended to prevent disturbances of public peace by persons assembled under such circumstances as to excite terror and alarm in neighborhood (Pen. Code, § 407).

Pen. Code, § 407, prohibiting unlawful assembly, was intended to prevent any disturbance of public peace by persons having no avowed or legal object, assembled under such circumstances, and deporting themselves as to produce danger to public peace and tranquillity, and which excites terror, alarm, and consternation in a neighborhood.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Sarah Kerrick and others were convicted of manslaughter, and they appeal. Reversed.

Welburn Mayock, of Los Angeles, and Clarence M. Booth, of San Francisco, for appellants Kerrick.

Stanley Visel and F. M. Andreani, both of Los Angeles, for appellants Hunt, Isabel, Burns and Davis.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendants and appellants were charged by indictment with the crime of murder. They were tried jointly and verdicts of manslaughter were returned against each of them. Motions for a new trial were filed on behalf of Sarah Kerrick and also on behalf of Joe Hunt and Iris Burns and lastly on behalf of Henry Isabel and Anita Davis. Each of these motions was denied, and the defendants prosecute their appeals from the orders mentioned and from the judgments upon the verdicts.

The Attorney General, with commendable sincerity, evidencing an appreciation on the part of that office that public officers charged with the administration of the law are or should be interested solely in promoting the cause of justice, closes his brief for the people with this language:

"We have discussed all points raised by appellants; and that due to the errors which we believe to exist in the record we do not ask for an affirmance."

With this confession of error before us it will be sufficient if we set forth only enough of the facts to make clear the errors complained of and statements of the law applicable thereto to clarify the situation on retrial. On the evening of June 26, 1927, the deceased, Tom Kerrick, and his wife, appellant Sarah Kerrick, and Joe Hunt, together with Iris Burns, who at the suggestion of deceased had been invited as a companion for Hunt, and after the purchase of a quantity of intoxicating liquors drove to Lankershim, where they persuaded Henry Isabel and his wife to join the party. During the succeeding drive Joe Hunt's revolver dropped to the floor of the car and was picked up by the appellant Sarah Kerrick. She says that when they arrived home she took the gun out of her hand bag and put it upon the mantel and does not remember of picking it up again, although she does remember of having it when her husband chased her into the kitchen just before he was killed, and that she "must have picked it up on the mantel as" she "passed." Before their arrival home most of the party were well intoxicated—and the drinking continued. Joe Hunt went to sleep on the kitchen floor and Iris Burns became nauseated. She finally lay down on the couch in the living room. Sarah Kerrick and Anita Davis went to the home of one of the neighbors in an unsuccessful attempt to recruit new members of the party, and as they returned found Henry Isabel on the couch with Iris Burns in an unduly intimate position. An altercation ensued concerning the details of which the witnesses differ. According to Sarah Kerrick it was more or less of a general mêlée, during which Kerrick was shot. She says: "During the time we were struggling over this gun was when the shot was fired." Anita Davis, after testifying to the quarrel, says that she thought the fight was over and that all of them except Tom Kerrick went into the kitchen to have some coffee; that when deceased came in he was offered coffee by Mrs. Kerrick, which he refused, but he did say that he would drink with Iris Burns; that Sarah Kerrick put her hand down to her side and—

"She pulled her hand up on her lap. I saw the gun and I grabbed her arm, hooking my arm through hers and jerked her back, at the same time the gun went off. I can't say if the gun had gone off before that, but I know it went off then. She just went limp. She just gave in entirely. Then I glanced up right quick and Tom wheeled around with his back to us; he had been facing us. The blood was running down the side of his mouth and he staggered into the living room."

This last testimony is the only testimony which might be construed as showing directly that the appellant Sarah Kerrick did the shooting, although it is open to the construction that the gun was discharged by reason of the tussle between the appellants Sarah Kerrick and Anita Davis. This much is clear, that the party was hilarious and that a quarrel took place, during which Tom Kerrick was killed.

[1] The appellant Sarah Kerrick made a motion for an advisory verdict of not guilty at the conclusion of the prosecution's opening statement, on the ground that proof of all the facts mentioned by the district attorney would not be sufficient to convict. Suffice it to say that there is no provision in our law for such a motion at that juncture. Section 1118 of the Penal Code provides that a motion of like character may be granted "after the evidence on either side is closed." But we know of nothing which would justify the court in granting such a motion prior to the introduction of the state's evidence.

[2] The next assignment by appellant Sarah Kerrick is untenable. She complains of the refusal of the court to give the following instruction:

"The jury are instructed that if the shooting in this case was accidental it becomes, of course, your duty to render a verdict of not guilty as to all defendants, and in considering whether the shooting was accidental or otherwise, it is your duty to resolve all doubts upon that question in favor of the defendants and against the prosecution, keeping in mind at all times that the defendants and each of them are presumed to be innocent of the crime charged in the indictment and all other crimes and offenses."

This instruction would authorize the jury to acquit if the homicide were accidental, regardless of any other circumstances, but an accidental shooting is not always excusable or justifiable. Sections 195-197 of the Penal Code; People v. Hubbard, 64 Cal. App. 27, 220 P. 315, and cases there cited.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"(15) You are instructed that a homicide committed by accident and misfortune, even in the heat of passion, or upon sudden and sufficient provocation, or upon sudden combat, is not excusable when the person, or persons, committing the homicide was, or were, at the time violating some law, or using any dangerous weapons in the commission of the homicide. And if you should find from the evidence in this case beyond a reasonable doubt that Tom Kerrick was killed by a gunshot wound fired by some person in the heat of passion, or upon some sudden and sufficient provocation, or in a sudden combat, it is not an excusable homicide, and it would be your duty to return a verdict of guilty, if at the time you were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the persons committing the homicide were violating some law and that said homicide was not in the necessary self-defense of habitation, property, or person.

"(16) You are instructed that whenever two or more persons assemble together to do an unlawful act and separate without doing or advancing toward it, or do a lawful act in a violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, such assembly is an unlawful assembly, and if the jury are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants were assembled together in the home of Tom Kerrick for the purpose of a party and by the use of intoxicating liquors or otherwise, said party was carried on in a violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, and that some one member of the party shot and killed Tom Kerrick while said party was so conducted in such violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, then you should return a verdict of guilty against all the defendants so engaged in such violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner in conducting such party.

"(17) You are instructed that when two or more persons assembled and acting together make any attempt or advance toward the commission of an act which would be a riot if actually committed, such assembly is a riot. And you are further instructed that any use of force or violence, disturbing the public peace, or any threat to use such force or violence if accompanied by immediate power of execution by two or more persons so assembled and so acting together and without authority of law is a riot, and if you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time charged in this indictment the defendants were engaged in disturbing the public peace, and that Tom Kerrick was killed accidentally by one of said defendants without malice aforethought, you should return a verdict of manslaughter as charged in this indictment against all the defendants so acting during the time of such riot if you find there was a riot."

"(20) You are instructed that a person must be presumed to do that which he voluntarily and willfully does in fact do, and must also be presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own voluntary acts. Therefore you are instructed that whenever two or more persons assemble together to do an unlawful act and separate without doing or advancing toward it, or do a lawful act in a violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, such assembly is an unlawful assembly. And if the jury are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants, or some of them, were assembled together in the home of Tom Kerrick for the purpose of doing an unlawful act or for doing a lawful act in a violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, and that some one member of the party shot and killed Tom Kerrick while the members were so assembled, and not in the necessary self-defense of habitation, property, or person, then you should return a verdict of guilty against all the defendants so engaged. If you find that said shot was fired accidentally, under such circumstances as described above, but without malice, your verdict should be guilty of manslaughter, and if you are satisfied that said shot was fired intentionally, then your verdict will be that of murder of the first or second degree."

[3] All of the appellants attack these instructions on two grounds: First, that they ignore the element of causal relation between the doing of the unlawful act and the homicide; and, second, that the instructions would make all guilty if they were participating in an unlawful act, regardless of their knowledge or participation in the design of the actor. These contentions must be upheld.

By the instruction the jury were told that all the defendants should be found guilty if they were engaged in doing some unlawful act, and during the time they were so engaged Tom Kerrick was shot and killed by one of them, regardless of whether the homicide was so related to the unlawful act in which they were engaged that it may be said that death was a natural and probable consequence of the act. Injustice is not law, and yet a moment's reflection demonstrates that such a rule would operate most illogically and unjustly. We cannot ignore the element of causation in the unlawful act necessary to connect it with the offense. In our ordinary phraseology we refer to the result of this element by saying it must be the probable consequence naturally flowing from the commission of the unlawful act. In 13 R. C. L., p. 845, we read the rule as follows:

"It may be stated generally that a homicide is committed in the perpetration of another crime, when the accused, intending to commit some crime other than homicide, is engaged in the performance of any one of the acts which such intent requires for its full execution, and while so engaged, and within the res gestæ of the intended crime, and in consequence thereof, the killing results. It must appear that there was such actual legal relation between the killing and the crime committed or attempted, that the killing can be said to have occurred as a part of the perpetration of the crime, or in furtherance of an attempt or purpose to commit it."

See Jackson v. State, 101 Ohio St. 152, 127 N. E. 870; Commonwealth v. Couch (Ky.) 106 S. W. 830.

[4] The second attack of appellants must be upheld. Under the instructions as given, if the defendants had assembled together for the purpose of engaging in an unlawful act which would not in its probable consequence tend to destroy life, and one member of the party departed from the original purpose of the gathering and shot and took the life of Kerrick, all might be convicted, regardless of their participation in the design and intent of the one who committed the offense. In 29 C. J. 1149, the rule is stated, in discussing the offense of manslaughter where one unintentionally kills another in doing an unlawful act, as follows:

"But the death must be due to the unlawful act of defendant and not to the intervening act of negligence of a third person; or to an independent intervening cause in which defendant did not participate and which he could not foresee, and the death must have been the natural and probable consequence of the unlawful act, and the act the proximate cause."

Again at page 1070 of the same volume, it is said:

"In order to render one responsible as a principal in the second degree or as an accessory before the fact in the commission of a homicide, it is essential that he share in the criminal intent of the direct actor. Thus, although one may have had some difficulty or altercation with the deceased, he is not responsible for a homicide committed at or about the same time by a third person, acting independently, if he did not share in the design of such third person. The fact that the altercation brought on the fatal encounter is immaterial. The same is true of the fact that one was the aggressor in the difficulty, or that the third person interfered to aid him. It is not enough that the acts of one tended to aid or encourage the principal in the first degree, they must have been done for that purpose. * * * If two or more are acting independently, and the actual perpetrator of the homicide cannot be identified, all must be acquitted, although it is certain that one of them was guilty. * * * While it is essential in order to render one guilty as a principal in the second degree or as an accessory before the fact that he share in the criminal intent of the principal in the first degree, it is not necessary that his participation in the homicide should have been by preconcert with the actual perpetrator, nor need he have originated the criminal design. A common design need not have existed for any particular length of time before the commission of the homicide. It is sufficient if there was a community of purpose between accused and the direct actor at the time the homicide was committed."

In the case of People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 P. 861, the court quotes with approval a statement found in 8 Cyc. 641, as follows:

"Nevertheless the act must be the ordinary and probable effect of the wrongful act specifically agreed on, so that the connection between them may be reasonably apparent, and not a fresh and independent product of the mind of one of the confederates outside of, or foreign to, the common design. Even if the common design is unlawful, and if one member of the party departs from the original design, as agreed upon by all of the members, and does an act which was not only not contemplated by those who entered into the common purpose, but was not in furtherance thereof, and not the natural or legitimate consequence of anything connected therewith, the person guilty of such act, if it was itself unlawful, would alone be responsible therefor."

And to the same effect in Butler v. People, 125 Ill. 641, 18 N. E. 338, 1 L. R. A. 211, 8 Am. St. Rep. 423, it is said:

"No person can be held responsible for a homicide unless the act was either actually or constructively committed by him; and, in order to be his act, it must be committed by his hand, or by some one acting in concert with him, or in furtherance of a common design or purpose. Where the criminal liability arises from the act of another, it must appear that the act was done in furtherance of the common design, or in prosecution of the common purpose for which the parties were assembled or combined together, otherwise a person might be convicted of a crime to the commission of which he never assented, which could not be done upon any principle of justice."

There can be no doubt but that such is the rule of law applicable to the situation here.

[5, 6] The appellants also assail two of the instructions heretofore quoted (No. 16 and No. 20) on the ground that they do not correctly define an unlawful assembly. It should be noted first that both of the instructions use the words of section 407 of the Penal Code. The appellant Sarah Kerrick contends that if when two or more persons assemble there is no intent to do a lawful act in an unlawful manner, that is to say, in a violent, boisterous, and tumultuous manner, there is no offense. We cannot agree with this assertion. The section of the Code to which we have referred seems merely to be a reaffirmation of the common law. In American and English Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) p. 344, we read that—

"It is not always necessary that a specific intent of any sort should exist in the minds of the persons assembled in order to constitute the offense, because it is well settled that an assembly of persons attended by circumstances reasonably calculated to excite alarm is an unlawful assembly, regardless of the matter of intent."

The text is supported by authorities from which we select the following:

"There seem to be two modes in which an assembly of persons may become unlawful, so as to be a subject of indictment; one, by the purpose for which it meets, and the other, without regard to its purpose, by the numbers and demeanor of those present at it." Slater v. Wood, 22 N. Y. Super. Ct. 15.

And in another standard encyclopedia we read that the purpose or intent "may be formed either before or at the time of assembling, or it may be formed with the agreement of mutual assistance after the assembling." This latter manner of expressing it would seem to clarify the situation. It is immaterial at what time the intent to do the lawful act in an unlawful manner is formed—whether prior to or during the assembly. As stated in Wharton's Cr. Law, § 1856:

"A lawful assembly becomes unlawful whenever the members agree to resort to violent and tumultuous measures to achieve even a lawful end."

[7, 8] The other appellants attack these two instructions upon the ground that they do not define unlawful assembly in such a manner as to give the jury a clear concept of the nature of the offense of unlawful assembly, and with this criticism we are bound to agree. Not every meeting where violent, boisterous and tumultuous conduct occurs may be denominated an unlawful assembly, even though that be the wording of the statute. It is particularly dangerous in a country where meetings are constantly held for every conceivable purpose, many of them accompanied with much noise and excitement, to lay down such a doctrine. At this time of the year in our country in almost every hamlet, and certainly in every city of any size, contests between the youth of schools and colleges are being staged which could not be characterized as anything other than violent, boisterous and tumultuous. Yet the communities are not alarmed and the public peace is not endangered. No one would for a moment characterize high school or college football games as unlawful assemblies. The statute was intended to prevent "any tumultuous disturbance of the public peace by" two or more persons "having no avowed, ostensible legal or constitutional object assembled under such circumstances and deporting themselves as to produce danger to the public peace and tranquillity, and which excites terror, alarm and consternation in the neighborhood." In re Charge to Grand Jury, 4 Pa. L. J. 29. The jury should consider, as we read again in Wharton's Cr. Law, § 1851, "In determining the question of terror * * * whether rational and firm men, in charge of families, would have, under the circumstances, cause for anxiety; and in testing this it is necessary to take into account the hour at which the parties meet, the language used by them, and the acts done."

We have examined the other specifications of error and find nothing which in the event of a retrial requires comment.

The judgments and orders are reversed.

McCAULEY v. EYRAUD. (Civ. 3369.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Partnership ☞61—No time being fixed for continuance, relationship was partnership at will, and could be dissolved by either partner at any time (Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, subd. 2).

Where no time was fixed for continuance of a partnership to conduct a laundry, partnership was at will, and, under Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, subd. 2, could be dissolved by either party at any time.

2. Judgment ☞146—Refusal to vacate default dissolving partnership at will, held not abuse of discretion, where matters in answer could be urged on accounting (Civ. Code Proc. § 473).

In suit to dissolve partnership at will and for an accounting, refusal to vacate default judgment for plaintiff because of defendant's mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, basing motion on proposed answer of defendant, held, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, not abuse of discretion, under Civ. Code Proc. § 473, where, under complaint, plaintiff was entitled to dissolution, and all matters referred to in answer could be presented to commissioner taking accounting and urged when trial court passed on commissioner's report.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. A. McCauley against Albert Eyraud. From an order granting motion to vacate and set aside an order granting motion to vacate default judgment and reviving default, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Joujon-Roche and Martin E. Geibel, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. D. Martindale, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff for dissolution of partnership and accounting.

The record shows the following: Summons served on the defendant June 4, 1924. Default of the defendant in failing to answer the summons and complaint served in this action entered June 16, 1924. Default judgment dissolving partnership and appointment of commissioner to take an accounting entered June 24, 1924. Accounting before the commissioner appointed by the court had on July 22, 1924, both parties appearing by attorneys. Report of commissioner returned to the court July 24, 1924. Objections to commissioner's report filed by defendant July 31, 1924. Notice that application would be made to the court on the 28th day of August, 1924, to set commissioner's report for hearing served July 23, 1924, and filed August 25, 1924. Notice of motion for order setting aside default and vacating decree and judgment served July 26, 1924, filed on August 28, 1924. August 15, 1924, minute order entered denying motion to vacate default and set aside decree and judgment. October 14, 1924, notice of motion for rehearing of defendant's motion to set aside default served and filed. October 21, 1924, minute order entered in rehearing of motion to set aside default, granting motion upon condition that defendant pay to plaintiff $75, if trial results adversely to defendant. On the 21st day of November, 1924, plaintiff served, and on the 26th day of November, 1924, filed, notice of motion to set aside and vacate the order of the court made on the 21st day of October, 1924, vacating and setting aside judgment entered by default, etc. On December 22, 1924, minute order entered granting the motion to vacate and set aside the order granting the motion to vacate the default judgment and reviving and restoring the default judgment. The appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from this last order.

[1] The complaint sets forth that on or about the 4th day of February, 1924, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a contract of partnership in writing, whereby the parties agreed to conduct a laundry located at 1963 Weber avenue, Willowbrook, Cal.; that thereafter the defendant wrongfully excluded the plaintiff from participation in said partnership, and also refused to allow the plaintiff to examine the books and accounts of said partnership, and was retaining for himself all of the proceeds thereof. Dissolution of the partnership is prayed for, and also that a commissioner be appointed to take an accounting. Annexed to the complaint is a copy of the written agreement of partnership, from which it appears that the defendant conveyed to the plaintiff one-half interest in the partnership business herein stated for the sum of $300. The written agreement shows that the partnership is what is known as a "partnership at will"; no time being fixed for the continuance thereof. The proposed answer filed by the defendant in connection with his motion to set aside the default herein referred to admits the partnership, but denies that he wrongfully excluded the plaintiff from participation therein. Thus it appears at the very beginning of the consideration of this cause that only the accounts of the partnership were actually involved by the complaint filed in the action and the answer sought to be filed. Being a "partnership at will," the right of dissolution might be exercised by either party at any time, and the question whether the defendant did or did not wrongfully exclude the plaintiff from participation therein is an entirely immaterial question. In the case of Peardon et al. v. White, 65 Cal. App. 463, 224 P. 263, in considering dissolution of partnerships at will, this court has held that a complaint alleging formation of a partnership, agreement to advance money, purposes for which it is to be organized, and concluding with a prayer for dissolution and accounting, showed a "partnership at will," which could be dissolved at any time, in view of Civil Code, §§ 2449, 2450, subd. 2. To the same effect is case of Shuk-en v. Cohen, 179 Cal. 279, 176 P. 447, where it is held that, under a "partnership at will," a partner may retire and have an accounting, or that dissolution may be had by mutual agreement. See, also, 20 Cal. Jur. 799, § 98. The record shows that the defendant appeared at the hearing had before the commissioner appointed to take an accounting; that the accounting consisted in an examination of the books of the partnership; that the commissioner reported to the court the result of the accounting, and that the defendant filed his objections thereto; that application was made for the setting of the time by the court to consider the report of the commissioner. The record is absolutely silent as to the action of the court in relation to the account filed by the commissioner. Whether the report of the commissioner was affirmed, modified, amended, or rejected does not appear from the transcript, and the appeal herein does not present any questions in relation thereto, and it cannot be determined from the transcript before us whether the appellant suffered any prejudice by reason of the action of the court in relation to any matters pertaining to the accounting. One of the briefs filed by counsel contains a statement that commissioner's report was approved, but the record contains nothing of the kind. The certificate to the transcript, certified to by the clerk, omits any mention of such order in the transcript, but does set out specifically every other paper, order, or matter of record in the proceeding. The transcript is certified to by the judge of the court as being correct.

[2] We are thus brought to a consideration of the notice of defendant's motion to vacate the default judgment entered herein. We are dealing with the first motion. The motion sets forth that it will be made upon the ground that the default and the judgment thereon were taken through mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of the defendant; that the motion would be made and based upon the proposed answer of the defendant, accompanying the notice, affidavits filed therewith and the pleadings and files and records of said cause. The affidavit of the defendant sets forth that, at the time of the service of summons upon him, he did not speak the English language very well, nor did he understand the English language very well; that he had been in this country only about 15 years, and was not familiar with legal proceedings. Other reasons are set forth, such as that the defendant was unable to bear the expense of an appeal, and therefore his motion to vacate the default should be granted in the interests of justice. The defendant's wife also made an affidavit to the effect that all the matters set forth in the proposed answer were true. Counter affidavits were filed by the plaintiff to the effect that the defendant had stated, when the papers were served upon him, that he had a lawyer who would look after the matter, and also to the effect that the plaintiff had $4,000 worth of property. Additional affidavits filed by the defendant showed that there was a mortgage of some $2,000 on the property referred to. It is sufficient to say that all the matters, so far as material to anything which the trial court should consider upon an application to set aside the default, were controverted by affidavits filed by the plaintiff. At the time of the hearing before the court of the defendant's motion to set aside the default, the record shows that the defendant had had full opportunity to be present, and was represented by counsel in the taking of the account by the commissioner; that the defendant's objections to the account were before the court for future consideration; that the opening of the default would not tender to the court any questions for determination that could not be considered by the court as the cause then stood, with the objections of the defendant to the commissioner's account then before it. It is true the commissioner's report as contained in the transcript would indicate that the commissioner found that there was due from the defendant, instead of from the partnership, the $300 which the plaintiff had invested therein, and the accumulated profits of $78.25, but, as hereinbefore stated, there is no showing that this error of the commissioner was not corrected by the court, assuming, without any record thereof, that the trial court finally passed upon the commissioner's report. Whether, upon the record presented to us, the strict letter of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, wherein it provides that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless it appears that there has been a miscarriage of justice applies, need not be decided. It is sufficient to say, however, that the spirit of that section applies to this case. There is no showing whatever to any miscarriage of justice. As we have seen, being a "partnership at will," dissolution could be had at any time. If the action of either party resulted in damage to the other, a question of damages may be presented, which is not presented in this action. By reason of the pleadings herein filed by the plaintiff and the proposed answer filed by the defendant, so far as the dissolution of partnership is concerned, no other judgment could be entered herein, save and except that the court might find that the defendant had not excluded the plaintiff from participation. This, however, would not prevent the right of the plaintiff to obtain dissolution. The proposed answer does not set forth any damages that would be suffered by the defendant, but only presents matters which were proper to be presented to the commissioner taking the accounting and to be urged upon the attention of the trial court when passing upon the report of the commissioner. A very similar case is presented in Williams v. Reed, 43 Cal. App. 425, 185 P. 515, which was an action for dissolution of partnership and accounting. Default was entered there just as here. In considering the question of setting aside the default, the court in that case said, after referring to the conflicting affidavits:

"Thus, we see that a very sharp and decided conflict as to the questions presented was present. Under these conditions, we are powerless to interfere with the conclusion of the trial court herein. The rule is, as it has been so frequently stated, both by the Supreme Court as well as by this court, that 'in the consideration of an appeal from an order made upon affidavits, etc., involving the decision of a question of fact, this court is bound by the same rule that controls it where oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be taken as established.' Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 P. 1001; Hyde v. Boyle, 105 Cal. 102, 38 P. 643; Bernou v. Bernou, 15 Cal. App. 341, 114 P. 1000."

And, further, in answer to the argument that the discretion of the trial court should be liberally exercised in passing upon motions under section 473, Civil Code of Procedure, the opinion in the Reed Case states:

"In this we agree. And the presumption is that, in the absence of satisfactory showing to the contrary, the lower court so exercise its discretion. In this case our attention has not been called to anything which would show an abuse of discretion by the trial court and since, as before stated, the deciding of the motion was a matter otherwise purely within the discretion of that court, we are now impotent to disturb the conclusion reached."

The final order of the court and the one appealed from shows that the court took into consideration all the facts set forth in the records to which we have referred, just as the trial court did upon the first motion to vacate the default. It is urged by the respondent that the trial court had no jurisdiction to entertain the motion for a rehearing of the first motion to set aside the default, on the ground that more than 60 days had elapsed before the motion for rehearing was made, and therefore that the order of the court denying the motion to vacate the default and entering of the default judgment had become final.

For the reasons which we have stated, there being no showing whatever of any prejudice suffered by the defendant, or any showing that the discretion of the court has been so abused as to justify interposition by an appellate court, it is unnecessary to pass upon the question of whether a trial court has or has not jurisdiction to rehear the motion to set aside a default, where the motion is not interposed until more than 60 days have elapsed after the entry of the order denying such motion.

No reason being made to appear for holding that the trial court abused its discretion herein, the order appealed from is affirmed.

STARKWEATHER v. EDDY. (Civ. 3360.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. Nov. 22, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1170(3)—Denial of motion to strike portions of complaint held not ground for reversal, where prejudice not shown (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

After trial was had fact that a pleading contained irrelevant, immaterial, redundant, or evidentiary matters was not, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, ground for reversal because of the trial court's denying a motion to strike out such portions of the pleading, where definite prejudice was not shown to have resulted from court's action.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1039(1)—Judgment will not be reversed for technical defects in pleadings, where substantial justice has been done.

Where substantial justice has been done, a judgment will not be reversed because of technical defects in the pleadings.

3. Pleading ⇨433(6)—Omission of material fact in complaint is cured by judgment, where no demurrer interposed.

The omission of a material fact in the complaint is cured by the judgment, where trial was had without the interposition of a demurrer.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1170(3)—Though complaint in action to recover money did not specifically allege fraud, judgment permitting recovery held not to require reversal, where no demurrer had been filed.

Where an action to recover money was apparently based on the idea that such money had been obtained from the plaintiff by the defendant through fraudulent acts, judgment for recovery held not to require reversal, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, even though complaint did not specifically allege fraud, since no demurrer had been filed, and the evidence showed elements of fraud.

5. Trial ⇨396(5)—Trial court should find on issue not made by pleadings but arising from evidence.

In an action for the recovery of money, where evidence of fraud in its procurement was introduced though the complaint contained no specific allegations of fraud, held, that the trial court could find on the question of fraud, even though it was not alleged, since evidence was introduced thereon.

6. Appeal and error ⇨171(3)—Where cause was tried on theory certain facts were in issue, after judgment cause will be considered as if pleadings correctly tendered such issue.

Where a cause was tried on the theory that certain facts were in issue, after judgment the cause will be considered as though such issues were correctly tendered by the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by J. W. Starkweather against F. J. Eddy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Davis and L. E. Dadmun, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas K. Case and G. M. Caldwell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action brought to recover the sum of $1,250 and also to recover 50,000 shares of the capital stock of the Minarets Mining Company. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The record shows that the Minarets Mining Company was, at the date of the trial, a corporation, and had been such since the 15th day of November, 1916; that the plaintiff was engaged in the prosecution of mining upon certain mining premises belonging to him; that during the year 1917 the plaintiff engaged in negotiations with the Minarets Mining Company for the transfer to said mining company of the mining premises belonging to the plaintiff, for and in consideration of the sum of $5,000 in cash and 150,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation; that the defendant was the organizer and promoter of the defendant corporation and had received therefrom 100,000 shares thereof in his own name and 50,000 shares thereof in the name of his wife; that, in consideration of the transfer by the plaintiff to the corporation of the premises above mentioned, the defendant, as the promoter and organizer of said corporation, had promised and agreed that he would undertake to raise a working capital of $10,000 for said corporation, and also the $5,000 to be paid to the plaintiff, as above mentioned, as part of the consideration for the transfer by him of his property to said corporation; that the defendant stated and represented to the plaintiff that in order for him to succeed in raising such money it would be necessary to pay a commission, either of stock or cash, as might in particular cases be arranged with parties through whom cash subscriptions should be obtained, and that the commissions would be at the rate of 20 per cent., and that the defendant would pay the same out of his large holdings in the corporation that is, that a stock commission of 20 per cent. would be paid out of the 150,000 shares belonging to the defendant; that thereafter the defendant represented and stated to the plaintiff that it was impossible to carry out the undertaking in full, and that he would be unable to pay or provide the corporation the means of paying plaintiff the agreed cash consideration of $5,000 for the transfer of plaintiff's property, in addition to the shares of stock to be issued to the plaintiff in said corporation, and that the defendant could not pay the cash commissions on stock sales, whereupon the plaintiff agreed, at the defendant's instance and request, that one-half of all moneys received by him from said corporation as said purchase price of his property might be used by defendant for such purpose, should it be found necessary to so use it, and also that plaintiff, at defendant's special instance and request, on account of defendant's alleged inability to raise the money he had undertaken and agreed to do, agreed that the plaintiff would accept from the corporation $2,500 in full satisfaction of its undertaking to pay him $5,000 for the transfer of property herein referred to; that thereafter the defendant represented to the plaintiff that 150,000 shares of the treasury stock had been subscribed and paid for in accordance with the previous agreement between the defendant and the plaintiff, and that it was necessary for plaintiff to assign and set over, out of his stock holdings, shares necessary to pay such stock commissions of 20 per cent. thereon; that the plaintiff had no information or means of obtaining information as to what it had done, and implicitly trusted in the truth of defendant's statements, and, relying thereupon, acted upon them, and did transfer and set over to the defendant a certificate of stock for 50,000 shares of plaintiff's interest in said corporation.

The plaintiff further alleges that out of the $2,500 received by the plaintiff from the corporation, upon the representations of the defendant that it was necessary for him to use the said sum of $1,250 thereof in payment of commissions, he turned over to the defendant and paid to the defendant the sum of $1,250. The plaintiff further sets forth that the defendant did not use such $1,250 in the payment of commissions, as represented by him, but obtained and used the same for his own personal advantage and benefit. The complaint also further sets out that the defendant had not used the stock assigned to him for promotion purposes in payment of stock commissions for the sale of treasury stock, but had retained the same for his own use and benefit, and had transferred and used the 50,000 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, obtained from the plaintiff, in payment of claims upon the corporation, instead of using his own stock, as theretofore agreed upon. We have not followed the exact language of the complaint, but have summarized the matters in controversy. The action is to recover the money and also the stock.

[1, 2] No demurrer, either general or special, was filed by the defendant. An answer was filed, however, denying practically all of the allegations of the complaint. Upon the cause being called for trial, the defendant objected to the court receiving any evidence in support of the allegations of the complaint, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The objection does not appear from the record to have been specifically made, but the remarks of the court indicate that it so understood the objection, and it will be so considered by us. The objection made in the trial court did not point out any reasons why the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the specific reasons therefor appear to be first urged upon this appeal. The court having overruled the objection, the defendant then interposed a motion to strike out certain portions of the plaintiff's complaint. The motion to strike out was made upon the ground that the portions sought to be stricken out were either conclusions of law, or evidentiary, redundant, or immaterial matters. An examination of the complaint leads to the conclusion that some portions thereof are subject to the objections raised by the defendant's motion, but the denial thereof by the trial court does not raise any serious question upon this appeal. After a trial has been had where each party has had an opportunity to present evidence upon all the issues tendered by the pleadings, the mere fact that a pleading contains irrelevant or immaterial or redundant or evidentiary matters does not present a cause for a reversal by reason of the court denying a motion to strike out such portions of a pleading. Section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution covers just such questions. But outside of the state Constitution the following principles of law have been established by the decisions, to wit: Where substantial justice has been done, a judgment will not be reversed for technical defects in the pleadings. The overruling of a motion to strike out, where prejudice is not shown, does not present a ground for reversal. Defects in pleadings must operate to the prejudice of the opposite party; otherwise, denial of a motion to strike presents no cause for reversal. These statements are supported by the following authorities: Petit v. Forsyth, 15 Cal. App. 149, 113 P. 892; Carrington v. Smithers, 28 Cal. App. 460, 147 P. 225; Parker v. Herndon, 19 Cal. App. 451, 126 P. 183; Montgomery Street Ry. Co. v. Mason, 133 Ala. 508, 32 So. 261; Sloane v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 668, 44 P. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193; Higgins v. San Diego Savings Bank, 129 Cal. 186, 61 P. 943.

[3, 4] Again, as stated in Garten v. Trobridge, 80 Kan. 720, 104 P. 1067, a trial having been had without the interposition of a demurrer, the omission of a material fact in the complaint is cured by the judgment. A somewhat similar question was presented to this court in the case of Young v. Benton, 21 Cal. App. 382, 131 P. 1051, where this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Burnett, said:

"There is thus some plausibility in the claim of uncertainty as to the theory upon which the complaint was framed, but it is entirely clear that appellant was not misled nor prejudiced thereby; and if we assume that the ruling was erroneous as to the demurrer the case should not be reversed after a full trial upon its merits."

That was a case where a demurrer was interposed, calling attention to the alleged defects. In the case at bar no demurrer was interposed. A denial, as we have shown, of a motion to strike out surplusage or redundant matter, is not a ground for reversal, and if the complaint was technically deficient as to some of its allegations, where the cause has been tried upon its merits and no prejudice is shown, we must hold that no reasons are presented for reversal. As bearing upon the question of whether a reversal of a judgment should be had under such circumstances, the language of the Supreme Court in Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27, is pertinent. It was there said:

"It is well established that a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, irrespective of whether or not the complaint states a cause of action, so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of the plaintiff's demand."

After citing a large number of cases, the court further adds:

"We think the complaint herein sufficiently states a cause of action to inform the defendant of the nature of the claim against him and to give the court jurisdiction of the cause."

In the case at bar the complaint is sufficient to inform the defendant of the following claims: That the defendant had obtained from the plaintiff the sum of $1,250 to be applied for a particular purpose; that the money was not applied for that purpose; that the defendant converted the money to his own uses and purposes; that the defendant obtained from the plaintiff a certificate for 50,000 shares of the capital stock of the Minarets Mining Company under the pretense that he had used all of his own stock, and required this stock from the plaintiff in order to enable the corporation to pay commissions for the sale of stock, and for which payment the defendant had agreed to use a like number of shares of his own stock; that the defendant had not used his own stock; and that he was obtaining the stock from the plaintiff in order that the defendant might retain and have the use and advantage, and retain the ownership of all of the stock theretofore issued to the defendant. The failure to comply with the representations made by the defendant, the converting of the $1,250 to his own uses and purposes, instead of using the same for the purposes represented by him to the plaintiff, constituted a fraud, just as much as though specifically alleged in the complaint. The elements of a fraudulent transaction are shown by the circumstances, even though it be true that the specific allegations do not sufficiently appear in the complaint, and that the complaint would have been subject to a special demurrer upon such grounds. That such is a settled rule of law in this state requires but one citation. In Minor v. Baldrige, 123 Cal. 187, 55 P. 783, it was held, quoting from the syllabus:

"The common counts in assumpsit may be used in this state, and in the absence of a special demurrer, the common counts for money had and received will lie to recover money obtained by false and fraudulent representations, and the proof may be made at the trial that it was so obtained, without any special pleading of the facts constituting the fraud, though such pleading must fail before a special demurrer."

This decision was rendered in 1893 prior to the adoption of the amendment to the state Constitution prohibiting reversal of judgments upon errors committed in ruling upon demurrers or motions which do not result in a miscarriage of justice. Again, the appellant states that:

"The trial court proceeded on the theory that the action was based upon fraud throughout the entire trial."

If this is true, it adds just one more reason why no reversal should be ordered herein on account of any defect in the pleadings relative to such allegations, because the defendant was at all times advised of the position of the court and of the issues he was expected to meet.

[5, 6] The appellant further urges that the findings of fact are not sustained by the pleadings or the evidence. The only assignment of error in this particular appears in appellant's brief in the following general language, without the citation of evidence one way or the other to sustain the contention. The assignment is as follows:

"The court also found that defendant, Eddy, had offered and agreed to pay out of his stock holdings, commissions on sale of stock, and for other purposes, long prior to securing from plaintiff the assignment of said certificate No. 53 for 50,000 shares. Again, appellant disagrees with the court in its findings, for in the opinion of appellant the evidence offered is insufficient to support such finding, and, if the evidence was sufficient to support such a finding, such a finding was and is outside of the issues."

Appellant has just stated the theory upon which the cause was tried. As shown by the case of Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 218 P. 756, issues which arise from the evidence and which are not directly made by allegations in the pleadings should be found upon. Appellant is mistaken in urging this ground as a cause for reversal. It has been frequently held that, where a cause is tried upon the theory that certain facts are in issue, after judgment the cause will be considered as though such issues were correctly tendered by the pleadings. Again, in Worth v. Worth, 155 Cal. 599, 102 P. 663, the Supreme Court of this state has held:

"An objection that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant certain of the findings of facts cannot be considered on appeal, when the record on appeal utterly fails to make any attempt to show any specifications of any particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient."

While nothing is pointed out by the appellant to sustain his contention that the findings are not supported by the evidence, we have taken occasion to read all of the evidence set forth in the appendix to appellant's opening brief, and find therein sufficient testimony, if believed by the trial court, to sustain all of its material findings. There is sufficient testimony to show clearly, if believed by the trial court, that the defendant obtained from the plaintiff the sum of $1,250 under the pretense that he was going to use it for a particular purpose, and converted the same to his own use, and that the same is true with regard to the 50,000 shares of stock. That the defendant upon the witness stand controverted all the testimony given by the plaintiff is immaterial upon this appeal. We may state, however, that the defendant's denial was not that he did not receive the money, but that it was advanced to him by the plaintiff as a loan, and that he paid it all back. The testimony as to the stock stands upon no more stable foundation so far as the defendant is concerned.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

SPAULDING v. O'CONNOR et al. ★
(Civ. 5971.)

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 22, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ¶1012(2)—It is enough for appellate court that there is evidence to support findings, irrespective of preponderance.

There being evidence to support findings, the appellate court will not disturb them, it not being its function to weigh the evidence to determine in whose favor it preponderates.

2. Auctions and auctioneers ¶9—Selling agent making false representations fraudulent in law as to size of land held liable to purchaser.

Defendants, who, as real estate agents and auctioneers in sale of land for another, made misrepresentations as to the size of the land, are liable to the purchaser damaged thereby, whether they made the representations carelessly or with deliberate intention, the law imputing to them a fraudulent intent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Ona W. Spaulding, executrix of the estate of Herbert G. Spaulding, deceased, against C. H. O'Connor and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Richard Kittrelle, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Redwine & Redwine and H. G. Redwine, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KING, Presiding Justice pro tem. Plaintiff bought certain real estate at an auction sale conducted by defendants, who were real estate agents and auctioneers. He paid $23,600. After the date of sale, the making of a deposit of $1,000, and final payment and receipt of a deed, he discovered that the property was materially smaller in size than was represented by the defendants, brought the action against the defendants for damages without joining the former owners of the property, and recovered $4,545.

Defendants appeal, claiming (1) that the evidence does not support the findings, and (2) that the judgment is against law.

The representations as to size of the property were made by a newspaper advertisement, by a map posted on the property at the time of the sale, and by one defendant orally at the time he was conducting the auction, but it nowhere appears that either defendant knowingly made a false statement of the size.

[1] As to the first claim of the appellants, it appears that complaint is made of paragraph 3 of the findings, where it is found that "plaintiff had no knowledge or information as to the name of the owner or owners of the property at the time he purchased same, * * * and the name of such owner or owners was not disclosed to him by said defendants, or either of them." And also of paragraph 4 of the findings, where "the court finds that the plaintiff did not discover that the property he purchased was 40 feet shorter than what it was actually represented to be until March 26, 1923, and after he had become the owner of said property."

As to this, it is only necessary to say that there is evidence to support these findings, and it is not the function of this court to weigh the evidence produced to determine in whose favor is the preponderance.

[2] The second specification of ground for a reversal—that the decision is against law—is based upon the argument that appellants were acting as the agents of a disclosed principal, and that, therefore, whatever damage plaintiff suffered was imputed to their principal only, and appellants were not liable for it. The trial court, however, after hearing the testimony, found that the name of the owner or owners was not disclosed to plaintiff, and therefore this argument fails.

In the case of Jewell v. Colonial Theatre Co., 12 Cal. App. 681, 108 P. 527, cited by appellant, the decision holds that:

"On its face the contract shows that Bacon was acting only as the agent."

And the case of Senter v. Monroe, 77 Cal. 347, 19 P. 580, also cited, was a case where the defendant signed a contract for sale of land as agent for the named owner when in fact he had no written authority.

Neither case is in point.

Stirnus v. Adams, 50 Cal. App. 730, 195 P. 955, is a case where the owner, Adams, and agent, Lyon, were joined as defendants when plaintiff sued for recovery of the money paid on purchase of an orchard, in which the trees were much older than represented and were diseased, infected, and run down, instead of being a first class orchard in the best of condition, as represented by the defendant Lyon, the agent.

The court there says:

"Defendant Lyon cannot escape liability on account of having acted as the agent of his co-defendant in inducing the plaintiff to enter into the contract of purchase, nor because he paid the money over to his principal. He knowingly participated in the transaction, held to have been fraudulent, and is equally responsible with his codefendant for the return of the money."

Story on Agency, § 311, lays down the rule applicable here as follows:

"In the next place as to the liability of agents to third persons for their own misfeasance and positive wrongs. In all such cases the agent is personally responsible whether he did the wrong intentionally or ignorantly, by the authority of his principal; for the principal could not confer on him any authority to commit a tort upon the rights or property of another."

When defendants, by newspaper advertisements, by the map posted on the premises at the time of sale, and by the oral statement of the auctioneer at the sale represented the lot as greater in size, and hence more valuable, than was actually the case, these statements were, or any one of them was, fraudulent, regardless of whether defendants themselves believed or did not believe the statements to be true.

If the fraudulent misrepresentations caused a damage to plaintiff, the maker of the representations is liable for this damage. "If a person, without knowledge of the existence of a fact, makes a positive representation that such fact exists, in order to induce another to act, the law imputes to him a fraudulent intent. * * * If an agent makes statements fraudulent in law, which cause injury to a person dealing with him, he is liable therefor." Hamlin v. Abell, 120 Mo. 188, 25 S. W. 516. "An officer of a corporation cannot escape liability for fraudulent misrepresentation on the ground that he was acting for the corporation." Bank v. Byers, 139 Mo.

627, 41 S. W. 325. "The actual perpetrator of a positive and obvious wrong can never exonerate himself from personal liability by showing that he was acting as the agent or servant of another, or even by his superior's command." Bennett v. Ives, 30 Conn. 329.

In Lewis v. Hoeldtke (Tex. Civ. App.) 76 S. W. 309, a Texas case, where the agent misrepresented the quantity of land sold, the agent was held "liable for the fraud, though in making such representations he was merely mistaken."

In Garrett v. Sparks Bros., 61 Wash. 397, 112 P. 501, the Supreme Court of Washington uses the language:

"It is fundamental that a party, whether acting for himself or another, is liable in damages for his own fraud. The fact that the principal is also liable does not relieve from responsibility the party who actually commits the wrong. * * * The party who has been wronged may elect to sue either or both."

In the Minnesota case of Hedin v. Minn. Med. Inst., etc., 62 Minn. 146, 64 N. W. 158, 35 L. R. A. 417, 54 Am. St. Rep. 628, it is said:

"Counsel makes the point that, as to the defendant Lawrence, the action should have been dismissed, because he, as the president of the defendant institute, was simply acting for it as its agent. We are not aware of any rule of law which will excuse and absolve a person from the consequences of his own wrong because he happened to be the agent of another at the time of the perpetration of the wrong."

In the instant case the untrue representations caused plaintiff damage, and the defendants who made those representations are liable to him, whether they were made carelessly or with a deliberate intention to wrong him.

The judgment is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. WILSON et al.

SAME v. BEST et al.

(Civ. 5716, 5650.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 25, 1927.

I. Appeal and error ⇐766—Where appellant's brief did not set forth pleadings, findings, judgment, or evidence sufficient to show grounds for appeal or justify reversal, respondent held entitled to affirmance (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a-953c).

On appeal purporting to be pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a-953c, where appellant's brief did not set forth any of the pleadings, findings, or judgment, and did not comply with section 953c, providing that parties should print in briefs such portions of the record as they desire to call to the court's attention, in that no evidence was set forth sufficient to advise opponents or court concerning grounds of appeal or sufficient to justify reversal, respondent held entitled to affirmance.

2. Appeal and error ⚡803—Order dismissing appeal results in affirmance of judgment.

Ordering dismissal of appeal results in affirmance of judgment.

3. Appeal and error ⚡803—After dismissing appeal, appellate court has no jurisdiction to pass on motion for affirmance.

After appeal has been dismissed, the appellate court is left without jurisdiction to pass upon appellee's motion for an affirmance of the judgment.

Actions by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against W. T. Wilson and others and against Ada Best and husband and others, consolidated for trial. From the judgments, defendants appeal. On motions to dismiss the appeals and to affirm the judgments. Appeals dismissed.

Fred Mansur, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Chapman & Chapman and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Upon motion of appellants it was ordered by this court that the above cases be consolidated for the purposes of appeal.

A dismissal as to Clara E. Herr and Rebecca W. Avery has been filed by the plaintiffs in Civil No. 5716.

[1] The appeal in the case of Title Insurance & Trust Company v. Wilson et al. is taken by what is known as the alternative method, purporting to be pursuant to sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. No part of the record was printed in appellants' opening brief. Later a supplemental brief was filed. However, only meager portions of the testimony of the witnesses appear therein, and respondent has made two motions in this court, one to dismiss the appeal, and the other to affirm the judgment of the superior court. These motions are the subject of this opinion and decision. Section 953c provides in unmistakable terms that:

"In filing briefs in said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

At the time of the decision of Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054, it was said that the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal had reiterated approximately a hundred times the necessity of an appellant following the method here attempted to be used, "to print in his brief or in a printed supplement thereto sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from." It is apparent that this has not been done in the instant appeal. Neither in the brief of appellant nor in his supplement thereto is there set forth any of the pleadings, findings, or judgment. The only suggestion of a compliance with the requirements of section 953c is the printing of less than 10 pages of the testimony, whereas the reporter's transcript contains 205 pages. From the slight scraps of testimony which are printed it cannot be ascertained in a single instance to what property reference is made. It is clear that the appellants' briefs are wholly inadequate to advise counsel for respondent or the court concerning the asserted grounds of appeal, or to justify a reversal of the judgment from which the appeal has been taken. The provision of the Code here involved is intended for the benefit of the adversary party as well as of the appellate court. It is unfair to both, and also to other litigants whose appeals are pending awaiting decision, to cause this court to devote its time to a performance of the labors of investigation and research expressly required of the appellants by law.

Under such circumstances, the respondent is entitled to an affirmance of the judgments of the superior court. Jeffords v. Young, supra; Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330.

What has been said also applies to Title Insurance & Trust Company v. Best et al.

[2, 3] It is ordered in each case that the appeal be dismissed. It results from the foregoing order that the judgment is affirmed in each case. Home for Care of Ineb. v. Kaplan, 84 Cal. 486, 24 P. 119; Taylor v. Albion Lumber Co., 176 Cal. 347, 168 P. 348, L. R. A. 1918B, 185. This court is then left without jurisdiction to pass upon the motion for an affirmance of the judgment. Duncan v. Times-Mirror Co., 109 Cal. 602, 42 P. 147.

PACIFIC INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALI-FORNIA et al. (S. F. 12545.)★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨375(1)—Employer is presumed to have acquiesced in status of employee giving orders and assigning work to fellow employees in absence of foreman.

Where, in absence of regular foreman, one of workmen gave orders and assigned work to other employees, it must be assumed that employer acquiesced in status of such workman.

2. Master and servant ⇨375(1)—Employees were not required to investigate whether foreman was absent before complying with orders of fellow employee assigning work.

Where fellow servant gave orders and assigned work to other employees in foreman's absence, other employees had right to look upon him as subforeman and could not be required to investigate to find out whether foreman was present before complying with his orders.

3. Master and servant ⇨375(1)—Employee's right to compensation for injuries in carrying out what he erroneously thought to be superior's orders depended on good faith.

Right of employee in automobile repair shop to compensation for injuries, sustained when he ran into street in alleged attempt to comply with what he erroneously thought was superior's order, depended on good faith and honesty of employee.

4. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Whether injured employee's testimony as to superior's order was fraudulent scheme held question of fact for commission (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) for injuries sustained by employee while proceeding to cross street in response to what he erroneously thought was superior's order, question whether employee's testimony involved fraudulent scheme was one of fact for determination of commission.

5. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Credibility of witness in compensation proceeding is for commission.

When question of fact is determined by commission in compensation proceedings, under circumstances which would admit of conclusion either way, court may not substitute its conclusion as to credibility of a witness.

6. Master and servant ⇨405(4)—Finding of compensable injury to automobile repairman, crossing street in attempt to comply with superior's signal, held sustained by evidence (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that injury to automobile repairman, crossing street near shop in alleged attempt to carry out what he mistakenly supposed to be order of his superior, who was crossing street towards parked automobile and threw his hand up arose out of and in course of his employment held sustained by evidence in proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

7. Master and servant ⇨391¼—Power to award interest in compensation proceedings is statutory.

Power to award interest in compensation proceedings depends on statutory authority.

8. Master and servant ⇨391¼—Order allowing interest held unauthorized, where there was no unreasonable delay in payment of workmen's compensation (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 23).

Where there was no unreasonable delay in payment of compensation, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 23 (St. 1917, p. 851), order providing that all payments should bear interest beginning "with the date of this award, or the date thereafter at which payments become due," was unauthorized and void, as requiring interest on payments not yet due.

9. Master and servant ⇨391¼—Workmen's compensation award not filed with clerk of court does not draw interest as "judgment" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1035; Workmen's Compensation Act, § 21).

Award in compensation proceeding is not a "judgment" as contemplated by Code Civ. Proc. § 1035, and does not draw interest as a judgment until a certified copy of findings and award is filed with clerk of superior court as provided by section 21 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 851).

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Alexander Michie, claimant, opposed by the Pacific Indemnity Company, insurer. Award of the Industrial Accident Commission in claimant's favor, and the insurer applies for certiorari. Award affirmed, and order for interest annulled.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is a proceeding to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Alexander Michie. Petitioner is the insurance carrier of the employer. The award is sought to be annulled on the ground that the finding of the commission that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment is without evidence to support it.

Alexander Michie was an automobile repairman in the employ of Don Lee Company at Sacramento. His working hours were from 8 o'clock a. m. to 5 o'clock p. m. The injury occurred about 4:45 p. m. on November 3, 1926, and under the following circumstances as shown by the evidence appearing in the record: Two other employees, Nugent and Lyle, were playing ball in an alley back of the shop between K and L streets and leading into Fifteenth street. The ball, thrown by one of the players, rolled out of the alley into Fifteenth street. Nugent ran across the street to recover the ball. Michie testified that he had been working on a car in the shop; that he came from underneath the car and stepped to the back door of the shop which opened onto the alley; that he there engaged Bud Keeler in conversation; that he did not see the ball roll into Fifteenth street; that he did not see nor know that Nugent was running after it; that he could not see Nugent from where he was then standing inside the door; that he heard some one call and stepped out of the door; that he then saw Nugent in the middle of the street crossing the same toward an automobile parked across the street and occupied by some person; that Nugent threw him arm up "like that" (indicating); that he (Michie) thought the car across the street was "stuck" and that Nugent was signaling him to come across the street and assist in the repair of that car. Michie started across the street toward that car when he was struck by a passing automobile and suffered the injury for which compensation was awarded. It was in evidence that it was customary for the different employees in the mechanical department, of whom Michie was one, to go into the alley and street to repair cars which had stopped outside of the shop for "trouble shooting" and repairs. It also appeared that in the absence of Mr. Young, foreman of the shop, Nugent had authority to assign work and give orders to other employees. It did not appear that Young was present or absent from the shop at this particular time, but it was shown that Nugent had issued orders to Michie on several occasions.

It developed at the hearing that the car across the street had not stopped there for repairs, and that Nugent had not summoned Michie for help.

There would seem to be no serious question but that the injury arose out of the employment. The difficulty is in determining whether Michie was injured in the course of his employment. We find no case in this state or elsewhere directly in point on this or a similar state of facts, so that a conclusion herein must rest on certain general principles inherent in compensation cases under our law.

[1-3] First, with reference to the relationship existing between Nugent and Michie, it may be said that the evidence is susceptible of the construction that must necessarily have been placed upon it by the commission, namely, that in the general work in and about the repair shop Michie was not in position to refuse to answer the call of Nugent for assistance. Although Young was the regular foreman, it was in evidence that, in the absence of Young, Nugent gave orders and assigned work to other employees. It must be assumed that the employer acquiesced in this status of Nugent. Under such circumstances, the other employees had a right to look upon Nugent as somewhat of a subforeman and could not be expected, when called upon by Nugent to perform work, to enter upon an investigation to find out whether Young were absent before complying with Nugent's request or order. So that in a consideration of what took place immediately prior to the injury, this relationship of superiority occupied by Nugent over Michie in the conduct of the shop must be kept in mind. Having this relationship in mind, it must be conceded that if Nugent and Michie had both been at work in the shop and Nugent had requested Michie by a signal of the hand or spoken word to come to another part of the shop to render assistance, it would have been proper for Michie to respond, and if Michie were injured in so responding, he would be entitled to compensation. Again, if, while in the shop Michie were injured in proceeding from his own job to a car on which Nugent was working under the honest belief that some signal or word from Nugent required his assistance, he would undoubtedly be entitled to compensation, even though he might have been mistaken in his conclusion that Nugent required his assistance. Furthermore, the field of operations for repair work on the part of the employer was not confined to the four walls of the shop. It extended, under the evidence, to the adjacent alley and street as occasion might require. If Nugent had gone across the street to attend to some repair work required to be done on the car parked at that place and had summoned Michie to come to his assistance, it clearly would have been the duty of Michie to respond. In the practical conduct of the shop it could not reasonably be assumed that any question would arise as to his obligation in that respect. In the event of injury to an employee so responding to a call for assistance and while crossing the street, the commission might well hold that the injury so sustained would be compensable. It would then seem to be reasonable to take the further step and to conclude that when the car with an occupant is across the street in a position where it was usual to have cars located for repairs, and when Nugent was proceeding in the direction of that car and making a signal with his arm, it would be consonant with the duty of Michie to his employer to respond to the signal when he believed in good faith that the signal was one requiring him to proceed across the street to the assistance of Nugent in the repair of a car. This would seem to be so, even though Michie was mistaken in his belief as to the effect of Nugent's action. The question to be determined is one of good faith and honesty on the part of Michie under the circumstances here shown.

[4-6] The petitioner inquires:

"What would interfere with recovery by an employee who had stepped aside from his employment and who conceives the fraudulent scheme of testifying that he thought his employer (or in our case, a fellow servant) told him to do an errand?"

The answer is that the question of whether there is such a fraudulent scheme is one of fact for the determination of the commission. When that question is determined by the commission under circumstances which would admit of a conclusion either way, this court may not substitute its conclusion as to the credibility of the witness. Cases may well be imagined when even an honest belief on the part of an employee as to his duty and the nature of his service in the premises would not be at all determinative. But when it appears, as here, that the working hours had not closed and both Nugent and Michie were still on duty; that Nugent had a right to call upon Michie for assistance in the work of the shop which extended in some cases to the repair of cars on the street; that Michie did not know that Nugent was running after the ball, but was motioning in such a way as to cause Michie to conclude that his assistance in the repair of a car across the street was required, and the other circumstances here shown are made to appear, we think the finding of the commission that the injury occurred in the course of the employment was supported by the evidence.

Petitioner calls attention to the fact that the evidence shows that when Nugent was crossing the street he dropped some coins from his pocket, and it argues that the unquestioned purpose, and none other, of Michie in going into the street was to recover this money. Michie testified that he saw something bright drop from Nugent's pocket, but that he did not go into the street to pick it up, and Nugent testified that at the time Michie was struck by the passing automobile he had gone past the point where the coins had fallen. We think this evidence was sufficient to meet the petitioner's contention.

[7-9] Petitioner takes further exception to that portion of the award ordering interest thereon. The order is as follows:

"It is hereby ordered that all payments herein awarded shall bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum until paid, beginning with the date of this award, or the date thereafter at which payments become due."

The power of the commission to include interest on an award is contained in section 23 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 851). After providing for costs in the discretion of the commission, that section provides as follows:

"* * * And the commission may, in its discretion, where payments of compensation have been unreasonably delayed, allow the beneficiary thereof interest thereon, at not to exceed one and one-half per cent. per month, during such period of delay."

There was no finding that payments of compensation had been unreasonably or at all delayed. The commission attempts to justify the order by saying that:

"If there have been no payments of compensation unreasonably delayed, then logically petitioner has not been called upon to pay any interest. If petitioner is not compelled to pay any interest, it has no complaint."

The difficulty with this contention on the part of the commission is that the order provides for interest on the award "beginning with the date of the award, or the date thereafter at which payments become due." The order is ambiguous but in any way it is read all of the payments would begin to bear interest either at the date of the award or upon the due date of any payment. In either event, the order provides for interest on payments not yet due. We find no authority for the order. The power to award interest is statutory and as the condition named in the statute as a prerequisite to the award of interest, viz., an unreasonable delay in payment, is unfulfilled this portion of the award must be annulled. The award is not a judgment as contemplated by section 1035 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It may be given the effect of a judgment by the filing of a certified copy of the findings and award of the commission with the clerk of any superior court as provided in section 21 of the act (St. 1917, p. 851). Until this is done, the award does not draw interest as a judgment.

As the order for interest is separable from the award of compensation, we deem it unnecessary to remand the proceedings for further action by the commission.

The award of compensation is affirmed. The order providing for interest on payments of the award is annulled.

NEWSOM et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CONTRA COSTA COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 12273.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Bridges ⇐14—Right to operate toll bridge is limited to corporations formed for exclusive purpose of assisting in administration of governmental affairs (Civ. Code, §§ 528, 529 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 1200], 530; Pol. Code, §§ 2843 et seq., 4058).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 528, 529 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1200), 530, and Pol. Code, §§ 2843 et seq., 4058, only such corporations as are formed for specific purpose of assisting state in administration of governmental affairs may demand right to enjoy franchise to operate toll bridge.

2. Bridges ⇐4—Toll bridge is part of "public highway."

Bridge on which right is given corporation to collect tolls is part of "public highway."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Highway.]

3. Turnpikes and toll roads ⇐2—All highways on which corporation is permitted to take or charge tolls become ipso facto public highways.

All highways for use of which state permits corporations to take or charge tolls become public highways by force of right granted, subject to right of licensee to collect tolls for limited time.

4. Statutes ⇐195—Statutory requirement that thing be done in particular manner prevents doing it otherwise.

If by language of statute thing is limited to be done in particular manner, statute includes negative that it shall not be done otherwise.

5. Bridges ⇐14—Private corporation organized to construct for profit roads and bridges and other structures, and to collect tolls, held without authority to operate toll bridge (Pol. Code, §§ 2843 et seq., 2871, 4058; Civ. Code, §§ 528, 529 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 1200], 530).

Corporation organized as private corporation for purpose of carrying on general business for profit in construction of roads and bridges and other structures and for collection of tolls, except from structures "permitted to be operated only by corporations formed for a specific purpose," held without authority, under Pol. Code, §§ 2843 et seq., 2871, 4058, and Civ. Code, §§ 528, 529 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1200), 530, to operate toll bridge, in view of requirement that corporations exercising such franchise be exclusively engaged in performing public service, especially where time for application for franchise had expired.

6. Statutes ⇐181(2)—Construction of statute which leads to absurd result is avoided.

Courts will avoid construction of statute which leads to absurd result.

7. Quo warranto ⇐5—Question of dissolution of corporation may be raised only by quo warranto proceeding.

Question of dissolution of corporation may be raised only by quo warranto proceeding, and is not involved in proceeding to require submission of ordinance granting franchise to corporation.

8. Counties ⇐55—Ordinance in excess of power of county supervisors could not be made effective by initiative.

Where board of supervisors of county did not have authority to pass ordinance, ordinance could not be made effective by initiative of electors of county.

Application by Fred S. Newsom and another for mandamus to be directed to the Board of Supervisors of Contra Costa County and W. J. Buchanan and others, members thereof, requiring them to pass as an ordinance or submit to a vote a proposed initiative ordinance granting a toll bridge franchise. Writ discharged.

Pierce & Carlson, of Richmond, for petitioners.

Archibald B. Tinning, Dist. Atty., for respondents.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, amici curiæ, for American Toll Bridge Co.

SEAWELL, J. This is the second application made to this court wherein the prayer of respective petitioners was for the issuance of the writ of mandamus commanding the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa, and the members thereof acting in their official capacity, to pass as an ordinance or to submit to a vote of the electors of said county for adoption or rejection a proposed initiative ordinance granting to the Northern California Development Company, a domestic corporation, a franchise to erect, construct, and maintain a toll bridge across the Straits of Carquinez, a navigable waterway separating the county of Contra Costa and the county of Solano, between certain terminal points, with the right to charge and take tolls from persons using the same in accordance with a schedule set forth in said proposed ordinance.

A number of the questions pertinent to the main issues herein were before this court in Galvin v. Board of Supervisors, 195 Cal. 686, 235 P. 450, wherein the subject-matter of the controversy was before us. The object which failed of accomplishment in that proceeding is sought to be accomplished by the instant proceeding. In the first proceeding petitioners made an application to the board of supervisors of Contra Costa county for a grant of authority to construct and maintain a toll bridge across said Straits of Carquinez between the same terminals as are described in the instant proceeding, alleging conformity with the requirements of part 3, tit. 6, c. 4, art. 1, Political Code, Section 2843 et seq. The application was denied.

The petitioners thereupon, assuming to act in accordance with the provisions of section 4058, Political Code, prepared a proposed ordinance granting or purporting to grant to petitioners the right and privilege denied by the board of supervisors in the first instance, and by petition duly circulated procured signatures of the requisite percentage of qualified voters of the county of Contra Costa, requesting said board to pass said proposed ordinance or submit it to a vote of the people at a general or special election. The proposed ordinance and petition were accordingly submitted to said board of supervisors, with the request that it be adopted, or, if said board refused to do so, that it submit said ordinance to the electors of said county as provided by section 4058, Political Code.

Said board of supervisors, being duly advised in the premises, refused to either enact the same as an ordinance or to submit it to the electors of the county for adoption or rejection, by the electors at an initiative election or any election. Petitioners thereupon applied to this court for a writ commanding said board of supervisors to act upon said ordinance in accordance with the prayer of their petition. An alternative writ was thereupon issued by this court, and upon hearing had the relief sought therein was denied. The reasons assigned by this court in refusing to grant the relief prayed for are fully set out in Galvin v. Board of Supervisors, supra, and consist in the main of the omission of petitioners to give notice of their intended application for the construction of said bridge and to comply with certain statutory jurisdictional requirements, all of which were specifically considered in Galvin v. Board of Supervisors, supra.

[1-3] The objections there urged by respondents, which were based upon certain jurisdictional grounds, and which were deemed alone sufficient to justify a denial of the application of the petition, did not include the objection brought to our attention by an examination of the articles of incorporation, which are attached to the petition herein, but which were not attached to the petition in the former proceeding. Therefore the extent of the grant of powers conferred upon the petitioning corporation was not before this court in the Galvin Case, and no point was made that said corporation was without authority to demand the right to enjoy a franchise, which may only be enjoyed by such corporations as are formed for the specific and exclusive purpose of assisting the state in the administration of governmental affairs. Neither was the point discussed by counsel in the instant case upon its first presentation to us and for this failure of consideration of an important question an order of resubmission was made. That the petitioning corporation was not incorporated in the form, manner, and for the exclusive purpose which the law exacts of a corporation in order to qualify itself to exercise governmental functions in the construction and operation of toll bridges, ferries, wharfs, chutes, or piers, and take tolls thereon from the public, is the natural, logical deduction that must be made from an examination of the various Code sections and statutes of this state which provide for corporate existence, not only for the construction and maintenance of the five divisions of the public highway system specifically mentioned in division 1, part 4, tit. 6 (section 528 et seq.), Civil Code, but also for other branches of the public highways, such as wagon roads, turnpikes and toll roads generally, none of which may be constructed and operated by corporations unless such corporations are formed for the exclusive purpose of performing the specific public service which they assume to undertake on behalf of the state.

A toll bridge is a part of the public highway. All highways for the use of which the state permits a corporation to take or charge tolls become public highways by force of the right granted, subject to the further right of the licensee to collect tolls for a limited time and at the expiration of said limited period the ways become free public highways. 25 Cal. Jur. 366; People v. Davidson, 79 Cal. 166, 21 P. 538. A grant of power to a corporation to engage in the business of constructing private or public buildings, works or improvements does not empower it to exercise the functions of an agent of the government unless said corporation is formed exclusively to perform the particular services described in its charter. The statutes granting the right to incorporate for toll bridge construction purposes and regulating the operation thereof, as provided by division 1, pt. 4, tit. 6, Civil Code, and other parts of the Civil as well as the Political Code, cannot be given any other meaning than that a corporation, in order to be entitled to construct and maintain a toll bridge in its own right, must be formed under the statutes enacted for that specific purpose.

Section 528, Civil Code, as it stood at the time and for many years prior to the time petitioning corporation made its application for a license or franchise to build and operate a toll bridge across Carquinez Straits or instituted this proceeding to enforce its alleged right, provided as follows:

"No corporation must construct, or take tolls on a bridge, ferry, wharf, chute, or pier until authority is granted therefor by the supervisors, or other governing body having authority in that behalf."

Section 529, Civil Code, then provided that "every such corporation ceases to be a body corporate." (Certain acts which, if not performed as provided therein, automatically worked a defeasance then follow.) The language of the section, as above set out, was changed by the Legislature of 1927 to read:

"Every such corporation which has heretofore or may hereafter be incorporated may be dissolved." St. 1927, p. 1200.

Subdivisions follow providing for the dissolution of the corporation for failure to comply with the statute. The causes which, it would appear, automatically worked forfeitures of corporate existence as the law stood before the 1927 amendment were failure to obtain from the board of supervisors or other governing body authority to construct and operate a toll bridge within a fixed period following the filing of its articles of incorporation; failure to commence the construction of the bridge within a stated period thereafter and to actually expend thereon at least ten per cent. of the capital stock of the corporation; failure to complete said bridge within a fixed period; and, in case of destruction of said bridge, failure to reconstruct it within a fixed term.

Section 530, Civil Code, requires the president and secretary of said toll bridge corporation to annually under oath report to the board of supervisors the cost of constructing and providing all necessary appendages and appurtenances for the use of said bridge; the amount of all moneys expended thereon since its construction for repairs and incidental purposes; the amount of its capital stock, amounts paid in and actually expended; the amount received annually for tolls and from all other sources, stating each separately; the amount of dividends made and the indebtedness of the corporation, specifying for what it was incurred and such other facts and particulars respecting the business of the corporation as the board of supervisors may require. This report the president and secretary were required to cause to be published for four weeks in the daily newspaper published nearest the bridge if required by order of the board of supervisors. A failure to make such reports subjected the corporation to a penalty of $200 and for every week permitted to elapse after such failure an additional $50 payable in each case to the county from which the authority of the corporation was derived.

It is very convincing from the foregoing provisions of the statute that the authority to construct and operate a toll bridge is to be granted only to such corporations as are formed for the exclusive purpose of constructing and maintaining a particular designated toll bridge, and this right is not conferred upon corporations not specifically formed to execute the trust which the government delegates to its agents. The regulations and penalties provided by law for the control and supervision of said corporations are not at all applicable to the management, direction or control of the ordinary corporation formed for private profit. In fact, the application of the statute providing for the creation of toll bridge and toll road corporations to corporations organized for general business purposes might prove ruinous to the stockholders of the latter class of corporations should said latter class undertake to build and operate a toll bridge in connection with other granted corporate powers conferred upon it by its charter. A failure to comply with any one of the toll road provisions would work a dissolution of the corporation to continue as a corporation for every purpose. Further, it is the clear intent of the statute that the revenue derived from the operation of toll bridges should not become mixed, intermixed or confused with funds derived from private sources of income. To this end toll bridge corporations must be kept separate and apart from all other corporations.

[4] The strictness of accountability to which a toll bridge corporation is held to the board of supervisors of the county authorized to grant the license or franchise, and the complete supervision which it exercises with respect to its business as provided by section 530, Civil Code, demonstrates the incompatibility and inapplicability of the law providing for the creation of a quasi public corporation with the law providing for the formation of the usual corporation created for profit only. Section 529, supra, provides that "every such corporation ceases to be a body corporate, * * *" meaning by the use of the word such the kind of corporation permitted to be created by the preceding section, which is a toll bridge, ferry, wharf, chute, or pier corporation. No other kind of a corporation than those named in the above-cited section may exercise the powers granted by said section. If by the language used a thing is limited to be done in a particular form or manner, it includes a negative that it shall not be done otherwise. Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 249; Martello v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 254 P. 658.

Coming to a brief consideration of "Public Ferries and Toll Bridges," as that subject appears under part 3, tit. 6, c. 4, art. 1, Political Code, it is found that the granting of rights, fixing the amount of license tax to be paid, rate of tolls that may be collected, and term of operation are matters in the exclusive control of the board of supervisors. In addition, every owner of a toll bridge must annually report to the board of supervisors from which the license is obtained the actual cost of its construction; repairs made during each preceding year; expense of labor and hire, and other costs necessarily incurred in the conduct of the business; the amount of amortization and taxes actually paid in the conduct of the business; amount of tolls collected; the estimated cash value of the bridge exclusive of the franchise. The various provisions of the Political Code are repugnant to the theory that a corporation existing for general business purposes merely is entitled to demand a license to construct and operate a toll bridge in connection with its other business. Every corporation making application for a franchise must attach to and file with its application a copy of its articles of incorporation certified by the secretary of state or the county clerk where filed. Pol. Code, § 2871. The reason therefor is to show that it is such a corporation as is entitled to a franchise. If it is not, it becomes the duty of the board of supervisors to deny its application.

[5] Petitioner herein has been incorporated under the general laws since August 25, 1924, with its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco. It did not make application for the franchise demanded herein until long after the statutory limit fixed by section 529, Civil Code, had gone by. It makes no pretense that it was organized for the exclusive purpose of constructing and operating a toll bridge across Carquinez Straits or constructing such a bridge at any named or described locality. Its subscribers of stock were associated together "for the purpose of incorporating a private corporation under the laws of the state of California." Petitioner's corporate powers, as set forth in its articles of incorporation, are numerous and various. In a summary of said powers petitioner has reproduced the only language to be found in its articles of incorporation which may be said to relate in any way to its right to deal in or with franchises. We quote from petitioner's brief:

"To engage in and carry on a general business for profit in constructing many structures, such as roads, bridges, wharves, piers, railroads, water systems, reclamation and irrigation works, dams, reservoirs, sea walls, electric systems, telegraph and telephone lines, factories and buildings and structures of every nature and description. To acquire, hold, enjoy and operate under franchises and rights of every description which can be acquired by grant from public authorities. To collect tolls for and charges from such franchises, structures, etc. (excepting only those permitted to be operated only by corporations formed for a specific purpose, such as railroads, wagon roads, telegraph lines, banks, etc.). [Italics supplied.] To deal in and operate various types of realty, mines, agricultural lands, etc. To deal in patents and secret processes. To deal in personal property. To enter into contracts of every nature with governmental agencies * * * to effect the general purposes thereof."

It will be noted that no reference is made of any intention on the part of the corporation to construct and maintain a toll bridge over the Carquinez Straits. The language which refers at all to the collection of tolls as charges arising from franchise rights is expressed in the most general terms. By its language it expressly excepts from its powers wagon roads and those corporations formed for specific purposes, in which class toll bridge es are unquestionably included. The power authorizing said corporation to build and construct public buildings and public improvements and engage in the business described in its articles of incorporation, did not confer upon it the right to construct and operate a toll bridge across Carquinez Straits.

[6] Our views upon this point are further fortified by the fact that section 529, Civil Code, provided prior to and at the time this proceeding was commenced that if within six months from filing its articles of incorporation the applying corporation does not obtain such authority from the board of supervisors (the right to construct and operate the toll bridge) it "ceases to be a body corporate." By the amendment of 1927 the time within which said authority must be obtained was extended to one year. By the same amendment, as above pointed out, the mandatory language was stricken out and the words such corporation "may be dissolved" substituted in its place. Under the law, as it stood until 1927, no corporation organized to engage in any kind of business for profit or for any purpose whatever, including the exercise of toll privileges, was eligible to receive or demand a franchise for the operation of a toll bridge. By the amendment of 1927 such corporation may be dissolved if it fails to comply with any of the enumerated duties set out under a specific title of the Code providing for the organization and regulation of corporations formed for a specific purpose. No such hazard as above pointed out was intended to menace the corporate existence of a long-existing corporation formed for general business purposes or to capriciously deny it a privilege obtainable by corporations subsequently organized. A construction that leads to an absurd result is to be avoided. Therefore, we must conclude that the statutes relate to corporations that are formed for a special purpose. The time limit and forfeiture provisions in such cases are reasonable and workable; in other cases they are not.

[7, 8] No question of the dissolution of the corporation is presented by this proceeding, which may be done only by a quo warranto proceeding, as argued by petitioner corporation. The sole question we decide in that respect is that petitioner in its corporate form is not authorized to exercise the privileges it seeks to enforce by this proceeding. The board of supervisors upon an inspection of its articles of incorporation doubtless concluded that it did not have jurisdiction to adopt the ordinance requested nor to do the idle thing of submitting to initiative vote an ordinance which, if adopted, conferred no right upon petitioner. That which cannot be done by the board of supervisors could not be done by initiative. Galvin v. Board of Supervisors, supra.

Other questions of considerable importance, such as whether a franchise right to construct and operate a toll bridge over navigable waters is a proper subject for the application of the initiative and referendum provisions of the state Constitution and Political Code, and the alleged insufficiency of description of the Solano county terminus, are rendered moot by the view we take of the law governing the corporate rights of petitioner in the premises.

The writ is discharged.

KIRK v. CULLEY. (L. A. 10025.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1927.

1. Attorney and client $\S$ 76(1)—Attorney may be discharged at any time unless he has vested interest in subject-matter of litigation.

Client may at any time discharge attorney unless attorney has vested interest in subject-matter of litigation, and this is true both under law of agency and on grounds of public policy.

2. Attorney and client $\S$ 134(2)—Contract for contingent fee does not prevent client from discharging attorney at any time.

Client may at any time discharge his attorney, although there exists contract for contingent fee.

3. Pleading $\S$ 380—Issues made by pleadings must be followed unless new issues are tried by consent.

Issues made by pleadings must be followed unless, by consent, new issues are actually introduced, tried, and determined.

4. Attorney and client $\S$ 165—Proof of contract for contingent fee, wrongful discharge, and happening of contingency held not allowable under plea of performance of specific contract at fixed price.

Where specific contract of employment calling for legal services at fixed price and fully performed is pleaded in attorney's action for legal services, proof of contract for contingent fee, wrongful discharge, and happening of contingency substituted an entirely new issue for one pleaded and cannot be allowed without prejudicing defendant's rights.

5. Contracts $\S$ 346(1)—Under allegation of full performance, recovery on proof of excuse for nonperformance cannot be had.

Recovery on proof of excuse for nonperformance cannot be had on allegation of full performance.

6. Attorney and client $\S$ 134(1)—Attorney may sue for damages on wrongful discharge under partially performed contract, and full contract price may sometimes be measure of damages.

Attorney on his wrongful discharge under partially performed contract may sue for damages, and in some cases full contract price may be allowed as measure of such damages.

7. Action $\S$ 65—Attorney suing for legal services cannot recover on cause of action arising after entry of suit, and finding of facts occurring after instituting suit is without substance.

In action by attorney for legal services performed in criminal prosecution, which services were dispensed with before charges were dismissed, finding that indictments were dismissed after institution of suit for services and before trial thereof held without substance, since plaintiff's cause of action must have arisen before filing of complaint, and no recovery can be had on cause of action arising after entry of suit and developed by evidence during trial.

8. Attorney and client $\S$ 165—Recovery for legal services under count in special assumpsit on contract fully performed held unwarranted under evidence showing attorney was discharged before performance and that contingency on which fee was based occurred after filing of suit.

In action by attorney for legal services in criminal prosecution, recovery on count in special assumpsit on contract of employment alleging full performance was unwarranted under evidence showing services were dispensed with before indictments were dismissed, and that dismissal of indictments on which fee was contingent occurred after filing of suit.

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 1122(2), 1175(2), 1176(2)—Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal may make findings contrary to trial court findings and enter or direct entry of proper judgment, where jury trial does not exist as matter of right or is waived (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{3}{4}$; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a).

Under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{3}{4}$, and Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a, Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal are authorized to make findings of fact contrary to or in addition to those made by trial court in cases where jury trial does not exist as matter of right, or where jury has been waived, and may take additional evidence and enter proper judgment or direct that it be done by trial court.

10. Appeal and error $\S$ 1122(2), 1176(2)—Supreme Court held authorized to direct judgment on additional findings of reasonable value of legal services, where trial court's findings on contract were not sustained (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{3}{4}$; Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a).

In action by attorney for legal services in criminal prosecution, where no findings of fact were made by trial court as to reasonable value of legal services rendered, and findings based on performance of alleged contract were not sustained by evidence, Supreme Court, under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{3}{4}$, Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a, was authorized to make additional findings of fact as to value of services and direct proper judgment under record showing services rendered by attorney prior to wrongful discharge.

11. Attorney and client $\S$ 166(3)—Trial judge may appraise legal services sued for independent of testimony as to value.

Trial judge in court of record, who must himself be attorney at law, has power independent of testimony as to value to appraise legal services shown by record to have been rendered.

12. Evidence ☞571(7)—Expert testimony as to value of legal services sued for is not conclusive on jury or court, which may fix amount independent of testimony.

In action by attorney for legal services, expert testimony as to value of services, though admissible, is not conclusive either on jury or trial court, which has power to fix amount to be allowed for attorney's fees independent of expert testimony.

13. Appeal and error ☞1013—Appellate courts may appraise value of legal services sued for.

In action by attorney for legal services, appellate courts as well as trial court may make appraisal and adjudication of value of services rendered.

14. Appeal and error ☞1122(2)—Judgment for full amount claimed for legal services applied to count on contract or quantum meruit and could be sustained on latter count by Supreme Court, though findings failed to support former count (Const. art. 6, § 4¾; Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

In action by attorney for legal services based on count in special assumpsit on contract of employment alleging full performance and on count in quantum meruit on same transaction for same amount, judgment for attorney for full amount claimed could apply to either count, and could be applied by Supreme Court under modified findings of fact authorized by Const. art. 6, § 4¾, and Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, on count in quantum meruit, without reversing case where only findings of trial court on count in assumpsit were not sustained by evidence.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Wally A. Kirk, executrix of the estate of E. E. Kirk, deceased, against B. F. Culley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed. Super-seding opinion in 257 P. 461.

Lucien Gray, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
William A. Schreider, of Los Angeles, and
E. E. Kirk, of Burbank, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is a suit by plaintiff below, respondent's testate, an attorney at law, against the defendant below for a balance of $1,000 claimed as an attorney's fee. The complaint is in two counts, the first in special assumpsit on the contract of employment, alleging full performance thereunder, with the unpaid balance above stated due. The second count is in quantum meruit on the same transaction and for the same amount. The answer is a general denial with specific allegations admitting employment and certain services, but claiming full payment thereof by the sum of $350 admittedly received by the plaintiff.

The contract found by the court to exist between the parties is set forth in an unexecuted writing prepared by the attorney, which reads as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., September 12, 1922.

"Messrs. B. F. Culley and Ovid D. Bohlen, Black Building, Los Angeles, California—Gentlemen: Re People v. B. V. Culley and Ovid D. Bohlen (re Indictments Nos. 18311 and 18491).

"In order to reduce our understanding regarding services and fees in the above-entitled matters, the substance of our agreement is hereby set down in writing.

"In consideration of my services as the attorney for each of you, my fees are $350 each, to include preparation for trial now set for November 1, 1922. These preliminary fees have been paid in full by each of you.

"For the trial of the above-mentioned cases my charges are to be $250 in each case, from each of you, payable either during or before the termination of each of said trials or of the one trial should the cases be consolidated.

"Should these actions be dismissed against you at any time, before the commencement of the trial, during the trial, or prior to the termination of the trial, or in the event of a verdict of acquittal, then it is agreed that my fee is to be a total of $1,000 from each of you. This fee will eliminate all other fees excepting the ones already paid. It is understood and agreed that each of you will, on or before November 1, 1922, procure cashiers' checks, each payable to yourselves and indorsed in blank, and deliver the same to William A. Schreider, attorney at law, in escrow with him, to be delivered to me unconditionally on the date said charges may be dismissed against each of you in any of the manners above set forth.

"E. E. Kirk.

"E. E. Kirk.

"I fully understand and agree to all of the terms of the above contract. Dated September 12, 1922.

"[not signed]

"B. F. Culley.

"I fully understand and agree to all of the terms of the above contract. Dated September 12, 1922.

"[not signed]

"Ovid D. Bohlen."

The gist of the findings in this connection is as follows:

"That plaintiff had fully performed the contract on his part to be performed as attorney for defendant until his said discharge and was at all times ready, willing, and able to continue and perform his contract and had it not been for said wrongful discharge, plaintiff could have obtained the dismissal of said defendant in said criminal actions without trial; that plaintiff was prevented from fully performing his contract in obtaining the discharge of the defendant in the criminal cases of said Culley and Bohlen by the acts of said Culley."

At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground of material variance between the evidence adduced and the cause of action pleaded. This motion was denied. Some evidence was later introduced by the defendant, but nothing appeared to change the facts upon which the claim of variance was predicated. Judgment passed for plaintiff for the full amount claimed, and defendant has appealed under the alternative method.

[1-3] The claim that the evidence received and findings made thereon will not support the cause of action made by the pleadings must be sustained. A client may at any time discharge his attorney, unless the attorney has a vested interest in the subject-matter of the litigation. This is true not alone under the law of agency, but is supported also by a well understood rule of public policy. The existence of a contract for a contingent fee does not change the rule. Todd v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 406, 413, 184 P. 684, 7 A. L. R. 938; Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 174, 68 P. 581; Ayres v. Lipschutz, 68 Cal. App. 134, 228 P. 720, rehearing denied by this court. The issues made by the pleadings must be respected and followed unless by consent new issues are actually introduced, tried and determined. Com'rs v. Barnard, 98 Cal. 199, 202, 32 P. 982; Rudel v. Los Angeles, 118 Cal. 281, 286, 50 P. 400; Simmons v. Simmons, 166 Cal. 438, 441, 137 P. 20; Crescent Lumber Co. v. Larson, 166 Cal. 168, 135 P. 502; Frascona v. Los Angeles, 48 Cal. App. 135, 138, 191 P. 968; Baar v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 827.

[4, 5] To plead a specific contract of employment calling for legal services at a fixed price and fully performed, then undertake to sustain it by proof of a contract for a contingent fee, a wrongful discharge of the attorney, and the later happening of the contingency, is to substitute an entirely new issue for the one pleaded, and such action, if allowed, would in all probability work an injustice to the defendant by prejudicing his right to defend against the extraneous issue. The rule is well understood that a recovery on proof of excuse for nonperformance cannot be had on an allegation of full performance. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 117, 24 P. 867; Peck v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 133, 124 P. 834; Boardman v. Christin, 65 Cal. App. 413, 418, 419, 224 P. 97; Estate of Warner, 158 Cal. 441, 445, 111 P. 352; Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 739, 174 P. 657; Roche v. Baldwin, 135 Cal. 522, 65 P. 459, 67 P. 903.

In Owen v. Meade, 104 Cal. 179, 181, 182, 37 P. 923, 924, the court had before it practically the identical state of facts here involved, and in disposing of the question now before us said:

"The contract alleged is that of an unconditional promise upon the part of defendant to pay to the assignor of plaintiff the sum of $1,000 for his services as an attorney in the prosecution of the action referred to in the complaint, while the evidence which the court held was relevant and sufficient, if believed, to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant made the alleged contract, was to the effect that the promise of defendant to pay was not unconditional, but contingent. There is a wide and essential difference between the two contracts, and proof of one will not support a finding that the other was made. The plaintiff's allegation of an absolute promise was not sustained by proof of the contingent promise, and evidence in relation to such contingent promise was not relevant to the issues made by the pleadings."

[6] It is true that an attorney upon his wrongful discharge under a partially performed contract may sue for damages and in some instances the full contract price may be allowed as a measure of such damages (Webb v. Trescony, 76 Cal. 621, 18 P. 796), but in the case at bar plaintiff below did not elect to avail himself of this right of action.

[7, 8] There is no substance available to respondent in the finding that the indictments were actually dismissed after institution of the present suit and before a trial thereof was had. A plaintiff's cause of action must have arisen before the filing of the complaint. Landis v. Morrissey, 69 Cal. 83, 86, 87, 10 P. 258; Lewis v. Fox, 122 Cal. 244, 252, 54 P. 823; Morse v. Steele, 132 Cal. 456, 458, 64 P. 690; Cuneo v. Davis, 36 Cal. App. 351, 171 P. 1079; Boardman v. Christin, supra. Plaintiff may not recover on a cause of action arising after entry of suit and developed by the evidence only during the trial. Johnson v. Moss, 45 Cal. 515, 518; Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151, 152; Owen v. Meade, supra; Kredo v. Phelps, 145 Cal. 526, 529, 78 P. 1044. The judgment as applied to the first count was therefore unwarranted and may be disregarded.

[9] Addressing ourselves to the second count of the complaint, it seems appropriate at this time to make the first exercise of the power conferred upon this court by the recent amendment to our Constitution and the statutory enactment designed to put such power so conferred into practical operation. A new section, numbered 4¾, was added to article 6 on November 2, 1926, which reads as follows:

"In all cases where trial by jury is not a matter of right or where trial by jury has been waived, the Legislature may grant to any court of appellate jurisdiction the power, in its discretion, to make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court. The Legislature may provide that such findings may be based on the evidence adduced before the trial court, either with or without the taking of additional evidence by the court of appellate jurisdiction. The Legislature may also grant to any court of appellate jurisdiction the power, in its discretion, for the purpose of making such findings or for any other purpose in the interest of justice, to take additional evidence of or concerning facts occurring at any time prior to the decision of the appeal, and to give or direct the entry of any judgment or order and to make such further or other order as the case may require."

Later and on July 29, 1927, there became effective section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, as follows:

"In all cases where trial by jury is not a matter of right or where trial by jury has been waived, the Supreme Court or a District Court of Appeal may make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court. Such findings may be based on the evidence adduced before the trial court either with or without the taking of evidence by the court of appellate jurisdiction, pursuant to such rules as the Supreme Court may prescribe.

"The said courts of appellate jurisdiction may, for the purpose of making such findings or for any other purpose in the interest of justice, take, pursuant to such rules, additional evidence of or concerning facts occurring at any time prior to the decision of the appeal and may give or direct the entry of any judgment or order and make such further or other order as the case may require. This section shall be liberally construed to the end, among others, that wherever possible causes may be finally disposed of by a single appeal and without further proceedings in the trial court, except where the interest of justice requires a new trial."

These provisions are plain and intended to be effective in broadening the powers of this court and the District Court of Appeal in the disposition of appeals in cases where a jury trial does not exist as a matter of right, or where, if the right does exist, it has been waived. We are thereby expressly authorized to "make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court." We may base such findings either upon the evidence heard in the court below or may on our own account, under such rules as we may prescribe, take additional evidence on any fact occurring at any time prior to the disposition of the appeal. Likewise, we may make and enter a proper judgment ourselves or direct that it be done in the trial court.

[10, 11] It will be noted that under the second count of the complaint in this action a proper cause of action in quantum meruit is set forth. It is also apparent that no findings of fact thereunder were made by the trial court as to the reasonable value of the legal services rendered by the plaintiff below to defendant. With a finding upon this subject the cause is in proper condition for this court to make or direct the judgment that shall be entered and the cause thereby finally determined. It is unnecessary to take further evidence, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to await the effective date of the rules upon this subject promulgated by this court. The record is complete as to the services rendered by the attorney, plaintiff below, prior to his wrongful discharge by the defendant. It has many times been held and is a sound principle of law that a trial judge in a court of record, who must himself be an attorney at law, has the power, independent of testimony as to value, to appraise the legal services shown by the record in the cause before him to have been rendered. This is the necessary deduction from many cases, among which are the following:

Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281, which involved the determination of the value of services rendered by an attorney in the settlement of the estate. Witnesses testified that the services were worth the amount paid, but the court below thought otherwise and reduced the credits from $5,075 to $1,000. In upholding the action of the court below, this court said:

"The court below was not bound by the opinions of the professional witnesses as to the value of the services rendered by the attorney for the administratrix, and as to the proper amount to be allowed therefor. The court was authorized to compare its own judgment as to such value with the opinions of the witnesses, and make such allowance as should be just. Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45 [26 L. Ed. 1028]; Anthony v. Stinson, 4 Kan. 211."

Estate of Straus, 144 Cal. 553, 557, 558, 77 P. 1122, 1123, where the court said:

"As to attorney's fees: The court * * * had before it sufficient data from which to determine what would in all probability be a reasonable compensation and the amount to be retained by the executor sufficient to meet its payment. It was not necessary that any evidence of a professional nature should have been introduced upon this subject. All the proceedings in the estate and all matters in which the executor could have enlisted or required the services of an attorney were before the court, and from these the court of its own knowledge and experience could determine what would be a reasonable fee. Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281; Freese v. Pennie, 110 Cal. 469 (42 P. 978)."

[12] While expert testimony is clearly admissible, it is not conclusive either upon the jury or the trial court, which has "the unquestioned power to fix the amount to be allowed for attorneys' fees, without, and independent of, expert testimony." Estate of Dorland, supra; Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 307, 104 P. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49; Zimmer v. Kilborn, 165 Cal. 523, 525, 132 P. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 368; Estate of Duffill, 188 Cal. 536, 552, 206 P. 42. See, also, Reid v. Warren Imp. Co., 17 Cal. App. 746, 748, 121 P. 694; and Kendrick v. Gould, 51 Cal. App. 712, 718, 197 P. 681.

[13] If the trial court may make such an appraisal and adjudication of value of such services, it must be presumed that appellate courts possess like power and ability so to do. In this cause the contract found to exist between the parties throws additional light on the value of such legal services. The contract provided that in the event of trial of the cause in the ordinary way, without regard to the result thereof, the compensation of the attorney was to be the additional sum of $250 in each case, or $500 as a total in both cases.

The court, after a consideration of the evidence, hereby makes additional and supplemental findings of fact as follows: That the reasonable value of the legal services performed by plaintiff below for the defendant between June 1, 1922, and November 1, 1922, was and is the sum of $850, and that the sum of $350 has been paid thereon and the balance due and unpaid on account of such services was and is the sum of $500.

[14] The judgment is general in its terms and could apply to either count. It may stand with proper modification when supported by the finding here made as to the issues under the second count, and a reversal becomes unnecessary.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be modified so as to read as follows:

"It is ordered and adjudged that plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendant the sum of $500, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. from November 1, 1922, together with his costs and disbursements expended in this action, which are hereby fixed at $13.10."

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, the appellant to recover his costs on appeal.

KIRK v. BOHLEN. (L. A. 10026.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1175(5)—Supreme court could render judgment in quantum meruit for attorney's services, where evidence failed to support trial court's judgment on contract (Const. art. 6, § 4¾; Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

Where evidence failed to support cause of action by attorney for legal services on count in special assumpsit on contract, but sustained count in quantum meruit on same transaction for same amount, and no findings of fact as to reasonable value of such services were made by trial court under second count, Supreme Court, under Const. art. 6, § 4¾, and Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, was authorized to make findings of fact on count in quantum meruit and to enter judgment for reasonable value of services rendered prior to wrongful discharge.

2. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1122(2)—Judgment for legal services held applicable to counts on contract or quantum meruit, and could stand under modified findings by Supreme Court (Const. art. 6, § 4¾; Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

In action by attorney for legal services based on count in special assumpsit on contract and on count in quantum meruit for same amount, judgment for attorney for full amount claimed could apply to either count, and could stand under modified findings of fact by Supreme Court, authorized by Const. art. 6, § 4¾, and Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as to reasonable value of services rendered, though trial court's finding based on contract was unsupported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Wally A. Kirk, executrix of the estate of E. E. Kirk, against Ovid L. Bohlen, sued as Ovid D. Bohlen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion 257 P. 463.

Ray W. Bruce, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William A. Schreider, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff below, respondent's testate, an attorney at law, was employed by defendant below and one B. F. Culley to perform legal services for said parties in connection with certain criminal charges filed against them. At the time of employment defendant and said Culley each paid plaintiff a fee of $350, but later, and prior to dismissal of the charges against them, they dispensed with his services, whereupon he brought this action to recover from defendant an alleged balance of $1,000 due him under his contract of employment, and brought a like action against said Culley for recovery of the same sum. The pleadings in the two actions are practically identical, and in the court below said actions were consolidated and heard on the same evidence. Kirk v. Culley (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 994.

At the conclusion of plaintiff's case defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground of material variance between the evidence adduced and the cause of action pleaded. This motion was denied. Some evidence was later introduced by defendant, but nothing appeared to change the facts upon which the claim of variance was predicated. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in both cases, and defendants appealed under the alternative method.

[1] Upon the same grounds and for all the reasons set forth in said case of Kirk v. Culley, supra, the court in this cause holds that the evidence received and findings made thereon do not support the cause of action made by count 1 of the complaint in special assumpsit on the contract of employment, but as to the second count in quantum meruit on the same transaction and for the same amount a proper cause of action is set forth. The record is complete as to the services rendered by the attorney, plaintiff below, prior to his wrongful discharge by defendant, but no findings of fact as to the reasonable value of such services were made by the trial court under said second count. Findings upon this subject will place the cause in proper condition for this court to make or direct the judgment to be entered therein. After a consideration of the evidence and by reason of the authority conferred upon it by section 4%, art. 6 of the Constitution, and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, this court therefore makes the following additional and supplemental findings of fact:

That the reasonable value of the legal services performed by plaintiff below for defendant between June 1, 1922, and November 1, 1922, was and is the sum of $850, and that the sum of $350 has been paid thereon, and the balance due and unpaid on account of such services was and is the sum of $500.

[2] The judgment is general in its terms and could apply to either count. It may stand with proper modification when supported by the finding here made as to the issues under the second count, and a reversal becomes unnecessary.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be modified so as to read as follows:

"It is ordered and adjudged that plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendant the sum of $500, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. from November 1, 1922, together with his costs and disbursements expended in this action, which are hereby fixed at $13.10."

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, the appellant to recover his costs on appeal.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; SEAWELL, J.

NELSON v. NELSON. (L. A. 8877.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1927.

1. Limitation of actions $\S$ 148(4)—"Acknowledgment of debt," sufficient to toll limitations statute, must be unqualified admission of debt, which party is liable for and willing to pay (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

Acknowledgment of debt, in contemplation of Code Civ. Proc. § 360, relating to acknowledgments or promises sufficient to take case out of operation of statute of limitations, must be direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of debt for which party is liable and willing to pay.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Acknowledgment.—Acknowledgment.]

2. Limitation of actions $\S$ 148(4)—Letter referring to assistance rendered writer by plaintiff and expressing intention to repay plaintiff, not admitting debt, held insufficient to toll limitation statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

Letter written by deceased's brother to plaintiff, referring to certain assistance rendered by plaintiff, and expressing an intention on his part sooner or later that plaintiff should be repaid, containing no admission or statement as to nature of assistance rendered, and whether or not it resulted in any obligation of financial nature due from deceased, held insufficient acknowledgment of debt, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, to take case out of operation of statute of limitations.

3. Limitation of actions $\S$ 196(4)—Where purported written acknowledgment of debt contains no mention of indebtedness, parol evidence is inadmissible to alter terms of acknowledgment or vary its meaning (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

When purported written acknowledgment of indebtedness, which it is claimed tolls statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, contains no mention of any indebtedness whatever, parol evidence may not be introduced to alter terms of acknowledgment or vary its meaning, and thereby import into it something not otherwise contained therein.

4. Executors and administrators $\S$ 221(4)—To enforce stale claim against decedent's estate, evidence as to acknowledgment tolling limitations must be clear and convincing.

Enforcement of stale claims against estates of deceased persons is not looked on with favor by courts, and, in order for plaintiff in such proceeding to succeed, his case should be most clear and convincing.

5. Limitation of actions $\S$ 148(4)—Plaintiff's claim for \$8,000 for services rendered brother over 50 years before brother's death held not sufficiently established by pleadings setting forth deceased's letter to plaintiff.

Plaintiff's claim against deceased brother's estate for $8,000 for services rendered brother over 50 years before his death held not sufficiently established by pleadings setting forth letter by deceased referring to assistance rendered him by plaintiff, and expressing intention to repay plaintiff, and demurrer was properly sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action for services by Andrew J. Nelson against Louise M. Nelson, as the executrix of the last will and testament of, and the estate of, Arthur P. Nelson, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney and John L. Campbell, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

McNabb & McCloskey, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action against an estate to recover for services claimed to have been rendered by plaintiff at the special instance and request of the deceased. There were two demands set up in the fourth amended complaint, under which the proceedings involved herein were had. One was for services rendered between the years 1866 and 1876, and the other for services rendered prior to the year 1894. For the purpose of avoiding the statute of limitations, plaintiff set forth in his said pleading a letter, dated February 20, 1920, alleged to have been written from San Diego, Cal., by deceased to plaintiff, who was his brother, which letter contained the following statement:

"Now, Andrew, we have been wondering if there was anything that we had or had not done, or if there was anything that had been written, that was displeasing to you. We sincerely hope not. Surely there was nothing of the kind ever intended, for you and our brother Lafagat, long since passed on, are the only persons that were of any real assistance to us in my struggle, which came on at and after the death of our father, and sooner or later I fully intend that you shall be amply repaid."

The defendant demurred to this fourth amended complaint on a number of grounds, among which was that the causes of action set forth therein were barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer was sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment was accordingly entered in favor of defendant.

[1, 2] The writing was insufficient to avoid the statute. Section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby."

The acknowledgment of a debt in contemplation of this statute must be a direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of the debt for which the party is liable and willing to pay. McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 95 Am. Dec. 170; Powell v. Petch, 166 Cal. 329, 331, 136 P. 55; Clunin v. First Federal Trust Co., 189 Cal. 248, 252, 207 P. 1009.

In the letter written by deceased to his brother there is no direct unqualified admission of any debt. He refers to certain "assistance" rendered by the plaintiff and his brother, and expresses an intention on his part sooner or later that plaintiff be repaid. There is no admission or statement as to the nature of the assistance rendered, and whether or not it resulted in any obligation of a financial nature due from the deceased. It is just as reasonable to suppose that this assistance consisted of certain acts of kindness or helpfulness which the brothers had rendered to the deceased during his struggle after their father's death, and which the latter at some time intended to repay.

[3] Appellant contends that, where the acknowledgment is uncertain as to the particular indebtedness to which it refers, parol evidence is admissible to explain this uncertainty, and to identify the indebtedness intended to be acknowledged. We may concede this to be true, but, when the acknowledgment contains no mention of any indebtedness whatever, we know of no authority, and appellant has called our attention to none, which will permit the introduction of parol evidence to alter the terms of the acknowledgment or vary its meaning and thereby import into it something not otherwise contained therein. The amount of the indebtedness claimed by plaintiff was $8,000, besides interest, a large portion of which it is claimed was for services rendered over 50 years prior to the date of the decedent's death. It hardly seems reasonable or probable that an indebtedness in this amount and of this character should have existed for so long a period of time between these brothers without some more authentic evidence of its authenticity other than the letter of February 20, 1920. It is also inconceivable that the plaintiff, during the lifetime of his brother, should have refrained from making any attempt to collect the money due him, but that immediately upon his brother's demise he takes steps to reduce to judgment his claim of over 50 years' standing.

[4, 5] The enforcement of stale claims against estates of deceased persons is not looked upon with any great degree of favor by the courts, and, in order for the plaintiff in such a proceeding to succeed, his case should be most clear and convincing. No such a case has been made out by the plaintiff's pleadings, and in our opinion the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

STANTON et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT WITHIN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 9795.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Action $\S$ 48(1)—Where actions arise from same transaction and obligation, there is but one cause of action.

Where two actions were brought and cause of action in each arose out of one and the same transaction and obligation, there was but one cause of action.

2. Action $\S$ 48(1)—Actions based on same cause of action may be consolidated (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1048).

Where cause of action is single, separate actions based thereon are susceptible of consolidation, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1048.

3. Action $\S$ 59—After consolidation of cases, court should not make separate findings or judgment.

Where two actions based on same cause of action were consolidated, they should have been determined with single set of findings and single judgment.

4. Certiorari $\S$ 64(1)—Where separate findings and judgment appeared in consolidated cases, reviewing court will consider case as though there were single set of findings and single judgment.

Where, after consolidation of cases, court rendered two judgments and made separate findings, reviewing court will consider case as though there were single set of findings and single judgment; lower court's action being at most misprision or inadvertence.

5. Judgment $\S$ 301, 345—Single judgment in consolidated cases may be interfered with only by new trial or appeal and not by amending or vacating judgment (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, 663, 663a).

Single judgment rendered in consolidated cases held not to be interfered with, except by motion for new trial and appeal; there being no grounds on which to assert court's power to amend judgment to speak truth, nor for proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, or sections 663, 663a, authorizing setting aside of judgment when erroneous conclusions not consistent with findings are shown.

6. Judgment $\S$ 356—Statute, authorizing setting aside of judgment where conclusions are inconsistent with findings, held not to authorize attack on findings of fact (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 663, 663a).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 663, 663a, authorizing setting aside of judgment and entry of another where incorrect conclusions are not consistent with findings, do not authorize attack on findings of fact.

7. Certiorari $\S$ 5(1)—Orders and judgments not conforming to rules of procedure held not appealable, as regards right to writ of review (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 663a).

Orders and judgments which fail to conform to any of the rules of procedure cannot be said to be appealable, under Code of Civ. Proc. $\S$ 663a, as regards right to writ of review.

8. Appeal and error $\S$ 82(3)—Orders and judgments vacating judgments and entering others held not "special orders after final judgment," within meaning of statute relative to appeals (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 963).

Orders and judgments vacating judgment and entering other and different judgments in lieu thereof held not "special orders made after final judgment," within meaning of Code of Civ. Proc. $\S$ 963, relative to appeals.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Special Order.]

9. Judgment $\S$ 336—Orders and judgments vacating judgments and entering others held void, under rule that litigation must not be piecemeal.

Orders and judgments vacating judgments and entering other and different judgments in lieu thereof held void, under rule that litigation must not be piecemeal, where several orders were made over period of time.

Applications by Fannie Stanton, as executrix of the estate of A. A. Stanton, deceased, and another, for a writ of review to annul orders and judgments of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Hugh J. Crawford, Judge. Orders and judgments annulled.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, 253 P. 973.

A. W. Sorenson and Kemper B. Campbell, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Montgomery, Stick, Moerdyke & Gibson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. In November, 1925, Anna Graziade Alvarado and William P. Alvarado commenced action No. 182980 in respondent superior court against A. A. Stanton, Fannie Stanton, his wife, et al., the complaint alleging their ownership of certain real property theretofore leased to defendant A. A. Stanton for oil-drilling purposes, failure of defendants to perform the conditions of such lease, and its termination. The prayer was in ejectment, seeking recovery of possession of the land by plaintiffs and damages resulting from the withholding thereof by Stanton. The two defendants Stanton answered and also filed a cross-complaint alleging that they were lawfully in possession of and entitled to retain 20 acres of said property under the terms of an executed oral agreement with plaintiffs, which agreement said plaintiffs had failed and refused to perform, thereby damaging cross-complainants in the sum of $100,000, for which amount they prayed judgment.

In March, 1926, the same plaintiffs commenced action No. 191794 in the same court against the same defendants for the purpose of quieting title to said property. Defendants Stanton filed an answer, pleading as a special defense the pendency of the above-described prior action, and again asserted a leasehold interest in said 20 acres.

[1] It was subsequently stipulated by the respective counsel and ordered by the trial court that the cross-complaint and answer thereto in the first action should serve as such in both causes and said causes were consolidated and tried together. At the conclusion of the trial, respondent judge made a minute order announcing judgment, which read, in part, as follows:

"Causes are argued and judgment ordered for defendants for $15,000 and specific performance."

He subsequently signed and had filed in each case separate findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment, in case 182980 decreeing that defendant Stanton hold and retain said 20 acres of land; that he be paid $15,000 as damages; and that plaintiff specifically perform the oral agreement. In case 191794 he found that another suit was pending between the same parties, involving the same cause of action, and decreed that plaintiffs pay to defendant Stanton $15,000 in damages and that they specifically perform the verbal lease. The cause of action arose out of one and the same transaction and obligation and was, therefore, but one cause of action. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 426, 64 P. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53. The conclusions of law and judgments were the same and the findings were substantially identical and each covered all the issues involved in the two actions. The chief and only practical difference is the finding in the second action that another action is pending involving the same issues.

In due time following the entry of the two judgments, to wit, July 1, 1926, plaintiffs in each suit separately gave notice of motion to vacate the judgment and for entry of a new and different judgment, upon the ground that "said judgment is in conflict with the findings of fact made by the court, and is inconsistent with and not supported by the said findings of fact" in the following particulars:

"(1) That said judgment contains a lease set forth therein in full, many of the terms of which are not set forth or provided for in the said findings of fact; (2) that said judgment in setting out said lease in full attempts to make a lease for defendants and cross-complainants by order of court, which is against the rules of equity; (3) that said judgment sets forth a lease in full which has not been found by the court to be the lease to which reference is made in the findings of fact; (4) that said judgment attempts specifically to enforce performance on the part of the plaintiffs and cross-defendants of a lease not referred to and provided for in the findings of fact; (5) that said judgment attempts to compel the specific performance on the part of the plaintiffs and cross-defendants of a lease, the terms of which are set forth in the judgment and have not been found by the court to be the lease referred to and provided for in the findings of fact;

(6) that said judgment attempts to compel specific performance of the said lease set forth in said judgment, the terms, covenants, and conditions of which are not provided for in the findings of fact; (7) that said judgment set forth a restraining order and an injunction against the plaintiffs and cross-defendants, and that there is no provision in said findings of fact for such injunction or restraining order; (8) that said judgment is against law."

Said motions were presented together on July 21, 1926, and granted on July 30, 1926. On the latter date the following minute order was made in case 182980:

"Motion to vacate judgment having been heretofore made and submitted, it is now by the court granted and judgment is ordered, vacated, annulled, and set aside and stricken from the judgment roll."

A minute order was also made in case 191794, which read as follows:

"Motion to vacate judgment having been heretofore made and submitted, it is now by the court hereby granted and judgment is vacated, annulled, and set aside and stricken from the judgment roll and in lieu of judgment so vacated and in lieu of judgment vacated in case No. 182980, it is hereby adjudged and decreed that defendants and cross-complainants have and recover from plaintiffs and cross-defendants $7,500 (seventy-five hundred dollars) as damages, and total term of lease shall be for 17 years and 4 months."

Thereupon the following formal order, also dated July 30, 1926, was made:

"No. ~~182980~~ 191794. Order Vacating and Setting Aside Judgment Rendered. * * * Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, * * * that the said motion is hereby granted and said judgment heretofore signed by the court and filed in the above-entitled action * * * be, and the same is hereby vacated, annulled, and set aside and stricken from the judgment roll in said action. * * *

"A similar order in case No. 191794, same title. * * * It is further ordered that in lieu of the said judgments vacated and set aside it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said defendants and cross-complainants do have and recover of and from the said plaintiff and cross-defendant the sum of $7,500 as damages. It is further ordered * * * that the total term of the said lease herein shall be for 17 years and 4 months. The attorney for said plaintiff is hereby ordered to prepare a judgment in accordance herewith."

It appears that counsel for plaintiffs did not prepare a judgment, but that counsel for petitioner herein prepared two new judgments, one in each case, and two "Orders Directing Entry of New Judgment," and presented them ex parte to respondent judge, who thereupon, on the 8th day of September, 1926, signed both of said orders and both of said judgments and the judgments were thereafter entered. The wording of both orders directing entry of new judgment is as follows:

"Whereas, a judgment in the above-entitled action was duly and regularly entered on the 18th day of July, 1926, * * * and whereas, on or about the 30th day of July, 1926, the court duly and regularly made its order vacating and setting aside said judgment on motion of the said plaintiffs, which motion was duly heard and filed in said action, and whereas, by said motion the plaintiffs move for an order directing the entry of another judgment in addition to the motion to vacate said judgment, and the court being duly advised, and after having considered the same, does hereby grant said motion for an order directing the entry of another judgment, and in accordance herewith, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be entered in said action a judgment, a copy of which is hereto attached."

The new judgment in action 182980 decreed that plaintiffs' title be quieted to all of the property, except 20 acres constituting the verbal leasehold interest of Stanton and that plaintiffs specifically perform the verbal agreement. The new judgment in action 191794 decreed that plaintiffs specifically perform the verbal agreement and that defendants and cross-complainants Stanton have and recover from plaintiffs and cross-defendants the sum of $7,500 as damages, less the amount of a counterclaim for $850, "being a counterclaim hereby allowed in favor of said plaintiffs and cross-defendants against defendants and cross-complainants and each of them, to wit, the sum of $6,650." The findings of fact and conclusions of law in each case were allowed to stand as originally made.

Upon death of defendant A. A. Stanton, his widow, Fannie Stanton, as executrix of his estate, was substituted in his stead, and she, individually and as such representative, instituted these proceedings, which were by stipulation of the parties consolidated herein, seeking to have reviewed and annulled the said orders and judgments above set forth.

The differences between the original judgments and the two purported new judgments are substantially as follows: In the original judgments, the term of lease, the specific performance of which is decreed, is 16 years, 2 months, and 18 days, to wit, from June 29, 1925, to September 17, 1941, together with an additional term of 20 years commencing September 17, 1941, and ending September 16, 1961. In the new judgments, the latter 20 years of this period is eliminated. In the original judgments damages to cross-complainants are fixed at $15,000, whereas in one of the new judgments no damages are specified and in the other they are fixed at $7,500, less an offset of $850. The term of lease and damages stated in the findings are identical with the provisions of the original judgments.

[2, 3] It abundantly appears from the record that the cause of action was single and hence that the actions were susceptible of consolidation under section 1048 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that such consolidation was in fact made by order of the court on stipulation of the parties. Viewing that situation, the two actions became one action, and therefore should have been determined with a single set of findings and a single judgment. "After a consolidation the court should not make separate findings for each cause nor render a separate judgment for each plaintiff, for the finding and judgment upon an issue operates in favor of all of the plaintiffs in the same manner as if they had originally joined as plaintiffs in bringing the action." 1 Cal. Jur. § 51, p. 374.

"The provision of section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing such consolidation, is placed in the same category with that permitting the several claimants to join as plaintiffs in one action; and after the order of consolidation had been made, the court should thereafter have treated the actions as a single action by the respective plaintiffs against the defendants, and embodied its decision in a single set of findings, upon which a single judgment should have been entered." Willamette, etc., Co. v. College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 232, 29 P. 629, 630.

"Upon the consolidation of the several actions there was presented only a single action by the respective plaintiffs against the defendants, and the decision thereon was to be made as if the cause of action had been presented in a single complaint, and was to be embodied in a single set of findings in which all facts in issue in the consolidated action were to be incorporated. Willamette Co. v. College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 P. 629. This issue affected the rights of each of the plaintiffs, and its presentation in any of the original complaints became an issue in the consolidated action, and the finding and judgment thereon operated in favor of all of the plaintiffs in the same manner as if they had originally joined as plaintiffs in bringing the action with this averment in their complaint." Union Lumber Co. v. Simon, 150 Cal. 751, 762, 89 P. 1077, 1080. See, also, Coghlan v. Quarataro, 15 Cal. App. 662, 115 P. 664; Tyler v. J. I. Mitrovich Bldg. Co., 47 Cal. App. 59, 190 P. 208; Olson-Mahoney Lumber Co. v. Dunne Investment Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 159 P. 178.

It is evident that the court so intended by the use of these words in its minute order:

"Causes argued and judgment ordered for defendants for $15,000 and specific performance."

This fact is also evidenced by the finding as follows:

"That it is true that there was at the commencement of this action, and still is, another action pending in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, being case No. 182980, filed November 9, 1925, between the same parties, and for the same cause of action as in the complaint herein alleged."

[4] The fact that there is a duplicate set of findings, duplicate conclusions of law, and duplicate judgments is at most but a misprision or inadvertence of the court. We therefore have concluded that the record abundantly supports the conclusion that in reality there is here presented but one set of findings of fact and but one set of conclusions of law and but one judgment. Cross-complainants should not desire more and plaintiffs under the court's conclusion cannot expect less.

[5] Treating the findings as one and the judgments as one, made in the consolidated cause, our path is illuminated as we travel through the mazes that are to follow. Treating the judgments as one precludes any right to interfere therewith in any other manner than by the ordinary procedure of motion for new trial, and, if unsuccessful, to review the action had by appeal. There are under this interpretation no grounds upon which to assert the inherent power of the court to amend or correct the judgments to speak the truth, for the judgment in that event would literally speak the truth. Nor is there in such case any excuse for a proceeding under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is still less reason for a proceeding under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is no inconsistency between the conclusions of law and findings of fact nor between the judgment and conclusions of law or findings of fact. Any attack on this judgment, as a single and sole disposition of all the issues other than proceedings on new trial, is wholly unwarranted from every possible view. Notwithstanding this fact, we find repeated orders and purported judgments attempting to wear away and erode the judgment by alien processes. Treating the two motions as a single motion, attacking a single judgment, we at once can see it to be unauthorized by sections 663 and 663a by which it is sought to be sustained. These sections authorize the setting aside of a judgment by the court which rendered it and the entry of another and different judgment when incorrect or erroneous conclusions of law not consistent with nor supported by the findings of fact are shown, in which case, after the judgment is set aside, the conclusions of law shall be amended as corrected.

[6] It is further provided by said sections that the party intending to make such a motion must, within ten days after the notice of entry of judgment, serve on the adverse party and file with the clerk of the court a notice of his intention designating the grounds upon which and the time at which the motion will be made and specifying the particulars in which the conclusions of law are not consistent with the findings of fact. The notices before us set forth no particulars wherein the conclusions of law or judgments do not follow logically from the findings of fact. In fact, the conclusions of law are not attacked and are not even so much as mentioned in the notices. Likewise the notices give no indication of the judgment or judgments sought to be substituted for the original judgment entered. Neither do they contemplate an order contemporaneously given vacating the judgment and establishing a new one in its stead. Nor do they contemplate an order entering a new judgment as an integral part of the order vacating the old one. None of the proceedings taken and none of the orders in question can properly be identified as procedure authorized by or contemplated by said sections of the Code. The limits set by these sections cannot be transgressed. The sections in no case authorize an attack upon the findings of fact and this is the essence of the attack attempted here. In Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 324, 327, 107 P. 616, 619, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Angelotti, said:

"Section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes simply the substitution of the judgment that should have been given as a matter of law upon the findings of fact in a case where the judgment already given is an incorrect conclusion from such findings. The court cannot on such a motion in any way change any finding of fact. The sole remedy in the trial court of a party who is aggrieved by any finding of fact is a motion for a new trial."

In Hole v. Takekawa, 165 Cal. 372, 375, 376, 132 P. 445, 446, the limits of said sections were again set, the court saying:

"As applied to a judgment based upon findings of fact made by a trial court, the sections simply authorize a motion to vacate the judgment to make it and the conclusions of law consistent with and supported by the findings of fact, and do not authorize any change in any finding of fact. 'Section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes simply the substitution of the judgment that should have been given as a matter of law upon the findings of fact in a case where the judgment already given is an incorrect conclusion from such findings. The court cannot on such a motion in any way change any finding of fact. The sole remedy in the trial court of a party who is aggrieved by any finding of fact is a motion for a new trial.' Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 324, 327, 107 P. 616, 619. The only mode under our system by which findings of fact may be disturbed by the trial court after they have been filed and judgment has been entered thereon, 'except perhaps in respect of a mere clerical error or misprision,' is by the granting of a new trial. Hawxhurst v. Rathgeb, 119 Cal. 531, 51 P. 846, 63 Am. St. Rep. 142; Los Angeles County v. Lankershim, 100 Cal. 532, 35 P. 153, 556; Pico v. Sepulveda, 66 Cal. 336, 5 P. 515. The order of December 16, 1911, purporting to change one of the findings of fact, was therefore ineffectual for any purpose. It, of course, in no way affected the judgment given and entered long prior thereto, and no new findings or judgment could be legally filed or made."

[7] Counsel for respondents, however, urge with much earnestness, the contention that the writ of review will not lie in this case because of the existence of the right of appeal under section 663a. As above stated, these purported orders and subsequent purported judgments are hybrids in our procedure. Orders and judgments which fail to conform to any of the rules of procedure cannot be said to be appealable under section 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Fountain Water Co. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 648, 652, 73 P. 590, the court on October 29, 1901, settled, allowed, and certified a statement of appeal. Later, on May 12, 1902, it undertook to cancel and annul said order and amend the said statement. This order was annulled on certiorari, the court saying:

"It is objected that this court should not entertain this application because the petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law by appeal. We are unable to agree with counsel in this regard. An order granting an amendment to a statement upon motion for a new trial is not an appealable order (Yerian v. Linkletter, 80 Cal. 137 [22 P. 70]); and this is true whether the amendment is made on application of counsel or on the court's own motion. Neither is an order settling a statement appealable. Henry v. Merguire, 106 Cal. 145 [39 P. 599]."

The situation here is not unlike in principle to the case of Diamond v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 732, 739, 740, 210 P. 36, where the court granted a new trial upon a ground unknown to the law. The order was annulled on certiorari, the court saying:

"The respondent had jurisdiction to determine the motion for a new trial, but the exercise of its power to grant the motion was limited to the grounds specified in the statute. When it granted the new trial for a cause not so designated it acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction, and beyond the scope of its power. Under such circumstances certiorari will lie. Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 529, 178 P. 143. The order granting a new trial is annulled."

On rehearing the court said:

"If the order granting the new trial had not shown on its face that it was denied on all the grounds mentioned in the notice of intention, and that it was granted solely on the ground that the court stenographer who took the testimony had died before the judgment and decision, the court would have had jurisdiction to grant the new trial. But since it did show that it was granted solely on a ground not covered by the statute, the court was acting beyond its jurisdiction. It is only for this reason that certiorari will lie."

[8] We are therefore satisfied that said sections of the Code were never intended to apply to orders or judgments attempted after the fashion herein disclosed. We are also satisfied that neither of these orders or subsequent judgments can be said to be special orders made after final judgment within the meaning of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because such section contemplates orders given by a court having jurisdiction to act.

[9] We are satisfied that the contention is sound; also that these orders and subsequent judgments are the result of repeated piecemeal attempts to act on the part of the court below and are void under the principles announced in Dolan v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 235, 240, 190 P. 469. This was a certiorari proceeding wherein the relief prayed for was granted, the court saying:

"The notice of motion is required to specify the particulars in which the conclusions of law are not consistent with the findings, and an order granting the motion may be reviewed on appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 663a. These Code provisions are consistent with the rule that litigation must not be piecemeal. If the original judgment is correct, the party in whose favor it was is entitled to have it enforced, and, if it is not supported by the findings, the other party is entitled to have another and correct judgment entered. In either case the loser is given the right of appeal. The Code sections do not permit two motions to be made, nor two orders, one setting aside the judgment and another at a later day directing the entry of a different judgment. If on the motion it appears to the court that the findings require the judgment to be set aside, it must also appear what conclusions of law should be made on the facts, and the only order within the power of the court under these circumstances is one setting aside the judgment and directing as a part of the same order the entry of another judgment. It is from such an order only that an appeal is provided. An order merely setting aside the judgment and leaving the case undetermined is void and not merely erroneous. Any other rule might lead to interminable delays and the loss of important rights by litigants. On such a motion the court has no power to consider or determine any matter except what judgment should be entered upon the facts as found."

See, also, to the same effect, Prothero v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 439, 238 P. 357.

To require review to be by appeal of every unauthorized order or judgment attacking the proceedings by which the regular judgment was given and made would seriously embarrass, if not destroy, the efficiency of our whole legal system.

The orders purporting to vacate the judgment, the orders directing the entry of different judgments in lieu thereof and all said last-named judgments following said orders are annulled.

NOYES et al. v. CHAMBERS & DE GOLYER et al. (Sac. 3802.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 488, 489(5)—Objections to improvement proceedings are waived if not seasonably and properly urged.

Objections to proceedings for assessment of property for public improvements, excepting those addressed to proceeding necessary to constitute compliance with due process clause, are waived if not seasonably and properly urged before local legislative body authorizing and directing such improvements.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 488, 489(6)—Property owners failing to object to improvement district after notice cannot, in suit to quiet title, collaterally attack assessment (Street Improvement Act 1911, $\S$ 16).

Property owners who were duly apprised of contemplated sewer improvements and extent of assessment district, and who failed to seasonably object to such improvement proceedings, are, under the Street Improvement Act 1911, (St. 1911, p. 730), $\S$ 16, precluded in a subsequent suit to quiet title from collaterally attacking the assessment imposed.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 488, 489(7)—Property owners failing to complain of imperfection in improvement work held precluded from objecting (Street Improvement Act 1911, $\S$ 26).

Under Street Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), $\S$ 26, property owners are precluded from urging as objection to validity of sewer improvement that certain house branches were not "plugged and capped" in accordance with specifications, where they did not, within 30 days after issuance of warrant for work, appeal to city council.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1050(1)—Admission of evidence as to reason for sewer improvement contractors' alleged failure to comply with specifications, even if error, held harmless, where improvement proceedings were no longer open to collateral attack.

Where property owners in suit to quiet title alleged that sewer improvement contractor did not plug and cap certain house branches as required by specification, admission of evidence that house branches had been connected with other sewers simultaneously constructed, even if error, was not prejudicial, where improvement proceedings were immune from collateral attack by property owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Charles Warren Noyes III and others against Chambers & De Golyer and others to quiet title, wherein defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Aitken & Aitken, of San Francisco, for appellant Charles Warren Noyes III.

Frank W. Aitken, of San Francisco, as guardian in pro. per.

Foltz, Rendon & Wallace, of Stockton, for appellant Dunn.

Daniel V. Marceau, of Stockton, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought by plaintiffs to quiet title to some 21 lots situate in the city of Stockton and to enjoin the defendants from asserting any adverse claim or interest therein. By way of answer and cross-complaint the defendants admit plaintiffs' title to the lots, but claim and assert certain street assessment liens thereon by virtue of an assessment for the cost of certain sewer improvements installed by defendants pursuant to proceedings under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730) and amendments thereto. The cross-complaint closed with a prayer that the said liens be foreclosed. After trial without a jury, the plaintiffs were adjudged to be the owners in fee simple and entitled to the possession of said 21 lots, subject to the lien of defendants upon each in the sum of $88.09, together with interest. As requested by defendants, provision was made in said judgment for the foreclosure of said liens.

The resolution of intention passed by the city council, and under which the work was done, declared, in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the Improvement Act, that the work was of more than local or ordinary public benefit. An assessment district was thereupon created and described therein and charged with the expense of the proposed improvement. As required, the resolution of intention also fixed a time and place for the interposition and hearing of objections or protests to the contemplated improvement. Provision was likewise made for the publication and posting of notice of the passage of said resolution of intention. Among other things, the trial court found that there had been legal and sufficient posting and publication of notice of the improvement proceedings. A finding was also made to the effect:

"That prior to the hour set in said resolution of intention for hearing objections to the proposed work, none of the owners of property liable to be assessed for said work made any written or any protest against the proposed work or the extent of the district to be assessed and for the cost and expenses of said work and improvement, or either."

These findings of the lower court are not assailed by the appellants.

It is urged, however, that the assessment upon the respective lots herein involved is void. This contention is founded upon the asserted invalidity of the improvement proceedings giving birth to such assessment. The appellants vigorously argue that the assessment district created by and described in the resolution of intention consisted of two separate and distinct sections of the city of Stockton which were improperly included in one district; that the sewer construction work performed in each of said sections of the district was peculiar thereto and without benefit to the other; that a portion of the work was wholly useless and not an "improvement" within the meaning of the act under which the same was performed; and that the specifications, descriptive of the improvement work, were uncertain and indefinite.

[1] We have grouped these several attacks upon the improvement proceedings for the reason that they may be considered and disposed of as a unit. This court has, upon many occasions, declared that objections to proceedings having for their purpose the assessment of property for proposed public improvements are waived if not seasonably and properly urged before the local legislative body authorizing and directing said improvements. Blake v. City of Eureka (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 945; Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 58, 186 P. 753; Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 357, 80 P. 81. It is true, however, that the decisions have steadfastly recognized that objections addressed to the proceeding constituting, or necessary to constitute, a compliance with the "due process" clause of the state and federal Constitutions are not waived by failure to urge the same before the legislative branch of the municipality wherein the improvement proceedings were had. Chase v. Trout, supra; Watkinson v. Vaughn, supra. With this exception to the general rule above announced we are not here concerned, for, as already indicated, the court below found that sufficient and legal notice of the improvement proceedings had been given and ample opportunity for the advancement and hearing of objections thereto provided. The provisions of the due process clause were therefore satisfied.

Section 16 of the Improvement Act of 1911 provides, in part, that:

"All objections to any act or proceeding occurring prior to the date of the first publication of the aforesaid notice of award, in relation to said improvement, not made in writing and in the manner and at the time aforesaid, shall be waived; provided, the resolution of intention to do the work has been actually published and the notices of improvement posted as provided in this act."

In discussing the waiver of objections not seasonably advanced before a city council, this court in the very recent case of Blake v. City of Eureka, supra, declared that:

"Plaintiffs cannot raise any objection in this action which they could have raised before the city council at the time provided by section 6 of said act for the hearing of protests, and which they failed to make by means of written protests filed as provided in said act."

That case, like the instant one, was concerned with the Improvement Act of 1911. That an objection to the extent or boundary of an assessment district is waived if not seasonably urged before the city council has been decided in the case of Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 696, 76 P. 661, 665, wherein it is stated:

"Under the Street Improvement Act the council has the power to declare the work to be of more than ordinary public benefit, and to make the assessment upon a district instead of upon the front foot plan. The same section gives the property owners the right to object to the boundaries of the district, and to a notice and hearing before the council upon that subject. Upon the same principles and authorities heretofore referred to in reference to the question of benefits, it must be held that the property owner, having this right, must avail himself of it, or be concluded by the decision of the council. It does not appear that any objection was made to the boundaries of the district, and hence it must be held that the decision of the council as to its extent was correct."

While the Improvement Act of 1911 was not there involved, the above reasoning is peculiarly pertinent to the instant cause. The opinion in the last cited case also declares:

"That where the property owner has an opportunity given him, under the prescribed proceedings, to appear and contest the question before the legislative body, the determination of that body on the subject of benefits is final, and that if he fails to appear he thereby admits the finality of the determination."

This latter declaration is approved in the case of Empire Securities Co. v. Matthews, 179 Cal. 240, 241, 176 P. 160.

The respective sections of the several improvement acts providing for the waiver of defects in proceedings thereunder, and the many decisions interpreting and upholding the same, find abundant support in reason, for, as stated in Haughwout v. Raymond, 148 Cal. 311, 312, 83 P. 53:

"Notwithstanding that the proceedings for street work and sewer work, like proceedings in taxation, are in invitum, and that therefore a fairly strict and accurate compliance with all the statutory requirements is necessary, this is the limit to which any court should be expected to go in disposing of the questions which are involved. The contractor who has honestly and substantially complied with his contract, of which the property owners have received and will continue to receive the benefit, is quite as much entitled to the protection of the law as are the property owners themselves, and, upon the other hand, an endeavor—even a successful endeavor—upon the part of the property owners to defeat the just claims of such a contractor by a resort to the extreme technicalities of the law can, upon the whole, operate only to the disadvantage of the property owners themselves, since it necessarily tends to increase the price at which any and all future contractors will be willing to engage in work, payment for which, after having been duly performed, is met by harassment and vexatious delay, with the prospect at the end of utter failure of recovery."

[2] As already stated, the appellants herein were duly and regularly apprised of the contemplated improvements and of the extent of the assessment district to be charged with the cost thereof. Having failed to seasonably protest and object to said proceedings they are now precluded in this suit to quiet title from collaterally attacking the assessment imposed by virtue thereof. This conclusion disposes of the several contentions above enumerated.

[3] The appellants' next contention touches upon an asserted change in the work while in progress. In this connection it may be said that the specifications, which were by reference and incorporation made a part of the resolution of intention, required that certain house branches or connections after installation be "plugged and capped." Appellants urge that said house branches were "plugged and capped" at but one end, the other end having been connected with sewers constructed by the city. That the appellants should urge as an objection to the validity of the improvement proceedings a variation in the work which must have resulted in a benefit rather than a detriment to the property owners is difficult to understand. The trial court found that respondents had "duly performed * * * the said work according to the specifications and the terms of said contract and with materials complying with said specifications, all under the direction and to the satisfaction of the city engineer of said city of Stockton." This finding has not been attacked by the appellants. In addition thereto, the court also found that more than 30 days had elapsed since the date of the issuance of the warrant for the work, and that appellants and all others interested therein had failed to appeal to the city council on account of any asserted imperfection in the work. Under section 26 of the Improvement Act the appellants are now precluded from urging the objection under consideration. The case of Jennings v. Le Breton, 80 Cal. 8, 11, 21 P. 1127, 1128, while considering the act of 1872, correctly declares:

"It seems to be well settled that the defendants had no other remedy for the alleged failure of the contractor to complete the work, or for misconduct of the superintendent of streets in approving or accepting the work before it was completed, than by appeal to the board of supervisors * * * and that by failing so to appeal, they waived the objections here made."

Moreover, in 2 Elliott on Roads and Streets, p. 895, § 718, it is stated:

"While it is true that the highway officers are bound, in general, to proceed in substantial accordance with their own order directing the improvement, still a slight deviation from it will not vitiate the proceedings unless it does the landowner some material harm. It is by no means every departure from the order or ordinance that will defeat the assessment, for, where no substantial injury is done to the property owners, the officers who made the order or enacted the ordinance may rightfully amend or change it. The public welfare and the interests of the landowners may often be promoted by some change, and the officers who made the original order ought to have some latitude allowed them so that they may be enabled to rectify mistakes or secure better results. The cardinal rule is that nothing shall be permitted that will tend to do harm to the property owners, but this salutary rule is obeyed rather than violated in permitting a change that is beneficial and it is not infringed by permitting changes that work no harm to the citizens."

In view of what has been said, we are of the opinion that the contention under consideration is without merit.

[4] It is next urged that the trial court erred in admitting certain evidence tending to establish that the city of Stockton had constructed certain sewers simultaneously with the performance of the work by respondents, and that certain of the house branches installed by respondents had been connected therewith. We are not prepared to declare this evidence immaterial to the issues involved in this action for the introduction thereof served to explain and account for the asserted noncompliance with and deviation from the specifications as regards the plugging and capping of the house branches. The connection of said house branches with the main sewer line obviated the necessity of such plugging and capping. However, even if it be assumed that such evidence was erroneously admitted, the error cannot be said to have been prejudicial to the appellants' cause and certainly would not warrant a reversal of the judgment in view of the conclusion that the improvement proceedings are now immune from collateral attack by said appellants. This latter reason applies also to the ruling of the trial court rejecting appellants' offer of testimony touching upon the knowledge of the public generally as regards the simultaneous construction by the city of said other sewers.

The final contention of appellants is to the effect that the lower court, under the findings made, was duty bound to enter judgment for them. With this contention we must also disagree. It is true that the findings relied upon in support thereof lend credence to certain of the allegations of appellants' answer to the cross-complaint; that is to say, the trial court found, among other things, that the work performed in each of the alleged sections of the assessment district was without benefit to the other, and that the plans and specifications of the work were, in part, uncertain and indefinite. The appellants have apparently overlooked the findings to the effect that the district did not consist of two separate and distinct sections of the city of Stockton, and that the cost of the said improvement work had been assessed upon each parcel of land in the district "in proportion to the estimated benefits to be received by each." Moreover, it will be remembered that the court also found that the appellants had failed to protest the proceedings or advance any objection to the work before the city council as required by law. We have already determined herein that, in the absence of such timely protest and objection, the appellants are now precluded from collaterally attacking the validity of the improvement proceedings and the legality of the resulting assessment. It follows, therefore, that the court below, under the findings made and the law applicable thereto, had no alternative but to enter judgment for the respondents.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GOODWIN. (Cr. 2974.)★

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1927.

1. Criminal law §940—Newly discovered evidence of defendant's whereabouts at time when, according to state's theory, he must have been elsewhere, held material.

In prosecution for murder, affidavits of absent witnesses as to whereabouts of defendant at time when, according to state's theory, he must have been elsewhere to have participated in crime, held material, requiring granting of new trial, where due diligence was used in obtaining such newly discovered evidence.

2. Criminal law §939(1)—As to new trial, particular circumstances must be considered in determining whether due diligence was used.

In determining whether due diligence was used by defendant seeking new trial, it is necessary to consider all facts of particular case, as question depends largely on particular circumstances of each case.

3. Criminal law §939(2)—Defendant, required to proceed to trial several days after obtaining new counsel, was not lacking in diligence in failing to obtain traveling witness, and witness, whose name he did not know, to rebut unexpected testimony of state's witness.

Defendant, accused of murder, who was required to go to trial several days after procuring physically infirm counsel, was not lacking in due diligence in failing to have present at trial witnesses as to his whereabouts at time of alleged commission of crime, where he did not know name of one witness, for whom he advertised, and the other was absent on theatrical circuit, and where defendant had no knowledge as to testimony of state's chief witness until time of trial.

4. Criminal law §939(2)—Refusal of new trial for newly discovered evidence of alibi of traveling actor and unidentified person held error.

In prosecution for murder, refusal of new trial for newly discovered evidence on issue of alibi, to contradict unexpected testimony of state's chief witness was abuse of discretion, where inability to have testimony at trial was due to necessity of advertising for one witness, whose name was unknown, and of securing presence of another absent on theatrical circuit.

5. Criminal law §778(11)—Instruction on defendant's flight held error, where defendant's departure several weeks after crime was in accordance with previously announced plans.

Where, before commission of alleged homicide, defendant informed persons interested that he was going to New York to try out a play, circumstance that he departed for New York for that purpose several weeks after commission of crime did not warrant instruction on question of defendant's flight, and charge permitting jury to consider flight as indication of defendant's guilty mind was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Philip A. Goodwin was convicted of murder in the first degree, with sentence of death, and he appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Rehearing denied; Waste, C. J., and Seawell and Shenk, JJ., dissenting.

Kitt Gould, of Clovis, and Cormac, Bolles & Surr, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment imposing upon him the death sentence after a jury had found him guilty of the murder of Joseph J. Patterson in Orange county, California. The information charged the defendant and one Allison Dewey, whose true name appears to be Gaines, with the crime. Separate trials were had; the defendant herein being first brought to trial, and the testimony of defendant Gaines being largely responsible for his conviction.

A charred and badly decomposed human body was found in an isolated spot in Santa Ana canyon on March 22, 1926, which was identified later, beyond a reasonable doubt, by means of portions of clothing, belt buckle, watch fob, and other trinkets, as the remains of Joseph J. Patterson. For the purpose of this appeal, we will state that it also appeared beyond reasonable doubt that deceased had received, in some manner, a blow on the back of the head, which broke the skull and was sufficient to have caused death, and that an attempt had been made to burn the body in the place where it was found. No eyewitness testified as to the killing. All the testimony was circumstantial, and the circumstances pointing directly and convincingly to the guilt of defendant were testified to by the codefendant, Gaines. This witness had served two sentences in the Utah state penitentiary and had pleaded guilty to a forgery charge in California. After he came to Los Angeles, Cal., in February, 1926, he appears to have engaged in no occupation, and his own account of his activities shows frequent use of assumed names, excessive drinking, brawls and fights at public dance halls, the cashing of checks, which, to say the least, he knew to be forged, if he did not himself forge them, and other matters not tending to inspire confidence in the truth of his testimony, especially when his own life was at stake in the event this crime was not fastened upon defendant Goodwin.

From the record it would seem that either one or the other of the defendants committed the crime charged. The defendant Goodwin tells a story which, if true, would exonerate him. He was subjected to a grilling cross-examination, and, as admitted by the district attorney in his remarks to the jury, every trick of cross-examination learned in 30 years' experience was tried upon him, and nevertheless his story did not weaken. In the language of the district attorney, defendant was "the worst man in cross-examination I have ever seen," and "I hadn't examined Philip A. Goodwin ten minutes before I knew as well as I know now that I would make no progress," and "I realized fully when I had met my Waterloo in cross-examination." It was a long, hard, grilling cross-examination, and the experience of ages has shown that this is usually the acid test of truth. On the other hand, the testimony of the codefendant Gaines is not only inherently improbable in numerous particulars, but the witness shows many unmistakable signs of indecision, uncertainty and evasion. No adequate idea of the false "ring" of this testimony, taken as a whole, can be given by a statement of portions of it. The record is voluminous, consisting of over 800 pages, and all parts must be fitted together for an impartial consideration of it. This cannot be done in this opinion, and we shall have to trace briefly merely the outlines of the two stories told by the codefendants.

For about a month before the crime was committed, which was fixed by the evidence as about March 14th or 15th, Gaines occupied a room in the house where Patterson lived in Los Angeles. Goodwin lived in the same block. Goodwin and Gaines had known each other in the Utah state penitentiary, where they were fellow prisoners, and had corresponded after their separation. Gaines came to Los Angeles in February, 1926, and Goodwin met him at the railway station and engaged a room for him in the rooming house where Patterson lived. Gaines and Patterson became friendly, and Patterson, who was engaged in buying and selling stocks, purchased some stock for Gaines and probably owned some himself, which he carried about with him. Patterson did not have much money. His bank balance showed a maximum of $200 during the period involved in this investigation. A check upon Patterson's bank account for $130 was forged by some one—either by Gaines or Goodwin, according to the story which we accept. And it is pertinent to inject here the statement that the Attorney General concedes upon this appeal, although at the trial it was contended otherwise by the prosecution, that this forgery was the work of Gaines. This check, payable to Samuel Reader, was indorsed with that name, confessedly by Goodwin, and was taken by Goodwin to a bank, together with $10 in cash, and deposited in an account opened in the name of Samuel Reader, apparently a fictitious person. This amount was later drawn out through checks signed by Goodwin with the name of Samuel Reader, which he had written on the signature card opening the account. We shall not go into the explanation made of this transaction by Goodwin, because, in our view of the record, it becomes immaterial at this time.

A few days after the transaction just narrated, the journey began on which Patterson met his death. Gaines says:

That Goodwin hired an automobile and invited Patterson and Gaines to accompany him on a trip to San Diego, and that the three started from Los Angeles on Saturday, March 13, 1926, to San Diego; that Gaines drove the car and Goodwin and Patterson sat in the rear; that at San Juan Capistrano Gaines was arrested for speeding; that Goodwin left the car and spoke to the policeman making the arrest, and signed the name of E. A. Cramer to the slip presented by the officer. The party then proceeded south, and toward evening invited a soldier, who was walking along the highway, to ride with them, and he rode with them to San Diego. The party stopped at a restaurant for food, and later left Goodwin at the Knickerbocker Hotel, with the understanding that the three would meet the following morning; that Gaines and Patterson then went to the Manhattan Hotel, each registering under an assumed name. Patterson and Gaines then went to a dance, where they did considerable drinking, and after the dance returned to their hotel. The following day they met Goodwin about noon as they were driving about the town, and he told them he had business to attend to, and asked them to meet him at the Knickerbocker Hotel at about 6 o'clock. Patterson and Gaines then drove around until the time indicated, and then returned to the Knickerbocker Hotel and met Goodwin. They had dinner together, and then went to a cigar stand and shook dice for cigars. They then drove to a filling station, and had the gasoline tank of the automobile filled. Goodwin suggested that it was a long way between towns and more gasoline might be needed, and as the man at the station had nothing in which to place additional gasoline Gaines "went across the street from the filling station and bought a can" at a second-hand store. This five-gallon can was half filled with gasoline and placed on the floor of the rear of the car. Goodwin then asked Gaines if he had any liquor, and, when Gaines replied that he did not, Goodwin gave Gaines $5 with which to purchase liquor, with the statement that it would be chilly on the return trip. Gaines purchased two pints of whisky from a sailor and the three men started to Los Angeles. At the request of Goodwin, one bottle of liquor was handed to him. Gaines did not know the roads, and Goodwin announced that they would return over a route different from the one on which they had traveled to San Diego. He then directed the driver, and he, following directions, reached Escondido about midnight, where they stopped for food. They then returned to the automobile and "rode along on the road a long time, and then Goodwin says that it was the wrong road and we would have to turn around and go back." Gaines then turned around and went back to where he had "turned on that road and started out again." Patterson at that time was not "very drunk"; he did not show the effect of liquor "very much." On the new road they stopped a "couple of times."

Gaines does not remember whether or not they passed through any towns. Goodwin asked Gaines several times if he was all right. Gaines "had to get up close to the windshield to look through to stay on the right-hand side of that mark," because, according to his testimony, "I was pretty full, and I couldn't hardly stay on the right-hand side of the road. I would have to get up close to the windshield to see that I was on the right-hand side of the mark or not, and I got over it, I guess, quite a few times." And now it is about 7 o'clock, "the sun was up, or just coming up, anyway; it was light and you could see all over." And Goodwin said Patterson was pretty drunk, and he did not intend to go back with him in that condition, and he said he knew some people down there a ways from where we were, and he was going to take him over and sober him up before we took him back. And they came to "where you could see a gate a little ways before you got to it," and Goodwin said, "We will turn into that gate," and Gaines pulled up to the gate and stopped, and Goodwin got out and opened the gate. What followed, we shall set out in Gaines' own words:

"I guess we was about half way between the gate and where we stopped down there, and he says: 'You can't get clear over in the car, because there is a footbridge.' You could see the houses plain; there was a couple of houses over here some place (referring to photograph), * * * and we got down to a place in there, and it was a sort of a bare spot—there ain't no grass on it. It was sand, * * * and we turned to the right, and when I turned to the right I stopped, or he said, 'Stop,' and I started to get out. * * * And he said: 'Right about here is a footbridge; you can't drive over with a car;' and when I turned to the right and stopped I started to get out, and I said, 'Let me help you;' and he said, 'No; you go back and shut the gate, because the cows might get out.' * * * And he took the can and set it out just outside of the automobile, just away from the running board. * * * Goodwin set the can out, just alongside of the car, for a seat, he said, to sit Patterson on, and he helped Pat out, and set him on that can; * * * and I turned and drove the car up here, and turned around that way, and come right back by where we were, and got on this road that goes out to the gate. * * * I turned to the right, and turned around and went back to that road up to the gate. * * * He said, 'Wait at the gate;' Goodwin, he said, 'Wait at the gate,' until he hollered, and then I would know that he was ready to go back. * * * I drove up to the gate, and went outside the gate, and stopped, and shut the gate, and got back into the automobile, and set there with my feet up around the steering wheel * * * outside the fence. Well, I didn't know if I dozed off or not; but the next I noticed why Goodwin was coming through the fence—I don't know if he came through the fence or gate, but I heard the tin scratching on the wire, and I set up and looked, and he was coming to the car, and I asked him where Pat was." Goodwin had with him the five-gallon can. "I believe it was empty, * * * and I asked him where Pat was, and he said, 'Oh, God! don't discuss it; let's hurry away;' and I asked him again, and he said, 'I told you not to discuss it;' so I drove on down the canyon, and we crossed a bridge quite a ways after that, * * * and it was quite a ways after that that we crossed a kind of a long bridge, but there was no water in the bed, it was just dry, and he threw the can over the bridge, * * * and we went back to the place where he got the automobile."

In response to a question as to Goodwin's appearance when he first returned to the car, Gaines answered:

"Well, he was all nervous and worried and excited; * * * he was all nervous and upset, * * * and I guess a little further down this road, right about here, down the road further, I looked back in that direction and saw smoke coming up."

Gaines states that he had been drinking along the way from San Diego, and that Patterson had also been drinking, and, when asked whether or not Goodwin had been drinking, replied: "Well, I don't know as I seen him take a drink." According to Gaines:

"When he last saw Patterson, Patterson was pretty drunk. * * * He was sitting facing that way, sort of stooped over like that. * * * Goodwin was on the left-hand side of him, with his arm sort of around him."

Contrast with the foregoing Goodwin's story of the journey south, as follows:

Goodwin and Gaines started to San Diego in an automobile. They "picked up" a young man upon his signal at the first little town out of Los Angeles, and took him with them upon his request for a "lift." They stopped at Whittier for a few moments to interview a theater manager. (Goodwin had written several plays, had been an actor, and was at that time producing a play.) They drove to Fullerton, where Goodwin stopped to greet some friends, and then down through Anaheim, Santa Ana, and into San Juan Capistrano, where they were stopped by a traffic officer. Goodwin got out and talked to the officer, and the driver, Gaines, signed the "speed tag" presented to him by the officer. They then drove on without stopping until they came to the marine base, near San Diego, where the soldier or marine with them left the car. They drove to the Knickerbocker Hotel, and Goodwin got out, and Gaines said he would put the automobile in the garage and return. Goodwin could not be accommodated at the Knickerbocker, and tried another hotel without being able to secure accommodations, and finally secured a room at the Warren Hotel. After making his arrangements and leaving his baggage, he returned to the Knickerbocker Hotel to meet Gaines. Gaines wasn't there, and Goodwin went into the coffee shop of the hotel and had some food, and then walked to the Balboa Theater, and as he got there he met Gaines and Patterson and a man in sailor's uniform. Goodwin had met Patterson prior to this time in Los Angeles, and the two exchanged greetings. This was about 10 o'clock Saturday evening, March 13. Patterson and Gaines said they were going to a dance, and invited Goodwin to come with them, which invitation Goodwin declined. Gaines said he had missed Goodwin at the Knickerbocker Hotel. Gaines also said he was going to Tia Juana the following morning; that that was his main purpose in coming south, and he didn't know what time he would get back. Goodwin, who was a clergyman, stated that he would go to church in the morning, and after that to the hospital to see a friend—Kehler—and that he would come downtown about 1 o'clock. Gaines said he would meet him at that hour at the Knickerbocker Hotel. Goodwin then left Patterson and Gaines, and went to the Pantages Theater, and visited a young man who was working there and returned to his hotel about 11 o'clock and went to bed. On Sunday morning, March 14, Goodwin went to the All Saints Episcopal Church, and afterwards went to the Naval Hospital to visit George Kehler. After the visit Kehler decided to accompany Goodwin back to town, where they met Gaines in front of the Knickerbocker Hotel. They went to the coffee shop together and then went to the cigar stand and shook dice for cigars, and then got into the automobile and drove around to the beach and other places. Kehler left the automobile in front of the Balboa Theater, and Goodwin rode back to the Knickerbocker Hotel, reaching there about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Gaines said he was going back to Tia Juana. We continue the story in the language of Goodwin:

"I said, 'Well, what time will you be back here?' and he said, 'That I do not know.' 'Well,' I said, 'I understand the customs regulation closes the line at 9 o'clock; so you ought not to be very late. Will you be back to-night?' And he says, 'I guess so, if the line closes.' And I says, 'If you are coming to-night I won't register at the hotel for to-night. I will wait for you;' and he says, 'Wherever you want I will meet you.'" Goodwin then asked if Gaines knew where the Naval Y. M. C. A. was, and, upon being told he did not, Goodwin pointed it out to him. It was arranged that Gaines would meet Goodwin there and Gaines drove away. "He said he was going back to Tia Juana—that he had left Mr. Patterson in Tia Juana, and he was going back; and I asked him if he was going to bring Patterson back, and he said, 'That I don't know; if he wants to come, all right; and, if he wants to stay with his other friends, all right.' * * * At 3:30 in the morning, I was sitting talking to some one in the lobby of the men's service room at the Y. M. C. A., and I kept watching the road at all times, because I was where I could see all the cars coming down the street." At approximately 3:30 Gaines drove up. "I went down the steps and got in the car, and we left for Los Angeles. * * * Mr. Gaines and myself. * * * Mr. Gaines and myself were alone on the return trip."

They returned to Los Angeles between 8:30 and 9 o'clock in the morning, and turned the automobile in, and Goodwin went home and to bed.

For the purpose of this appeal, the foregoing consideration of the evidence seems sufficient, without going into the mass of other evidence in the record regarding the handwriting and the effort to connect Goodwin with forgeries of the name of Patterson to stock certificates and checks. It may be conceded that there were certain financial transactions, which occurred both before and after the journey to San Diego, in which it appears that money and securities belonging to Patterson were obtained by one or the other, or both, of these codefendants, and which would tend to furnish a motive for the crime, and there were certain letters written by either or both of said codefendants, for the obvious purpose of explaining Patterson's failure to return to the place where he was living, and of delaying an investigation into his disappearance. During the trial it was evidently the theory of the prosecution that these letters, written apparently from San Diego and purporting to be signed by Patterson, were written and signed by Goodwin, and that the indorsements on the certificates of stock were also forged by Goodwin, and that the check for $130, which was used to open the Samuel Reader account, was also forged by Goodwin; the defendant Gaines, upon whom the prosecution relied to make out its case, having strenuously denied that he had written the name of Patterson on any of these instruments. However, the Attorney General now concedes that these forgeries were committed by Gaines, which concession puts a very different aspect upon the case made out by the prosecution and which was before the jury. And it is further admitted by the district attorney in his argument to the jury, and it is entirely clear from the record, that if Goodwin was in the Service Men's Y. M. C. A. at San Diego, as he states, until 3:30 in the morning of Monday, March 15, the story of Gaines, in so far as it is directed to the journey from San Diego to Los Angeles, is false in toto, and there is no evidence placing Goodwin at any time at or near the vicinity of the place where the body of Patterson was found. However, we are not passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, but we merely consider it in its bearing upon the motion for a new trial.

[1] A motion for a new trial was made upon the ground, among others, of newly discovered evidence. Among the affidavits filed in support of said motion was one by J. A. McKenzie to the effect that said McKenzie had been in the Service Men's Y. M. C. A. at San Diego on Sunday evening, March 14, and Monday morning, March 15; that between the hours of 12 o'clock midnight of Sunday, the 14th day of March, 1926, and 3:30 a. m. of Monday, the 15th day of March, 1926, the affiant talked with Philip A. Goodwin, who was dressed as a priest; that the said Goodwin gave affiant a card with the name printed thereon, Philip A. Goodwin; that, later, affiant saw pictures of said Goodwin in a Los Angeles newspaper, a copy of which is appended to the affidavit and made a part thereof, and affiant is positive that this is a picture of the same Philip A. Goodwin that he saw in said Y. M. C. A. in San Diego on the dates and at times mentioned.

It appears that defendant did not know the name of this man with whom he had talked while in Y. M. C. A. at San Diego, and had no means of finding him, except by advertising for him, and he had done this, and had received a response to the advertisement only after the verdict had been rendered against him. The trial court deemed this showing insufficient, because the advertising had not been started earlier. There were also other affidavits offered which tended to corroborate the defendant's story in many particulars.

Counsel for defendant begged for a continuance in order to present additional affidavits supporting the motion for a new trial. Defendant presented a telegram from Bangor, Me., in which it was stated that affidavits were in the mail by E. Stanley De Groot to the effect that defendant Goodwin was seen by affiant in the Pantages Theater at San Diego on Sunday evening, March 14, at a time when Gaines' testimony places him elsewhere. This affidavit, together with the McKenzie affidavit, would be material, and, if their recitals were true, it would have been impossible for defendant Goodwin to have participated in the crime as outlined by the chief witness for the prosecution. This corroborating testimony was, therefore, of the utmost importance, and of a character that might well change the result if a new trial were granted, and, unless the defendant was lacking in due diligence in not producing this evidence at the first trial, it should furnish ground for the granting of his motion for a new trial.

[2-4] In determining whether or not due diligence was used, it is necessary to consider all the facts of each particular case. In the instant case the record discloses that at the time of the trial Goodwin was without funds, and for some time was without an attorney. He was forced to ask for several continuances because the attorney he had engaged had declined to act without the payment of a fee, and Goodwin had been disappointed in securing the money for the fee. When it became necessary to obtain new counsel, the attorney who tried the case was brought in from another county, and arrived the evening before the day of the trial was to begin. He asked for a continuance of ten days or two weeks, claiming that he was unfamiliar with the case, and had not even examined the transcript of the evidence at the preliminary examination. The record shows that a continuance of but two days was given, and lack of preparation of counsel is manifest throughout the trial. The record discloses that this attorney was no nearly blind that he was compelled to rely upon his daughter to read, not only the transcript of the daily proceedings, but all the exhibits and documents offered at the trial, and he was also suffering from other physical infirmities of a most serious nature. He had little or no time to prepare for this lengthy trial, while the intensive preparation of the district attorney is shown in his careful and masterly handling of the prosecution. It is not surprising, therefore, that defendant Goodwin was unable to communicate with McKenzie, whom he did not know, nor to locate De Groot, who was on a theatrical circuit, and to have them present at the trial. On the other hand, it seems to us that the response of McKenzie to the advertisement in the paper, and the finding of De Groot through the theatrical booking agencies, was an extraordinary accomplishment under the circumstances.

Defendant stated to the court, and it appeared from the record, that he had been obliged to change attorneys several times, because those who had undertaken to represent him would not proceed without a retaining fee. Defendant claims to have depended upon one of these attorneys, perhaps without justification, to follow up information which defendant gave him, and communicate with witnesses, and to have found out, later, that nothing had been done. Eight months had passed since the events in question occurred, and defendant could not surmise what would be vital or necessary to his defense until Gaines had told his story. From the record it appears that defendant had no knowledge of what Gaines' testimony would be until it was given on the stand, and it was only at the close of the trial that he was handed a copy of the alleged written statement of Gaines, which he had made to the district attorney previous to the trial, and of which the district attorney had had the benefit in advance, as a basis for the prosecution. Under these circumstances, can it be said that there was a lack of due diligence in obtaining the evidence set forth in the affidavits? Due diligence depends largely upon the peculiar circumstances of each case, and in this case we think there was not such a lack of diligence as would warrant the denial of a motion for a new trial. While the exercise of discretion by a trial judge in granting or denying a new trial is rarely interfered with upon appeal, in this case the evidence offered being material and, under the circumstances, it not appearing that the defendant was lacking in diligence, we feel that the motion for a new trial should have been granted.

[5] The record also presents an additional reason for the reversal of this judgment. With a record as unconvincing against the defendant as the one in the instant case, any error in the matter of instructions or rulings upon evidence looms large. The trial court instructed the jury:

"That the people have offered evidence for the purpose of showing flight, and this evidence you shall not receive as a part of the criminal act itself; but if you should find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that there was a flight—that is, a leaving of the state of California—for the purpose of avoiding a prosecution, then you should receive the same only as an indication of a guilty mind, and the same is to be considered by you only as a circumstance to be weighed by you as tending in some degree (if there was such flight) to prove a consciousness of guilt."

There is no evidence in the record showing flight of the defendant. Long before the crime was committed he had been planning and discussing a journey to New York to "try out" a play which he had written, and which he had rehearsed and played in Los Angeles. The unidentified body of Patterson was found on or about the 23d day of March, 1926, and Gaines left Los Angeles the following day, apparently leaving no trace of his whereabouts. On April 6, or thereafter, Goodwin went to New York. He wrote to his friends from there, and told about the progress he was making with his play. He was presenting it publicly in New York and appearing in it. The circumstances surrounding flight are placed before a jury as admissions by acts tending to show guilt, and, assuredly, there was nothing in Goodwin's conduct with reference to his departure from Los Angeles and his subsequent whereabouts which would warrant any inference of a consciousness of guilt. In People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 117 P. 176, in considering an instruction similar to the one we are discussing, the court said:

"This court has for a long time discounted the giving of such instructions and has refused to reverse cases where they have been given only when it could be seen that the instruction did not work injury. Thus, where a defendant flees immediately after the crime has been committed with which he knows he is charged, and the reason for his flight remains unexplained, this court has, in effect, said that it would not reverse cases for an instruction in substance declaring to the jury that this evidence can be by them considered and given such weight as they thought fit as tending to indicate a guilty mind. * * * But this court, as has been said, has frowned upon the giving of any such instructions, because it is a clear invasion of the jury's province in weighing evidence and may work much injury and prejudice to a defendant's case. The instruction here given is typical. In the first place, it omits the essential qualifications that, where flight can be indicative of a guilty conscience, the defendant must know that he is charged with the crime.

"But, more important even than this, we have before us a case where the flight of the defendant was explained, where it was in evidence that he feared mob violence and fled to avoid it, and where it was in evidence that when away from the mob he was called upon to surrender, he promptly did so. Here, certainly, it was for the jury to determine what prompted the flight, and if it was prompted by fear of mob violence, as defendant says, then no element of guilty conscience entered therein. * * * Where flight is unexplained, the giving of such an instruction may be excused, though not justified, because it is within the power of the defendant to explain it and he has not done so; but where the defendant has given a full explanation of his flight it is for the jury to say whether that explanation is true or not, untrammelled by any instructions from the court to the effect that the evidence is to be weighed by them as indicative of guilt."

Considering the state of the record in the instant case, with its conclusive evidence that defendant gave information to every one interested that he was going to New York and his purpose in going there, long before the crime in question was committed; that he left Los Angeles weeks after the crime was committed, and when no shadow of an accusation had been made against him; that he announced his departure, and did not conceal his whereabouts, and engaged in the business upon which he had been planning to visit the metropolis—the instruction complained of is not based upon evidence before the jury and was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

There are other errors appearing in the record of more or less importance, which it is not necessary for us to discuss separately, as they will probably not arise upon a second trial. The matters we have discussed, in the light of the entire record, require a new trial.

The judgment is reversed with instructions to the trial court to grant the defendant's motion for a new trial.

NIMMO v. FITZGERALD et al. (L. A. 8917.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1927.

1. Corporations $\Rightarrow$ 121(4)—In suit on note for stock, counterclaim alleging sellers guaranteed accounts receivable as collectible, and that defendants attempted unsuccessfully to collect accounts, held not to state cause of action (Civ. Code, § 2800).

In action on note given for balance of purchase price of capital stock of corporation, counterclaim alleging that plaintiffs guaranteed corporation's accounts receivable as collectible, "that the defendants * * * attempted to collect each and every one of the aforesaid accounts, * * * but have been unable to collect any part of the same, * * * that the balance due upon said accounts * * * is still uncollected," held insufficient to state cause of action under Civ. Code, § 2800, for failure to show that debtors were insolvent, or that claims had been reduced to judgment, and execution thereon was returned unsatisfied.

2. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 441(9)—Parol evidence of sellers' warranty that accounts receivable of corporation were collectible held to vary terms of written agreement for sale of capital stock.

In action on note for balance of purchase price of capital stock in corporation, parol evidence of sellers' warranty that accounts receivable of corporation were collectible held inadmissible as varying terms of written contract for sale of all capital stock.

3. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 441(9)—Parol evidence is inadmissible to prove existence of warranty as to which written sales contract is silent.

If sales contract, which imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement, contains no agreement relating to warranty, parol evidence is inadmissible to prove existence of warranty.

4. Corporations $\Rightarrow$ 120—Contract for sale of corporation's assets did not imply warranty that accounts receivable could be collected (Civ. Code, § 1764).

Use of word "assets" in contract for sale of all of capital stock of corporation, and statement that it was agreed that buyers should receive all property represented by the list of assets, did not imply warranty that assets, in nature of accounts receivable, which were to be transferred, would be collectible under Civ. Code, § 1764.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by William J. Nimmo against Gerald Fitzgerald and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

O. C. Sattinger and LeRoy M. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lissner, Roth & Gunter, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. The complaint in this action alleges the execution by defendants to plaintiff of two promissory notes, each for $2,000; a payment of $1,000 on account of the first note, and the balance of $3,000, plus interest and attorney fees, due, owing, and unpaid.

It appears that in 1923 plaintiff and one Shattuck, owners of Shattuck & Nimmo Warehouse Company, a corporation, entered into a written agreement for the sale of all the capital stock of said corporation, $30,000 par value, to defendants, at a purchase price of $34,000, payable in deferred payments represented by promissory notes, the last two of which are the ones here in suit. Both the assets and liabilities were set forth in said agreement, and included in the list of assets were various accounts receivable, totaling $8,234.86, $685.51 of which defendants claim they have been unable to collect. The contract is eminently fair. Although the par value of the stock purchased for $34,000 was but $30,000, nevertheless the contract shows the net assets conveyed to be worth approximately $38,000. The entire purchase price, with the exception of the two notes involved in this litigation, was paid.

Defendants question neither the execution of the notes nor the amounts due thereon, but in their answer, to which the written agreement is an exhibit, they allege as a counterclaim that the sellers represented and warranted to them, as an inducement for entering into the contract, that each and every one of the accounts receivable was good and collectible, and they ask that the sum of $755.51 be allowed them as a set-off against any indebtedness due on said notes.

On trial of the case, objection to the introduction of any evidence by defendants was sustained on the ground, first, that the answer and counterclaim failed to state a cause of action, and, second, that defendants were attempting to vary the terms of the written contract by parol evidence. The court gave judgment for plaintiff in amount of $3,772.31, being the balance due on the notes, including attorney fees at 10 per cent., less a set-off of $70, stipulated to by plaintiff.

The sole issue raised by defendants on this appeal is as to the correctness of the court's ruling in excluding the testimony offered by them.

[1] The counterclaim does not state a cause of action. It alleges that the sellers "warranted to the defendants that each of said accounts receivable was collectible, and agreed and guaranteed that the defendants would receive the money represented by said accounts receivable; that the defendants * * * attempted to collect each and every one of the aforesaid accounts, * * * but have been unable to collect any part of the same; * * * that the balance due upon said accounts * * * is still uncollected, due, owing, and unpaid to the defendants. * * *" These allegations do not tender an issue.

"A guaranty to the effect that an obligation is good, or is collectible, imports that the debtor is solvent, and that the demand is collectible by the usual legal proceedings, if taken with reasonable diligence." Section 2800, Civ. Code. Here the allegation is merely that defendants attempted to collect the accounts, but were unable to do so. There is no allegation that they were not good or collectible, or that the claims had been reduced to judgment, and execution thereon returned unsatisfied, or that the debtors were insolvent, and it would be futile to prosecute them. A case directly in point is Ohio Electric Car Co. v. Le Sage, 182 Cal. 450, 453, 454, 188 P. 982, 983, where defendant appealed on the judgment roll alone, upon the sole point that the complaint did not state a cause of action against him. The court said:

"There is no allegation that the plaintiff * * * has taken any legal proceedings to collect from said company indemnities alleged to be due it, or that said company is insolvent, or that for any other reason legal proceedings against them would be unavailing. No facts are alleged to indicate that the debts of the Garage Company could not have been enforced by ordinary legal proceedings. The appellant contends that the complaint is insufficient against him because of the want of such allegations and we think this contention must be sustained. * * *

"It is, in effect, a guaranty of collection such as that mentioned in section 2800 of the Civil Code. Such a guaranty imports that the debtor is solvent and that the demand is collectible by the usual legal proceedings, if taken with reasonable diligence. If such proceedings are not taken, the guarantor is discharged unless 'no part of the debt could have been collected thereby' or unless the principal obligor has removed from the state leaving no property therein from which the obligation might be satisfied. Civ. Code, §§ 2801, 2802. The complaint does not show any of these facts, or any excuse for the failure to take legal proceedings first against the principal."

[2, 3] Exclusion of the testimony on the ground that defendants were attempting to vary the terms of the written contract by parol evidence was likewise proper. Defendants contend that where, as here, the written contract is silent, evidence is admissible to prove a parol warranty; said warranty being collateral to the written contract. Such is not the law of this state. The rule announced by this court in numerous decisions is well stated in the case of Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 594, 595, 96 P. 319, 322, as follows:

"There are well-considered cases holding that an express warranty can be proven by parol evidence where the contract of sale is silent in this respect. The decisions in these cases are based upon the principle that a warranty is not one of the essential elements of a sale, but is a mere collateral undertaking. Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74. 34 Am. Dec. 512.

"This view, however, is not in harmony with the cases upon which the latest declarations of the law on this subject by our Supreme Court rest * * * [citing Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 377, 26 N. W. 2]. * * *

"Where the written sale contains no warranty * * * parol evidence is inadmissible to prove the existence of the warranty. * * * Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 181, 3 P. 625; citing Benjamin on Sales, 621.

"If it (the writing) imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement, * * * parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which parol evidence is directed. The rule forbids to add by parol when the writing is silent. * * * Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 330, 26 P. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469. * * *" Also citing many other cases.

See, to the same effect United Iron Works v. Outer H., etc., Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 P. 917, and Madera S. P. Co. v. N. B. Livermore & Co., 179 Cal. 116, 117, 175 P. 456.

[4] Defendants advance the further theory that a warranty is implied by the use of the word "assets" in the contract, and the statement that it is agreed that the buyers shall receive all property represented by said list of assets. The buyers received exactly what the contract purported to convey, to wit, those certain accounts receivable listed therein. There is no suggestion that the accounts were not bona fide accounts or that the sellers failed to deliver them to the buyers. "A mere contract of sale or agreement to sell does not imply a warranty." Civ. Code, § 1764. The contract to sell certain listed assets undertook no more than to convey to the buyers the assets so agreed to be conveyed.

Judgment affirmed.

VERBECK et al. v. CLYMER et al. (L. A. 8876.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1927.

1. Adverse possession $\S$ 85(1)—Possession by another than holder of legal title is deemed to have been under and in subordination thereto (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 321).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 321, holder of legal title to land is presumed to be entitled to possession thereof, and possession by another is deemed to have been under and in subordination to legal title.

2. Ejectment $\S$ 26(1)—Defendants in ejectment action, after admitting legal title in plaintiffs, can prevail only by setting up equitable defense which can be ripened into legal title.

Where, in ejectment action, legal title is admitted to be in plaintiffs, defendants can only prevail by setting up an equitable defense, which equity must be of character that may be ripened by decree into legal right or such as will estop plaintiff from prosecuting action.

3. Pleading $\S$ 79—Defendant must set up equitable defense in answer.

Where a defendant wishes to avail himself of an equitable defense, he must set it up in his answer.

4. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 299(1)—Purchaser in possession under contract of purchase, after default, cannot maintain equitable defense in vendor's action of ejectment.

Where a purchaser in possession under a contract of purchase has failed to perform his part of contract, and is in default with respect thereto without excuse, he cannot maintain an equitable defense in action of ejectment by vendor, since purchaser cannot remain in possession of lands under contract and refuse to pay purchase price.

5. Abatement and revival $\S$ 40—Plea that action is premature must be specially pleaded.

The plea that an action has been prematurely brought is in the nature of a dilatory plea, which must be specially pleaded in order to be available as a defense.

6. Usury $\S$ 78, 146—Obligation to pay interest is void in case of usury and maturity date of principal is not accelerated by nonpayment of interest.

In a case where usury is established, obligation to pay interest is void and maturity date of principal cannot be accelerated on account of nonpayment of interest.

7. Usury $\S$ 18—Contract for sale of land requiring monthly payments held not "loan," within meaning of usury law.

Contract for sale of land, providing for monthly payments covering a period of 15 years, being a bona fide sale and purchase of real property where vendor retained title, held not a "loan," within the meaning of usury law.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by George I. Verbeck and another against Forest D. Clymer and another, wherein defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiffs and cross-defendants, and defendants and cross-complainants appeal. Affirmed.

George L. Sanders, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Denio & Hart, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an ordinary action in ejectment with a prayer for $10,000 in damages for the unlawful withholding of possession of the premises described in the complaint. The foundation of the action is an allegation of title and the right of possession thereunder and the wrongful withholding thereof by defendants. The defendants admit title in plaintiff and also admit their possession of the premises, but they deny that such possession is wrongful. As a special defense the answer sets up a contract of sale and purchase of said premises wherein plaintiffs agreed to sell and defendants agreed to buy the same for $20,000. It alleges also an initial payment of $5,000, with the balance of $15,000 to be spread out over a period of 15 years, which with the interest added would be discharged in 180 months by the payment of $200 on the 1st of each and every month, which payments defendants agreed to make. Payment of an installment of $200 on the 1st day of October, 1924, and of a second one on the 1st day of November, 1924, is alleged. It is not alleged, nor is it claimed, that any subsequent payments have been made or tendered, nor is it alleged that defendants have performed all or any of the covenants and conditions on their part to be kept and performed under said contract of purchase. In short, the answer does not show defendants to be free from default under said contract. The answer, however, attempts to allege usury in the transaction by stating that more than 12 per cent. per annum as interest on the deferred payments is exacted under said contract and on that account the whole obligation to pay interest is void and the maturity date of the contract is by operation of law deferred until the expiration of said period of 15 years. The effect of the answer in short is that defendants claim the right to possession of the premises without the payment of any interest and with an obligation to pay the balance of the principal only at the expiration of the 15-year period. The answer by no means contains all of the demands of the defendants. They also filed a cross-complaint setting forth said contract of sale and purchase as above alleged and containing the further allegation that $21,000 interest was provided for in said contract; that on account of the existence of usury in the transaction the obligation to pay interest was void and defendants were entitled as a penalty to judgment against plaintiffs for treble said interest item, to wit, the sum of $63,000, and this without the payment of a cent of interest, except the undetermined amount in the two payments of $200 each made by defendants before their appetites were sharpened.

The net result of the answer and cross-complaint is that defendants ask to be allowed in effect both the title and the purchase price of said property and in addition thereto that plaintiffs should pay defendants $48,000 for the privilege of donating the property to them. There is anything but modesty in the claim of defendants. So avaricious are they that not only do they ask for all the aforesaid relief, but they claim that plaintiffs were in contempt of court in asking for judgment in their favor on the pleadings, and in that behalf they said:

"* * * And that said plaintiffs at all times since have been and now are in contempt of court and in express, gross, willful, and flagrant disobedience of the orders of the court.
* * *"

Notwithstanding this challenge of defendants, plaintiffs waived their prayer for damages and pursued their motion for judgment on the pleadings, which, after consideration, the court granted, and thereupon gave its judgment in their favor and against defendants, among other things specifying therein as follows:

"* * * It appearing to the satisfaction of the court from said pleadings that the fee-simple title to said property is admitted to be in plaintiffs and that defendants are unlawfully in possession of said premises, and said defendants failed to set up in their answer an equity in and to said property hereinafter described or in and to any part thereof, and it being made to appear that defendants and cross-complainants are not entitled to plead a cross-complaint for a money judgment in an action of ejectment, and there being no issue to try, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple and entitled to possession of the premises described in said complaint herein, to wit, [describing the premises] * * * and that said plaintiffs have and recover possession thereof. * * *"

[1] The action of the court in granting judgment for plaintiffs on the pleadings is clearly correct. We find no equity on the face of the answer.

It is a presumption of law from the legal title that the holder thereof is entitled to possession of the premises (Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 607, 615) and possession by another is deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title (Code Civ. Proc. § 321).

[2] Where the legal title is admitted to be in plaintiffs, defendants can only prevail against them by setting up an equitable defense, "and the equity presented must be of such a character that it may be ripened by a decree into a legal right to the premises or such as will estop the plaintiff from the prosecution of the action." 9 Cal. Jur. p. 1000.

[3] It is elementary that, if a defendant wishes to avail himself of an equitable defense, he must set it up in his answer. Dorn v. Baker, 96 Cal. 206, 31 P. 37.

[4] Where a vendee in possession under a contract of purchase has failed to perform his part of the contract and is in default with respect thereto, without excuse he cannot maintain an equitable defense in an action of ejectment by the vendor. Connolly v. Hingley, 82 Cal. 642, 23 P. 273; Howard v. Hewitt, 139 Cal. 614, 73 P. 414. "A purchaser cannot remain in possession of lands under a contract and at the same time refuse to pay the purchase price. * * *" Rhorer v. Bila, 83 Cal. 54, 23 P. 275; Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 49, 11 P. 489; Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 106, 103 P. 329. The essence of the rule is that, where the legal title to the property is in the plaintiff and that fact is admitted by the defendants, defendants cannot successfully defend against an action in ejectment unless they make out a complete equitable title in themselves with the right of possession thereunder. Wallace v. Maples, 79 Cal. 433, 21 P. 860; Flint v. Conner, 53 Cal. App. 279, 200 P. 37. The decisions of this court are replete with announcements of the above principles and we need not here pause for further citations.

[5] The answer to the cross-complaint in this action sets out the written contract between the parties as an exhibit thereto, from which it appears that, as to the monthly payments called for by said contract, forfeiture should not occur until expiration of the period of 90 days from and after the due date of such payment; but defendants have not by answer or by plea in abatement or otherwise attempted to assert the premature institution of the action, nor do they, either in the answer or cross-complaint, tender to plaintiffs any of the payments which were long overdue at the time of the filing of the answer herein. In other words, they have wholly failed to do equity under the circumstances. It is well settled that the plea that an action has been prematurely brought is in the nature of a dilatory plea which must be specially pleaded in order to be available as a defense. Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea, 184 Cal. 565, 573, 194 P. 1024; Bemmerly v. Woodward, 124 Cal. 568, 57 P. 561.

[6, 7] But the whole essence of defendants' astonishing claims lies in their attempt to call to their aid the provisions of the usury law. It is now well settled that, in a case where the usury is established, the obligation to pay interest is void and the maturity date of the principal cannot be accelerated on account of the nonpayment of interest. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co. (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 956. The claim of defendants seems to be that the obligation set up in their answer is in the nature of a loan and that as such it is usurious. The obligation to pay the principal sum is therefore deferred by operation of law until the expiration of the 15-year period and as a consequence they may not be said to be in default under their contract of purchase. Inasmuch as there is no way of separating the interest payments from the payments on the principal, there might be substance in this contention if indeed the transaction is usurious (Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., supra), for it is undoubtedly the law that under certain circumstances a contract tainted with usury may be a proper subject for the interference of a court of equity to prevent a declaration of a forfeiture. But we have no hesitancy whatsoever in declaring that the transaction set up in the answer and cross-complaint is not in any sense a loan within the meaning of said usury law. The contract is admittedly a bona fide one of sale and purchase of real property where the title is retained by the vendor. The purchase price is therein named and the terms of sale are fixed and certain deferred payments are provided for. There is in the transaction no element of a loan. The parties were unfettered; dealt with each other at arm's length and in apparent good faith. The transaction was not a subterfuge devised to conceal what was in fact a loan. In view of this conclusion there is no room whatsoever for the contention that the usury law will intervene to give equitable relief to defendants or to penalize the plaintiffs. This holding was foreshadowed by what was said in Re Washer (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 951, to the effect that sale by a corporation of securities of its own issue of stock or securities was not a violation of the usury law. If the sale by a corporation of its stock or securities of its own issue is not a loan within the usury law, how much more certain must be the conclusion that the sale of one's own property is not a loan whatever be the terms or conditions of purchase. This principle is announced as follows in 39 Cyc. p. 926:

"It is manifest that any person owning property may sell it at such price and on such terms as to time and mode of payment as he may see fit, and such a sale, if bona fide, cannot be usurious, however unconscionable it may be."

The principle is stated in 27 R. C. L. pp. 213, 215, §§ 14, 15, as follows:

"The first element of a usurious transaction is that there be a loan or forbearance of money, for, if there is neither, there can be no usury, unless a statute has given some definition of usury inconsistent with that of the common law. * * * On principle and authority, the owner of property, whether real or personal, has a perfect right to name the price on which he is willing to sell, and to refuse to accede to any other. He may offer to sell at a designated price for cash or at a much higher price on credit, and a credit sale will not constitute usury however great the difference between the two prices, unless the buying and selling was a mere pretense; and it has been held that it is not material that the agreement for the purchase price in the future, instead of specifying the whole sum then to be paid, names a particular sum as principal, and declares that it shall draw interest at a rate which, were the transaction a borrowing and lending, would clearly be usurious. * * *"

In the case of Holland-O'Neal Milling Co. v. Rawlings, 217 Mo. App. 466, 479, 268 S. W. 683, 686, the court said:

"The owner of property, whether real or personal, has a right to name the price at which he is willing to sell. He may offer to sell at a designated price for cash, or at a much higher price on a credit, and a credit sale will not constitute usury, however great the difference between the cash price and the credit price, unless the whole transaction was in fact a mere pretense and a sham in order to camouflage the real facts."

See, to the same effect, General Motors Acc. Cor. v. Weinrich, 218 Mo. App. 68, 262 S. W. 425. An exact parallel of the case at bar is Edwards v. Wiley, 150 Ark. 480, 483, 235 S. W. 54, 55, where the court said:

"The complaint alleged that on March 20, 1910, appellant, John B. Edwards, was the owner of lot 5, in block 65, in the city of Ft. Smith, and that its then value was $1,500; that, in order to obtain an exorbitant rate of interest, Edwards fixed the price of the lot at $2,250, and contracted to sell it to William Wiley at that price, payments to be made at the rate of $20 per month, payable quarterly, with interest at 8 per cent., and that this price was fixed as a subterfuge whereby usurious interest might be collected. This branch of the case may be disposed of by saying that all the testimony shows that the transaction between Edwards and Wiley was one for the sale of the lot. Neither of the parties intended or contemplated a loan of money, and it was not such in fact. This was a sale, and was so intended, and the exaction of a price, however exorbitant, cannot import into the transaction the characteristics of usury, as the element of lending and borrowing money is absent. Such was the express holding of Ellenbogen v. Griffey, 55 Ark. 268, 18 S. W. 126, and reaffirmed in the case of Blake Bros. v. Askew & Brummett, 112 Ark. 514, 166 S. W.

965, and the more recent case of Smith v. Kaufman, 145 Ark. 548, 224 S. W. 978."

This holding also disposes of the cross-complaint which prays for a judgment in treble the amount of the item designated as interest and renders unnecessary a consideration of any of the many other attacks made upon the legal sufficiency thereof as well as the propriety thereof under our rules of pleading.

The fact that we do not further discuss the matter is by no means to be taken as an indication that we do not think the contentions meritorious.

VANONI v. ROOD. (Civ. 6060.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Assault and battery ☞35—Conflicting evidence held to sustain finding against claim of justification for assault.

In action for damages for assault, conflicting evidence held to sustain finding against defendant's claim of justification.

2. New trial ☞104(1)—New trial for newly discovered evidence, which was cumulative, held properly denied.

New trial for newly discovered evidence held properly denied, where evidence was cumulative, and it was doubtful whether it could have been produced, if new trial had been granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by Clement Vanoni against W. F. Rood. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

J. L. Royle, of Berkeley, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover damages caused by the assault on him of the defendant. The defendant appeared and answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made its findings, and caused a judgment thereon to be entered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In his answer the defendant denied the material allegations of the complaint, and pleaded affirmatively his justification for the alleged assault. On the issue of justification the trial court made several findings against the defendant, and the defendant attacks those findings, claiming that they are not supported by the evidence. The plaintiff replies that the evidence was conflicting, and that there was substantial evidence supporting all of the findings made by the trial court. To that reply the defendant answers that, since the repeal of section 1835 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the trial courts must be governed by section 1826 and section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That answer is quite interesting, and may be of much importance in a case which supports it; but we think the case at bar does not present facts which call for a ruling on the contention. In his opening brief the defendant says:

"The appellant has not at any time contended that he did not strike the respondent with his fist or that the respondent did not suffer the injuries complained of as a result of the blow, and the appellant concedes that he struck the first blow, but urges that he was justified in his own defense according to the circumstances as they appeared to him at the time, and as they would have appeared to a reasonable man under the circumstances."

[1] It becomes necessary, therefore, to recite the "circumstances" as shown to the trial court. Miss Helen Stockham resides at Geyserville. The defendant, W. F. Rood, operates a general merchandise store at that place, and there is some evidence that he is "going with" Miss Stockham, and employs her as his bookkeeper, and also employs other members of her family. Clement Vanoni is a young man 22 years of age, who, since boyhood, has been acquainted with Miss Stockham, and there is some evidence that he is also "going with" her. Some time prior to the 10th day of July, 1924, Miss Stockham and a girl friend, together with Clement Vanoni and his friend Veral Gore, had taken an automobile ride. On that ride something occurred which prompted Miss Stockham to report to the defendant that she would not have anything more to do with that "bunch," because the plaintiff and his associate had used vulgar language. Thereupon the defendant took the position, when talking to his neighbors, that Vanoni and Gore should apologize to Miss Stockham. To many persons in Geyserville he so stated. Thereafter Vanoni and Gore heard of the defendant's statement, and they took the position that the defendant should apologize to them, or he would be hurt, or words to that effect. They so stated to different persons in Geyserville and some of those persons reported the statements to the defendant. Various conversations were had until on the 10th day of July, 1924, at about 9 o'clock in the morning, Vanoni and Gore went to the defendant's store, and held a conversation with the defendant. When they stated to the defendant what reports they had heard, the defendant replied that he had not made the statements charged to him. Thereupon he stated to the plaintiff and his associate, Gore, that they had used vulgar language in the presence of Miss Stockham, and that they should apologize to her. Thereupon all three turned in their tracks, and stepped to another part of the store, where she was engaged in her work, and discussed with her what had occurred on the automobile ride, and what was said. That conversation having come to an end, the defendant said to the plaintiff and his associate, "I heard around town that you were coming in to punch my nose—is that right?" The plaintiff replied, "I believe that is right." Gore said, "Yes; it's a damn good place for it." Almost immediately following the conversation just delineated the defendant struck the first blow, and knocked Vanoni down. The plaintiff and his associate, Gore, testified that, before that blow was struck, neither one had made any move or gesture indicating any present intention of striking or injuring the defendant. The defendant and his employee Miss Stockham testified that the plaintiff stood in front of the defendant with his fist clenched, and was quarreling with the defendant. There was evidence of threats made by Vanoni and Gore against the defendant, and that some of those threats had been communicated to the defendant. Before those threats could be used in evidence against the party making them, it has been held in this state, in homicide cases, that there should be evidence of the commission of some overt act indicating a present intention of such party to carry his threats into execution. People v. Wright, 45 Cal. 260; People v. Taing, 53 Cal. 602, 603; People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243, 247, 43 Am. Rep. 257; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303, 305; People v. Gonzales, 33 Cal. App. 340, 342, 164 P. 1131. No decision of this state has been cited to us which holds that the same rule applies in a criminal or civil action based on a simple assault. The authorities in other jurisdictions, however, are to that effect. 5 C. J. 683, § 126; Stockham v. Malcolm, 111 Md. 615, 74 A. 569, 572, 19 Ann. Cas. 759; Cooke v. State, 18 Ala. App. 416, 93 So. 86, 88; Cooke v. Wilbanks, 208 Ala. 486, 94 So. 725. The case last cited is the civil action, and the case preceding it is the criminal action growing out of one and the same state of facts. In the case at bar the trial court saw all of the actors, heard all of the witnesses, saw the manner in which each testified, and had a full opportunity to determine on which side right and justice should prevail. It is clear that the record is such that much could be said in favor of the contention of the plaintiff that the assault was a cowardly assault by the defendant, through jealousy, on a young boy who was chiefly guilty of talking too much, and that the assault was made at a time when the defendant was not at all in danger. It is equally clear that much could be said to the effect that the plaintiff and his associate entered the castle of the defendant for the purpose of quarreling with him, and in that place did quarrel with him and assault him. However, it is equally clear that by no means may it properly be said that the evidence was all one way, and that it was against the findings made by the trial court on the issue of justification. Patton v. Klemmer, 15 Cal. App. 459, 115 P. 62.

[2] In moving for a new trial, the defendant presented affidavits showing or tending to show newly discovered evidence. That evidence consisted of other threats made to other persons at or about the time of the threats hereinabove mentioned. The evidence was cumulative. Furthermore, the reply affidavits brought forward by the plaintiff rendered it quite doubtful whether the newly discovered evidence could have been produced if a new trial had been granted. No error appears to have been committed by the trial court in denying the motion.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HILTON v. OLIVER et al. (Civ. 3311.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 5, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 4, 1928. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇐236(2)—Defendants, not having moved that plaintiff specify particulars of negligence, could not first urge objection to complaint on appeal.

Where complaint alleged that on named date defendants negligently and carelessly maintained a ditch so that waters overflowed plaintiff's growing crops, since defendants did not move that plaintiff specify exact particulars of negligence they could not urge such objection for the first time on appeal.

2. Drains ⇐60—Whether defendants' negligence caused water to overflow drainage ditches and damage plaintiff's crop held, under evidence, for jury.

Where plaintiff alleged reclamation district and trustees negligently maintained drainage ditch so that water overflowed and destroyed barley crop, evidence that district's employees cut vegetation in drains and threw it on banks thereof, so that during high water it clogged culvert and caused overflow to plaintiff's land, held to make prima facie case of negligence, and hence denial of defendants' motion for nonsuit and motion for directed verdict at completion of testimony was proper.

3. Drains ⇐60—Instruction in action for negligence that person acting in official capacity is individually liable for negligent discharge of duties held not error (Pol. Code, § 3464).

In action against reclamation district and trustees for negligently maintaining drainage ditch which overflowed and destroyed barley crop, instruction that a person acting in his official capacity is individually liable for negligent discharge of his duties held proper, as law applicable to case at time of injury; rule thereof having been modified by Pol. Code, § 3464.

4. Drains $\Leftrightarrow$ 60—Instruction that negligence consisted in failing to control cause of injury held not error, in view of further instructions.

In action against reclamation district and trustees for negligent maintenance of drainage ditch which overflowed and destroyed barley crop, instruction that negligence was not simply in originating that which may be cause of injury, but consists also in failing to control such cause so as to prevent inflicting injury, was not error, in view of further instructions.

5. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 252(7), 260(7)—In action for negligent maintenance of ditch, refusal of instructions covered by instructions given or on matters unsupported by evidence held not error.

In action against reclamation district and trustees for negligence in maintenance of ditch which overflowed and damaged plaintiff's barley crop, refusal of defendants' instructions which were covered by given instructions or were as to matters on which no evidence was presented in the record was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by F. A. Hilton against Emery Oliver and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles W. Slack and Edgar T. Zook, both of San Francisco, and C. F. Metteer, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Martin I. Welsh and Robert Schwab, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff and respondent, during the spring of 1922, was growing a crop of barley on lands of one Jessee, which said lands were situated within reclamation district No. 1000, in Sacramento county. The defendants and appellants Oliver, Martin, and Kiesel were the trustees of said district at said time.

Plaintiff by his complaint avers that said above-named defendants so carelessly and negligently maintained and operated a drainage ditch, a part of said reclamation district system, that the same overflowed plaintiff's land and destroyed a crop of barley valued at $3,390. The damage claimed was for the plaintiff's share of the crop, and for an assigned claim of the landlord, Jessee, for his rental share of said crop.

At the trial the defendant reclamation district was, upon motion of plaintiff, dismissed as a party defendant. Upon trial a jury awarded plaintiff damages in the sum of $1,000. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony a motion for nonsuit was made by defendants and denied. Upon the completion of the testimony a motion for a directed verdict was made, upon substantially the same grounds, and was likewise denied. Denial of these requests are assigned as errors. Two instructions given at request of plaintiff were excepted to and three instructions requested by defendants, and which were not given, are likewise assigned as error of the trial court.

[1] The complaint in general terms alleged:

"That on or about the 12th day of February, 1922, said defendants so negligently and carelessly maintained and operated" a certain ditch "that the waters therein overflowed said ditch on the premises herein described, and on and over the crops therein planted and growing."

There was no specific statement of what the alleged negligence consisted. A general demurrer only was interposed by the defendant trustees. In the briefs of appellants much is said as to the failure of plaintiff to acquaint defendants of the particulars of the claim of negligence. While we are not attempting to decide whether or not a more specific statement of the particulars of the claim herein should have been made, it is sufficient to say that had the defendants felt that they should have a more detailed statement of these particulars; that criticism of the complaint should have been pointed out by a demurrer for ambiguity or unintelligibility. Even after the pleadings were settled, had defendants that criticism in mind, they might have by motion asked the court to direct that plaintiff specify the exact particulars of the alleged negligence. Not doing either of these things, it is now too late to insist upon that objection.

[2] The motion for nonsuit and the motion for a directed verdict will be considered together. While the motion for a directed verdict was specific, yet the general aspect of both motions were the same.

The testimony disclosed that shortly before a heavy rain on or about February 12, 1922, the reclamation district by its employees had cut the vegetation, tules, and other growth, in the drains above the lands plaintiff was farming. Much of this growth had been thrown upon the banks of the drains and placed so that when the drains filled with water it was carried down the drains by the flood waters therein. At a point near to the lands the plaintiff was farming the loose tules and other matter so cut from the drains clogged up a culvert so that the waters could not pass through the same, and said flood waters overflowed the banks of the drain ditch and onto the adjacent lands farmed by plaintiff. The testimony was sufficient to support a verdict in the amount assessed by the jury. There was some dispute as to what caused the clogging of the culvert. Defendants claimed, and therein were supported by testimony, that the tules alone could not have caused the clogging of this culvert. The testimony of plaintiff's witnesses was to the effect that this clogging was caused by tules. The jury heard the testimony, as did the trial court, and we are not now permitted to say that their finding in this matter should be disturbed. It is true that, if boards, oil drums, etc., placed in the ditch by farmers living along the line thereof caused the blocking of the drain, as some witnesses testified, defendants would not be liable for the overflow caused thereby. Taking all the testimony presented to the jury, either before the motion for a nonsuit, or upon the completion of defendants' case, sufficient is presented to make out a prima facie case.

[3, 4] At the request of the plaintiff the court gave the following instructions:

A. "You are instructed that a person acting in his official capacity is individually liable for the negligent discharge of his duties."

B. "Negligence is not simply in originating that which may be the cause of injury, but consists also in failing to control this cause, so as to prevent inflicting injury."

At the time of this injury and at the time of the trial instruction A properly stated the law applicable to this case. The rule has since been modified by section 3464, Political Code. These instructions were followed by instructions offered by the defendants to the effect that trustees of a reclamation district are not chargeable by law to personally perform the work of constructing and maintaining the works of the district, and that to hold the trustees liable the jury must find that said trustees had knowledge or means of knowledge of defects in the works and had failed to remedy the defective conditions. There was no direct proof of knowledge by the trustees of the conditions that caused the overflow, but under the law the trustees of the district were deemed to have done their duty, a part of which was to "exercise general supervision" over the works and the operation of the district. We cannot therefore hold that instruction B was in any way erroneous or prejudicial.

[5] The three instructions offered by the defendants and refused by the trial court are either partly covered by other instructions given at request of defendants, or are as to matters upon which no evidence is present in the record. The first instruction complained of offered by defendants and which the court refused to give was as follows:

"I instruct you that a trustee of a reclamation district is not responsible for the acts or omission of subordinates properly employed by or under him, if such subordinates are not in his private service, but are themselves servants of the reclamation district, unless such trustee has directed such acts to be done or has personally co-operated therein."

The court, at the instance of defendant, had previously told the jury that the trustees could engage engineers and employees to do the general planning and work of caring for the operation of the district, and that, if the trustees did use ordinary care in the selection of employees, they could not be held liable, unless after knowledge of the failure of the drain. The two further requested instructions relate to the giving of instructions to the employees by the trustees of the district. The testimony does not disclose that the defendant trustees did give any instructions to engineers or employees. No testimony was offered as to the care taken in the selection of engineers or employees, and, while in a proper case it would be proper to give such offered instructions, it does not appear that any evidence was before the court to which such instructions were applicable.

The judgment and the order of the lower court are affirmed.

BRENGLE et al. v. STEEN et al. (Civ. 5636.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1927. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1041(3)—Permitting trial amendment of answer to correct denial, defective but sufficient to put on notice, held not ground for complaint.

That an amendment of answer was permitted at the trial to correct a denial of allegation of employee's act being within scope of his employment is not ground for complaint; the original denial, while defective, being sufficient to put plaintiffs on notice, and it not appearing they suffered any disadvantage from the amendment.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 302(1)—Employer is not liable for acts of employee not in course of employment.

An employer is not chargeable for acts of an employee done either to satisfy his own curiosity, or at the instance of some one else, and not in the course of his employment.

3. Master and servant $\S$ 330(3)—Conclusion that one of crew installing oven was acting within scope of authority in turning on gas held not warranted by evidence.

Conclusion that, if one of the crew, sent to take down an old oven and install a new one, turned on the gas, causing explosion, resulting in death of an occupant of the premises, he was acting within the scope of employment held unwarranted by the evidence.

4. Gas ~~Co~~20(4)—Whether gas company was negligent in placing meter without order, letting gas into room when turned on by mistake, held jury question.

Whether gas company, being dealer in dangerous commodity, was negligent in installing, without order, a meter which when turned on would let gas into a room where it was not used, the meter being beside three others, furnishing gas for other rooms, and being by accident turned on by some one, causing an explosion, held question for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Helen L. Brengle and others against Robert I. Steen and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed in part, and in part affirmed.

Vernon Brydolf, of Pasadena, and Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil and Thomas J. Reynolds, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs brought two actions to recover damages for the death of the husband of one of the plaintiffs—the father of the other plaintiff. The two actions were consolidated for the purpose of trial, and at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence judgments of nonsuit were on motion entered in favor of the several defendants. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

The deceased, Brengle, was killed by an explosion of gas alleged to have been allowed to escape by the negligent acts of the several defendants. The building in which the explosion took place consisted of four rooms. One, extending from the street line the full depth of the building, was occupied by Fawkes, a baker; the next room on the street was used as a butcher shop; the third was used as a confectionery and tobacco shop; the fourth room, which lay behind the butcher and tobacco shops, was used by Hooper, Brengle's employer, as an automobile accessories storeroom in connection with a service station which he conducted on the lot adjacent to the building. Hooper had been the lessee of the building from the time of the first construction, the other occupants being his subtenants. All of the rooms in the building were equipped with house pipes for gas. The one leading into Hooper's accessories room was not occupied and had not been from the time of its installation. The front end of the bakeshop was partitioned off from the rear and was used as a display and salesroom. On either side of the entrance door was a show window, which was glazed in from the room and was entered by glass doors. Under the show window next the butcher shop was a compartment in which the gas house pipes of all the other rooms headed for the installation of meters. The baker's meter was larger than any of the others, as he used gas for his cooking. The other two subtenants used gas for other purposes. Hooper, the lessee, had never used it for any purpose, and had never ordered the installation of a meter to connect with the accessories store, nor does it appear that any one had ever ordered such an installation. A meter connecting with that store was installed by the defendant gas company at a later time than the others, and remained unused up to the time of the explosion. Just before the day of the explosion Fawkes, the baker, contracted with the defendant Steen for the removal of an old bake oven and the purchase and installation of a new one. On the morning of that day Woodruff, Redfern & Geisler, employees of Steen, went to the bakeshop for the purpose of doing the job, taking the new oven with them. Woodruff was the foreman on the job, and Redfern was his assistant. Geisler seems to have been taken along as a general roustabout and to help in lifting and carrying the ovens. In order to remove the old oven and put in the new one, it was necessary to have the gas turned off at the meter. This was done by Fawkes at the request of Woodruff. Geisler went with Fawkes to the front of the shop and was seen on the floor of the meter compartment after Fawkes had turned off the meter cock. Upon being told by Fawkes that the gas had been turned off, Woodruff and Redfern took down the old oven and set up the new one. They made no connection of the oven with the house pipe and did not go near the meters. The job was finished between 1 and 2 in the afternoon, and the three men went away. About 4:30 that afternoon Brengle started into the accessories storeroom to get some article for a customer and immediately there was an explosion from within. Brengle received burns from which he died the following day. An examination of the meter connected with the accessories room house pipe showed that 4,500 feet of gas had passed through it.

[1] Appellant contends that the court erred in permitting an amendment of Steen's answer at the time of the trial to correct an attempted denial of the allegation that Geisler was acting within the scope of his employment. The denial in the original answer was defective, but it was sufficient to put plaintiffs upon notice, and it is not shown that they suffered any disadvantage from the amendment.

A number of questions were asked by defendants' counsel on cross-examination to which plaintiffs objected as not referring to matters brought out by the direct examination, but relating to matters of defense. Most of these objections were not well taken, and the statements elicited by the questions which should have been ruled out are not set forth here and are not considered.

From the evidence adduced, the jury might reasonably have drawn the inference that Steen's employee, Geisler, turned the cock which admitted the gas to the accessories room house pipe.

[2, 3] It is contended by respondents that the evidence does not justify the conclusion that if Geisler did turn the gas on he was acting within the scope of his employment when he did so. The evidence indicates that Geisler's employment was limited to the work of lifting and carrying the ovens. He had, in fact, no part in taking down the old oven or setting up the new one. Woodruff, who as foreman was in charge of the job, gave him no orders to turn off the gas at the meter, but addressed himself to Fawkes, who turned it off. If Geisler then did anything to the meters the first time he went to them, he did it without any order and knowing that the only meter that concerned his employer had been attended to. His second visit to the meter was at the direction of Fawkes. An employer cannot be charged with responsibility for the acts of his employee done either to satisfy his own curiosity, or at the instance of some one else, and not in the course of his employment. We conclude, therefore, that if the case had been submitted to the jury they would not have been warranted in concluding that Geisler was acting within the scope of his employment.

[4] The situation as to the respondent Southern California Gas Company is entirely different. Briefly stated, it presents the question whether or not a dealer in a commodity dangerous in itself can, particularly under the circumstances appearing in this case, provide a means for its introduction into the premises of one who has not ordered it without becoming liable for whatever damages may result from its introduction. The house pipe connecting with the accessories room was, of course, appurtenant to the room and under the control of its lawful possessor. With three meters, identical in appearance, placed in a row, it might easily happen that some person properly having the right to turn off and on one of the two in use, would by mistake turn the cock of the third. While it cannot be said that the placing of a meter in that way, was, as matter of law, an act of negligence, nevertheless it was within the province of the jury to say whether, under the circumstances, it was negligent. It may even be that the placing of the meter was a trespass from the beginning, and that it was incumbent upon the defendant to exercise more than ordinary care to avoid any possible injury to those lawfully upon the premises. But this is not urged by the appellants, and we shall not pass upon it. It is conceded by both sides that ordinary care was required of respondents in handling this commodity, and the question therefore is on the construction of the admitted facts.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing, the judgment of nonsuit as to the defendant Steen is affirmed, and the judgment reversed as to the defendant Southern California Gas Company.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1927. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

Appeals by plaintiff from judgments of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Charles Monroe, Judge, in actions for damages for personal injuries. Reversed and affirmed.

Earle M. Daniels and Julius V. Patrosso, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil and Thomas J. Reynolds, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Southern California Gas Co.

E. W. Forgy and W. S. Taylor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Steen.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. The facts in the above-entitled cases were in all essential elements the same as in the case Helen L. Brengle et al. v. Robert I. Steen et al. (Civil No. 5636) 261 P. 1023, this day decided by this court. A nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Southern California Gas Company, but the case against Steen went to the jury, which returned a verdict in his favor. For the reasons stated in the case above referred to, the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the Southern California Gas Company is reversed, and the judgment in favor of defendant Steen is affirmed.

(Civ. 5952.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 13, 1927.

1. Covenants ☞51(2)—Chicken houses and barns used in conducting chicken ranch held not "outbuildings" within meaning of restriction in deed.

Under limitations in deed restricting buildings to dwelling houses and garages or other outbuildings, held that chicken houses and barns used in conducting a chicken ranch were not "outbuildings" within meaning of such restriction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Outbuilding.]

2. Injunction ☞128—Finding of diligence in seeking to restrain violation of restrictions in deed held supported by evidence.

Finding that plaintiffs seeking to restrain erection and maintenance of chicken houses and barns as being in violation of restrictions in deed exercised reasonable diligence in making their protest held supported by the evidence.

3. Appeal and error ☞954(1)—Injunction ☞1—Application for injunction rests primarily in chancellor's discretion, which will not be disturbed by appellate court in absence of clear abuse.

An application for injunctive relief rests primarily in discretion of chancellor, and appellate court may not exercise its discretion upon the equities alone, unless it is evident that there has been a clear abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Action by Pauline Ruprecht and others against S. L. Nicholson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Gould, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to restrain defendant from erecting or maintaining upon defendant's premises buildings other than residences and outhouses permitted by the deeds of conveyance under which both parties held. Plaintiff had judgment as prayed, and defendant has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

The covenant under which plaintiff sued was included in all the deeds of conveyance to all the lots of a large tract of land owned and subdivided by the common grantor. The provision which plaintiff claimed was breached reads:

"Buildings restricted to dwelling houses and the buyer shall not construct any dwelling house upon said tracts to cost less than $3,000,

* * * provided that the buyer may erect a garage or other outbuildings, the same to be built and located at the proper point on said tract for such buildings."

The complaint alleged that the defendant, disregarding this restriction, had erected on one of the lots purchased by him "unsightly chicken houses and barns for use in conducting a chicken ranch and ever since has maintained and operated said chicken houses and barns on said property in conducting a chicken ranch." The trial court found that this allegation was true, that the buildings were used only in the business of raising chickens for commercial purposes, that they were not appurtenant or subservient to a dwelling-house, and that they were not "outbuildings" within the meaning of the term as used in the deed.

On this appeal the appellant urges that the trial court misinterpreted the language of the deed and that respondents were estopped from complaining because they permitted appellant to construct the buildings at a large outlay of expense without protest.

[1] The clear purpose of the limitations in the deeds was to restrict the use of the lots in the tract to residential purposes and to prevent the erection of buildings for commercial purposes. In permitting the erection of "a garage or other outbuildings," the grantor used the term as applying to other buildings, like a garage, appurtenant and subservient to the dwelling house and to be used in connection with the use of the dwelling. This is the common use of the term. 20 A. L. R. note, page 234; 3 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 2433; Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 257, 262, 116 P. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190. The finding of the trial court that the buildings complained of were not appurtenant or subservient to the dwelling house and were not to be used in connection with the dwelling is supported by the evidence and not attacked on this appeal. Under the authorities above noted the buildings could not, therefore, be classed as "outbuildings" within the meaning of the restriction.

[2] Respondents testified that they had been infrequent visitors to the tract during the time appellant was constructing the chicken houses on his lot, had seen one of them completed, and had seen other chicken houses on other lots all of which they were led to believe were either to be removed or to be used for housing a small number of chickens for the use of the owner only. It was shown that appellant erected the chicken houses on his lot before he built his dwelling house and that the chicken houses occupied about three-fourths of the area of his lot, with space sufficient to house 1,500 chickens. When respondents learned the extent of the appellant's plans they entered their protests and testified that they had not protested sooner because they thought appellant was merely erecting a chicken house for home use. The trial court found that respondents made their protest with reasonable diligence and within a reasonable time after they had noticed that he was erecting buildings which violated the restrictions. This finding is supported by some evidence, and it disposes of the defense of estoppel and waiver.

[3] Appellant directs our attention to the inequity of the judgment, pointing out that before he purchased his lots he was assured by the agent of the owners that the premises could be used for the raising of chickens commercially, that three other lot owners were conducting such businesses in the tract at the time, and that he incurred a large expense in good faith, relying upon these facts. The agent of the owners took the stand as a witness and admitted that he had assured appellant that the premises could be used for a chicken ranch; other lot owners testified that they had purchased lots on the same assurances and had erected chicken houses on them; the protests against the maintenance of the houses by appellant were originated by a lot owner who was engaged in the same business. On the record presented here the equities appear to be wholly with the appellant; but an application for injunctive relief rests primarily in the discretion of the chancellor, and an appellate court may not exercise its discretion upon the equities alone unless it is evident that there has been a clear abuse of discretion. Appellant does not contend that such is the case here, but merely argues the equities as though we were hearing the cause in the first instance.

Upon the grounds urged, the judgment must be affirmed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. HENRY.★
(Civ. 3378.)

District Court of Appeals, Third District, California. Dec. 1, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 31, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨728(3)—Facts in offer of proof excluded by trial court should be set forth in specification of error.

In order to secure review of ruling of trial court on excluded offer of proof, the facts offered to be proved should be set forth in specification of error, in order that it may be determined whether such proof was competent or material or relevant to any issue.

2. Payment ⇨33(4)—Contractor directing application of payments for materials had no right thereafter to direct different application.

If contractor, purchasing material for different jobs, had right to direct application of moneys paid to seller, he would have no right or authority, after such application was rightfully made, to direct a different application of same funds.

3. Payment ⇨38(1)—Contractor had no right to direct application of payment on accounts kept separately merely for convenience and constituting one debt (Civ. Code, § 1479, subd. 1).

Where accounts between materialman and contractor for lumber and material on different jobs were kept separately merely for convenience and constituted but one debt, for which contractor was primarily obligated, contractor had no right under Civ. Code, § 1479, subd. 1, to require payment to be applied towards extinction of one of obligations in preference to others.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—Judgment will not be reversed because findings were signed less than five days after service (Code Civ. Proc. § 634).

Judgment will not be reversed because findings were signed by trial court prior to expiration of period of time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 634, since such section is merely directory, and, even though findings were signed less than five days after proposed findings were served, validity of judgment would not be impaired thereby.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨277(2)—Proof of ownership of property is unnecessary, where answer in action to foreclose mechanics' lien did not deny allegation of ownership.

Where answer in action to foreclose mechanics' lien did not deny allegation of ownership of property, ownership was thereby admitted, and no proof was necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. C. De Garmo, Judge pro tem.

Two separate actions by the Hammond Lumber Company against Louis Henry, tried together by stipulation. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant, Louis Henry, from two judgments entered against him in favor of the plaintiff and respondent, Hammond Lumber Company.

Respondent, Hammond Lumber Company, brought an action against appellant on February 23, 1922, to foreclose a mechanic's lien for the sum of $868.63. Respondent, on June 15, 1922, brought another action against appellant seeking to recover the sum of $3,614.96, which sum also includes the amount claimed in the mechanic's lien case.

The complaint in the last action is set forth in three causes of action—the first for goods sold and delivered; the second on an open book account; and the third on an account stated between the parties.

The answer in the last case, as originally filed, did not constitute a denial at all, and the court permitted an amendment to the answer during the trial, which constituted, in effect, a general denial by appellant that any sum whatever was due to the plaintiff.

Appellant also filed a cross-complaint in the second case, alleging that he had been damaged on account of respondent's failure to deliver the lumber and materials promptly, etc.

By stipulation of the parties, both cases were tried together by a judge pro tempore, sitting without a jury, but separate findings and judgments were made and entered in each case.

In the mechanic's lien case, judgment was entered for plaintiff in the sum of $558.73 and costs, but provided as follows:

"That all sums recovered herein shall also be applied as credit on said judgment in action No. 107402 when paid."

In the other case, which is numbered 107402, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,167.80 and costs.

Appellant made a motion for a new trial before Hon. F. C. Valentine, judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, which was denied.

The bill of exceptions, which purports to set forth the material testimony adduced at the trial, is so incomplete, ambiguous, and unintelligible that we find it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to obtain a clear understanding of the facts. Only a few disjointed excerpts of the testimony are set out in the bill of exceptions, and nothing is therein contained from which we can determine what amount was due respondent at any time—no basis for any calculation at all.

Appellant assigns nine errors, in which he claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings, but no particulars in which he claims the evidence is insufficient to justify any particular finding are pointed out in the assignment of error, or set forth anywhere in the record. If the specifications in the assignments of error were considered sufficient, still we have no bill of exceptions from which we can intelligently review the evidence. Notwithstanding this faulty condition of the record, we have endeavored to consider the case upon its merits, and pass upon all the points raised by appellant for a reversal.

It appears that the appellant was a general contractor and builder, engaged in the construction of a number of houses in and near Los Angeles, and had bought a great deal of building material at different times, such as lumber, cement, lime, etc., from the respondent, and that it was the custom of appellant and respondent to keep a separate account for each building; for example, all material that was purchased by appellant and used in the construction of a building at 209 Cypress avenue was charged by respondent to Louis Henry, 209 Cypress avenue job.

Appellant, while apparently conceding that he is indebted to respondent in some amount, complains that the court limited the proof to three different building jobs, and that an account has been stated on these three buildings; that respondent could only recover on this stated account, and, if the credits had been properly applied, there would be nothing due plaintiff on these "jobs." In the so-called bill of exceptions we find this noted:

"Defendant offered to prove certain facts relating to the delivery of lumber by plaintiff to defendant at addresses other than 837 (including 845) West avenue, 741 West avenue, and 209 Cypress avenue, and the court thereupon stated that the evidence introduced by plaintiff and the issues involved in said action were limited to lumber furnished to defendant at those three addresses, and that the proof which should be received should be limited to said issues, and the court on plaintiff's objection refused to admit any other evidence, and the case was tried on the theory that those issues only were involved."

[1] From this specification of error we are unable to review the ruling of the trial court, for the reason that it merely says that the defendant offered to prove "certain facts." The facts offered to be proved are not set forth, and we are unable to say whether the proposed proof was competent or material or relevant to any issue in the case. If appellant desired to have this ruling of the trial court reviewed, he should have made an offer of what he expected to prove and have it inserted in the record. The findings, however, show that respondent has proven each and all of the three causes of action as set forth in the second case.

[2] Appellant also contends that certain payments made by him to respondent were not credited as he directed. The record contains considerable correspondence between appellant and respondent as to the proper application of the various remittances made by appellant to respondent, and it appears that the respondent applied these moneys as directed by appellant at the time of payment, and also thereafter made a number of transfers of credits from one job to another at appellant's request, but finally refused to make any further transfers of credits as requested by appellant. If it be conceded that appellant had the right to direct the application of the moneys paid to respondent to any particular job, certainly, after such application had been rightly made, as directed by appellant, he would have no right or authority to thereafter direct a different application of the same funds. Cardinell v. O'Dowd, 43 Cal. 589. See, also, Flynn v. Seale, 2 Cal. App. 665, 84 P. 263; Ray v. Borgfeldt, 169 Cal. 253, 146 P. 679; Hammond Lumber Co. v. Fanta, 179 Cal. 652, 178 P. 503; Hanson v. Cardano, 96 Cal. 441, 31 P. 457.

[3] We are, however, of the opinion that the principle contended for by appellant, and provided for in section 1479, subd. 1, Civil Code, to the effect that one who is indebted to the same person on several obligations may. In making a payment, require that it be applied towards the extinction of one of the obligations in preference to the others, has no application to the facts in the case at bar, for the reason that the appellant Henry was indebted to the respondent Hammond Lumber Company, on but one obligation for lumber and building material of all kinds sold and delivered to him, and not upon several obligations. The accounts were kept separate merely for convenience, and constituted one debt, which Henry was primarily obligated to pay. Pacific A. Corp. v. Bank of Italy, 59 Cal. App. 76, 209 P. 1024. If, in making the various payments, he had stated to respondent that the money came from a certain owner of a certain building, or was the money of another person against whom a lien might be filed, then the situation would be entirely different, but no such statements appear in the record.

[4] Appellant further contends that the judgment should be reversed because the findings were signed by the trial court prior to the expiration of the period of time prescribed by section 634, Code of Civil Procedure. There is no merit whatever in this contention. Section 634 of the Code of Civil Procedure is merely directory, and, even if the facts be as contended by appellant, that the trial court directed findings, and that the findings were signed less than five days after the proposed findings were served on the defendant, nevertheless the validity of the judgment would not be impaired thereby. Sadicoff v. Jackson, 48 Cal. App. 256, 189 P. 111; Amundson v. Shafer, 36 Cal. App. 398, 172 P. 173; First National Bank v. Williams, 54 Cal. App. 537, 202 P. 164.

[5] Appellant also contends that there is no evidence to sustain the finding as to the ownership of the property involved in the mechanic's lien case. An inspection of the answer of appellant shows that he never at any time denied the allegation of ownership of the property. The ownership of the property was therefore admitted, and no proof was necessary.

We are of the opinion that the judgments should both be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

(Civ. 6037.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 25, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 194(6)—Defendant introducing evidence on allegations of cross-complaint cannot, for first time on appeal, object that allegations were admitted by failure to deny them.

Defendant may not lull plaintiff into repose by introducing evidence on allegations in his cross-complaint and by failing to object to plaintiff's controverting evidence thereon, and on appeal for first time object that allegations of cross-complaint were admitted by plaintiff's failure specifically to deny them in his pleadings, and that therefore they could not be controverted by evidence or findings.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 410(1)—Trial court's finding, supported by evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Finding of trial court, supported by sufficient evidence in record, will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Boundaries $\S$ 37(5)—Evidence held to warrant finding that defendants' grantor was not induced to encroach on plaintiffs' lot by acts or silence of plaintiffs so as to estop plaintiffs.

Evidence in ejectment action held to warrant finding that defendants' grantor was not induced to encroach on plaintiffs' adjoining lot in constructing apartment house by any acts or conduct of plaintiffs nor by their silence so as to estop plaintiffs from claiming strip encroached on, but showed that encroachment was caused by mistake of defendants' surveyor in establishing line.

4. Boundaries $\S$ 46(1)—Validity of agreement locating boundary rests on parties' understanding that they are establishing true line, and proof of agreed location must be clear.

Validity of agreement locating boundary line rests on the belief or understanding of the parties that they are establishing the true dividing line agreed to be established because they are uncertain as to its actual location, and proof of such agreed location must be clear.

5. Boundaries $\S$ 48(7)—Mere acquiescence in wrong boundary, if true one can be ascertained from deed, is mistake which does not constitute agreement fixing boundary or estop either party.

The mere acquiescence in the existence of a fence or other improvement and the occupancy of the land does not amount to an agreement that such fence or improvement is on an accepted boundary line, but, where there is an acquiescence in a wrong boundary when the true boundary may be ascertained by the deed, it is treated both in law and equity as a mistake, and neither party is estopped from claiming the true line.

6. Injunction $\S$ 5—If encroachment is intentional, absence of present damage to owner of land encroached on does not defeat his right to mandatory injunction.

Though owner will ordinarily be left to his legal remedy where encroachment on his property is slight and cost of removing it will be great and corresponding benefit to adjoining owner small or compensable by damages, if the encroachment is intentional the absence of present damage to owner of land encroached on will not defeat his right to a mandatory injunction requiring removal of encroachment.

7. Injunction — Facts held to entitle plaintiffs to mandatory injunction requiring defendants to remove 4½-inch encroachment of apartment house.

Where defendants' grantor built apartment house encroaching 4½ inches on plaintiffs' adjoining lot without leaving any space between the building and wall of plaintiffs' house, though his own erroneous survey showed ¾-inch space between his line and plaintiffs' house, and though plaintiffs' rain gutter extended about 4 inches over line of his survey, held, that plaintiffs were entitled to mandatory injunction requiring removal of the encroachment as being intentional and not result of accident or innocent mistake, and absence of damage to plaintiffs and great cost of removing encroachment did not defeat plaintiffs' right thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Paul Agmar and others against Aaron Solomon and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. L. Benjamin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wright, Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco (Randell Larson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs brought an action in ejectment to recover the possession of a lot of land having a frontage of 25 feet and 6 inches on Washington street, San Francisco. The defendants filed an answer denying the material allegations of the complaint, and by way of cross-complaint defendants Aaron Solomon and Hazel Solomon, his wife, prayed the court for a decree quieting their title to a strip of land 4½ inches wide by 102 feet in depth, and it is the ownership of this strip of land that is in dispute. The remaining defendants have no interest in the land, being only tenants of defendants Aaron Solomon and Hazel Solomon.

It is conceded that the plaintiffs established the record title to the whole of the lot of land described in the complaint, including the land in dispute, to be in themselves, such title antedating the acquirement by Koenig—grantor of defendants Aaron Solomon and Hazel Solomon—of the land adjoining on the west the land of plaintiffs, and that such record title continued in plaintiffs up to and including the rendition of judgment herein. Koenig after acquiring title to the lot of land adjoining plaintiffs on the west, which record title did not include the strip of land in dispute, had his lot surveyed. This survey of Koenig's lot included in the survey the strip in dispute and which was a part of plaintiffs' lot, and it is conceded that this survey was incorrect in including within the boundaries of Koenig's lot such strip of land. Koenig built an apartment house according to the lines of this survey, building it upon his lot and over and upon this strip of land in dispute, which was in the possession of plaintiffs and to which they held the record title. The judgment adjudges that:

"The said defendants Aaron Solomon and Hazel Solomon, and their grantees and successors, remove at once from said described piece or parcel of land (the strip in dispute) the portion of the building now situate thereon and all obstructions of any sort now situate thereon."

From the judgment entered herein and from the order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

Appellants urge in support of their appeal that the admissions of the answer to the cross-complaint are conclusive as to the matters thus admitted, and cannot be controverted by the evidence or the findings; that the plaintiffs by their acts and conduct are estopped from claiming the possession of the land in dispute, and the court erred in awarding the plaintiffs relief by mandatory injunction.

[1] As to the first point urged, that "the admissions of the answer to the cross-complaint are conclusive as to the matters thus admitted, and cannot be controverted by the evidence or the findings," it may be said that at the trial of the case counsel for appellants assumed that all the material allegations of the cross-complaint were denied. Not a suggestion was made in the trial court as to the allegations of the cross-complaint being admitted, and no objection was made to the introduction of evidence to controvert such allegations. This objection cannot therefore be urged for the first time on appeal. "This court does not look with approval upon the practice of trying a case in the lower court upon the theory that the pleadings are sufficient, and, without making any objection to them or to the evidence, raising the point here for the first time that some of the issues were in fact admitted. The plaintiff should not be allowed to lull the defendant into repose by introducing evidence upon each and every issue, and allowing the defendant to do the same, and then, if the verdict or decision is against him, to say for the first time in this court that some of the allegations of the complaint were not denied." Weidenmueller v. Stearns Ranchos Co., 128 Cal. 623, 625, 61 P. 374, 375. "It is well settled that where the parties have proceeded to trial upon a pleading, without objection to its sufficiency to raise a particular issue, and evidence has been received as to the fact, and the issue found upon, the party whose duty it was to object will not be heard in this court to say that the finding is not within the issues." Illinois Trust & Savings Bank v. Pacific Railway Co., 115 Cal. 285, 297, 47 P. 60, 63. This has been the rule in this state since the earliest cases. In Tulley v. Tranor, 53 Cal. 274, we find this language:

"We have repeatedly held that where a cause has been tried in the court below upon the theory of an issue joined, a plaintiff cannot here for the first time demand judgment upon the admissions of defendant's plea."

In contravention of the rule quoted from the foregoing cases, appellants cite a number of decisions, and particularly direct our attention to White v. Douglass, 71 Cal. 119, 11 P. 860, McKee v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 159 Cal. 207, 113 P. 140, and Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 147, 204 P. 583. In White v. Douglass the court uses this language:

"Where a complaint in an action contains an allegation of fact which is distinctly and unqualifiedly admitted by the answer, there is no issue as to the fact. The allegation of the fact being admitted is conclusive. A finding against the admission is therefore outside the issues, and a judgment based upon such a finding, or upon a finding, which is not justified by or is contrary to the evidence, cannot be sustained."

In that case the cross-complaint of the defendant contains the allegation:

"That pursuant to his (defendant's) application, the land agent of the university filed in the United States Land Office at Stockton, California, an application to have said land located as part of the agricultural college grant—said application being made for the use and benefit of the defendant."

That allegation is not denied. The plaintiff answered it in the following words:

"Further answering, plaintiff admits that the land agent, upon the application of defendant, filed in the United States Land Office at Stockton an application to have the land located as a part of the agricultural college grant, and that the application was made for the use of the defendant."

In the present case a different situation is presented. Most of the facts alleged in the cross-complaint are controverted, leaving, however, a few alleged facts, which it is claimed are admitted by reason of a failure to specifically deny them. This failure to deny was evidently caused by oversight on the part of plaintiff's counsel, and, as no objection was made and no question raised in the trial court, we conclude that it was likewise an oversight on the part of defendant's counsel. He evidently thought all the material allegations of the cross-complaint were denied; otherwise he would not have offered evidence to sustain such allegations. In White v. Douglass, supra, it will be noted that the allegations of fact were "distinctly and unqualifiedly admitted by the answer," and the court there says:

"Where a complaint in an action contains an allegation of fact which is distinctly and unqualifiedly admitted by the answer, there is no issue as to the fact. The allegation of the fact being admitted is conclusive, * * * and a judgment based upon such a finding, or upon a finding, which is not justified by or is contrary to the evidence, cannot be sustained."

To the same effect is McKee v. Title Ins., etc., Co., cited. There the complaint avers that the hotel company is and has been ever since April 12, 1906, a corporation, existing under the laws of Arizona, which allegation is admitted by the answer. In view of this direct admission the court, as it did in White v. Douglass, supra, says:

"This is a conclusive admission, not to be controverted either by the evidence or the findings."

Appellants in their brief quote the following from Estate of Cover, supra:

"It is the rule that an admitted fact must be treated as 'found,' and if the court in this case had found adversely to the admitted fact that the deceased left estate in Los Angeles county we would be compelled to ignore such finding on this appeal."

In that case the allegation that the deceased left estate in Los Angeles county is distinctly and unqualifiedly admitted, as was the case in White v. Douglass, from which we have quoted.

The cases cited by appellants are not, in our opinion, in conflict with the rule laid down in Weidenmueller v. Stearns, supra, that a party to an action should not be allowed to lull the adverse party into repose by introducing evidence upon issues not denied and allowing the opposing party to do the same, and, if the verdict or decision is against him, to say for the first time on appeal (as in the case here) that some of the allegations of the cross-complaint were not denied.

[2, 3] There is no merit in appellants' second point, that "the plaintiffs by their acts and conduct are estopped from claiming the land in dispute." The trial court found "that said Koenig was not caused to construct the said apartment house in the manner or place in which the same had been constructed as stated in the cross-complaint, or to construct said fence as therein stated by reason of the act or acts or conduct of plaintiffs as alleged in the cross-complaint"; and, there being sufficient evidence in the record to support such findings, the finding will not be disturbed on appeal.

The facts are briefly these: Koenig first talked to the senior Agmar in the latter's home. Agmar, a man of 87 years of age, was at the time sick. Koenig informed Agmar that he had purchased the property adjoining his property, had had it surveyed, and was going to erect a building. Koenig testified as to his conversation with Agmar:

"I said, 'The survey shows it is clear, it is almost clear, the survey, well it shows one-eighth or one-fourth of an inch, some sort, from Mr. Agmar's residence—and then, I guess that is all he received as to that."

Nothing was said about the rain gutter until Koenig's building had been erected to the point where the rain gutter on the Agmar house stood in the way. Koenig also admitted that he said nothing about the fence in his conversation with Agmar. Koenig "believed" he showed Agmar his survey, but was not sure when he did so, while Agmar stated he did not see it. Not a thing was said about surveyor's stakes or marks. Then Koenig began to excavate for his building. It also appears from the record that Koenig moved a division fence to the line shown by this incorrect survey.

The following is the testimony to which appellants have directed our attention as establishing their contention that plaintiffs are estopped from claiming possession of the strip of land in dispute.

Charles J. U. Koenig, who constructed the apartment house, testified that while he was engaged in excavating his lot, he spoke to the plaintiffs about the necessity of deepening the foundation of the Agmar residence, and that as soon as plaintiffs deepened their foundation, he put in the foundation of the apartment house and built it close up against the foundation of the Agmar house, the Koenig foundation extending from the front of the Koenig lot a distance of 80 feet toward the rear of such lot, and that, during the entire time that he was engaged in the construction of the apartment house, none of the plaintiffs ever made any suggestion to him that he was building on the Agmar lot, and that he believed during all of such time that he was building the apartment house on his own lot.

Paul Agmar, one of the plaintiffs, and the father of the other plaintiffs, testified that he lived in the Agmar residence and had lived there continuously from 1912; that from the time of the acquirement of the Agmar property by the plaintiffs he had had the management of the property entirely in his own hands; that he bought the Agmar property in 1890, and that before he bought the property he had had a survey made of the property; and that he had retained the map of such survey ever since, and he produced the map in court. The map very plainly shows plaintiffs' lot to be 25 feet and 6 inches in frontage and to include the strip of land in dispute in this action. The witness further testified that when Koenig built the apartment house, he built it right up close against the Agmar residence, and that the apartment house is still in such position. The witness further testified that before Koenig started any work whatever on the Koenig lot, Koenig called on the witness and told him that he, Koenig, was going to build an apartment house on the adjoining Koenig lot, and that he had had a survey made of the Koenig lot, and that, according to such survey, the Agmar residence was over on the Koenig lot. The witness stated nothing to Koenig as to where the line of the Agmar property ran. Before such conversation the witness had believed that the Agmar residence was entirely on the Agmar lot and fully 4 inches from the boundary line between the two lots. Subsequently and before Koenig began any work on his lot Koenig told the witness that he was going to grade the Koenig lot, and that it would be necessary for the witness to build the foundation of the Agmar house further down than it then was. Later Koenig graded the Koenig lot, but left 4 inches of soil adjoining the Agmar foundation undisturbed so as to protect the Agmar foundation. Subsequently Koenig sent a building inspector to the Agmar house, who notified the witness that he must deepen the Agmar foundation so as to protect the Agmar building. The son of the witness then sought to have Koenig do the work of deepening the foundation of the Agmar house, offering to pay Koenig for doing the work, but Koenig declined to do the work.

Paul Harold Agmar, one of the plaintiffs, and a son of the plaintiff Paul Agmar, testified that his father had always had the management of the Agmar property; that Koenig built the apartment house right up against the Agmar residence, and left no space whatever between the two buildings; that while Koenig was excavating the Koenig lot, he spoke to the witness in the presence of the latter's father about the necessity of the father deepening the foundation of the Agmar house and told the witness that he, Koenig, could not go any further with the work on the Koenig lot until the Agmar foundation was deepened, and the witness then stated that he would take care of the Agmar foundation. Accordingly the foundation of the Agmar building was deepened before Koenig started work on putting in of the foundation of the apartment house. As soon as the work on the Agmar foundation was completed, Koenig started to build the foundation for the apartment house. The construction of the apartment house took several months, and during that time the witness lived in the Agmar house and observed the work of construction.

Albert R. Agmar, likewise a plaintiff and a son of the plaintiff Paul Agmar, testified that his father had always had the management of the Agmar property, and that while he, the witness, lived in the Agmar residence during the time Koenig was constructing the apartment house he never spoke to Koenig except to say, "How do you do."

These facts do not call for the application of the general rule of estoppel. Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674. Appellants have cited us to Dolbeer v. Living- ston, 100 Cal. 621, 35 P. 328, and Cummings v. Kearney, 141 Cal. 160, 74 P. 759, as authority for their contention that the general principles of estoppel are applicable to this case. The rule announced in the Dolbeer Case is:

"That 'where a person by word or conduct induces another to act on a belief in the existence of a certain state of facts he will be estopped as against him to allege a different state of facts.' * * * 'Estoppel in pais may be defined to be a right arising from acts, admissions, or conduct which have induced a change of position in accordance with the real or apparent intention of the party against whom they are alleged.' * * * 'Where a person tacitly encourages an act to be done he cannot afterwards exercise his legal right in opposition to such consent.'"

And the Cummings Case, while the court holds "Where a man has been silent when in conscience he ought to have spoken he will not be allowed to speak when conscience requires him to be silent," it also says that "his silence was not the only culpable thing, but the direct acts and requests evidenced by the writings herein set forth," and that "his acts and conduct, if allowed now to be questioned, would work a fraud upon the owner of the bond."

In the present case Koenig was not induced by the acts, admissions, or conduct of respondents to construct the apartment house so that the east wall rests upon the $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches of land in dispute and which in fact belongs to respondents, but it was placed there by Koenig through a mistake made by the surveyor employed by him, nor was Koenig misled by the silence of respondents. It was not respondents' silence, but the mistake in the survey, and which mistake cannot be charged to respondents, that controlled Koenig's action.

[4] Appellants contend that the rule of law as laid down in Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 634, 640, 103 P. 707, and a number of other cases cited by them to the same effect is applicable to this case. That rule is stated as follows:

"Where the boundary line between the lands of contiguous owners is doubtful or uncertain, and they by parol agreement fix and determine a dividing line between their respective tracts, said line being marked by the erection or maintenance of a fence or other equivalent structure along it, and thereafter the parties hold and occupy their respective lands to the boundary as so agreed on, the accuracy of such boundary line cannot be subsequently questioned by the parties establishing it, or by those claiming under either of them."

Here it is not claimed nor does the evidence admit of the claim that the false line established by Koenig, the grantor of appellants Aaron Solomon and Hazel Solomon, was acquiesced in for a period equal to the statutory period of limitations, it being contended that the boundary line shown by the incorrect survey made for Koenig was agreed to. Even the testimony summarized by appellants and upon which they base their claim does not establish an agreed boundary line.

The court found the following facts which find support in the evidence: That plaintiffs did not nor did either of them at any time state or agree with Koenig that the survey of Koenig's lot of land was true and correct or truly or exactly stated the exact location of the easterly boundary line of Koenig's land, or that the rain gutter encroached upon Koenig's land for a distance of $4\frac{1}{4}$ inches or any distance; that plaintiffs did not, nor did either of them, agree with Koenig to remove any rain gutter, or that any fence should be set back into plaintiffs' land for a distance of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches or for any distance, or that Koenig might or should erect said apartment house so that the easterly side thereof be built up to the boundary line as shown by said survey; that plaintiffs did not, nor did either of them, ever acquiesce in the truth or correctness of said survey or enter into any agreement that said survey truly or correctly stated the location of the dividing line, or that Koenig might build the said apartment house up to said easterly line of said Koenig's lot as shown by said survey; that the construction of said apartment house was not commenced with the consent of plaintiffs or either of them, or was not continuously proceeded with until its completion with their, or either of their, consent; and that said fence was not moved from its former location with the consent of plaintiffs or either of them.

The recent case of Wilder v. Nicolaus, 50 Cal. App. 776, 195 P. 1068, holds that the construction of a fence between adjoining landowners and acquiescence in its existence for many years does not establish the true boundary line in the absence of an agreement that the fence was on the true line. The court, quoting from Grants Pass Land & Water Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 456, 143 P. 754, says:

"When such owners, being uncertain of the true position of the boundary so described, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line. * * * And if the line is located and agreed to, not for the purpose of settling an uncertainty in the minds of the parties as to the position of the true line upon the ground, * * * or without the intent to fix the true line, such agreement is invalid and does not change the legal boundary nor affect the title of either party to the land he previously owned."

See, also, Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 741, 745, 130 P. 1061; Wheatley v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 169 Cal. 505, 514, 147 P. 135. This doctrine can only be invoked where adjoining owners, being uncertain of the actual position of the boundary, agree upon its true location. The validity of such agreement rests upon the belief and understanding of both parties that they are establishing the true dividing line. Friedman v. Southern Cal. Trust Co., 179 Cal. 266, 176 P. 442. The proof of such agreed location should be clear. Marcone v. Dowell, 178 Cal. 396, 405, 173 P. 465.

[5] The mere acquiescence in the existence of the fence or other improvement and the occupancy of the land would not amount to an agreement that such fence or improvement was on an accepted boundary line. Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 375, 186 P. 599. "Where there is an acquiescence in a wrong boundary, when the true boundary may be ascertained by the deed, it is treated, both in law and equity, as a mistake, and neither party is estopped from claiming to the true line. The boundary is considered definite and certain when by survey it can be made certain from the deed." Janke v. McMahon, 21 Cal. App. 781, 788, 133 P. 21, 24.

[6] The final objection that the court erred in awarding plaintiffs relief by mandatory injunction presents the most serious question. The authorities upon this point are collected in the notes under Pradelt v. Lewis, 297 Ill. 374, 130 N. E. 785, 14 A. L. R. 828, in which case the Supreme Court of Illinois holds:

"A mandatory injunction will ordinarily issue against the maintenance by a landowner of an encroachment on the land of an adjoining owner to compel the removal of such encroachment." 1 R. C. L. 378. The doctrine thus laid down by this authority finds support in the decisions [citing authorities]. It is true, as argued by counsel for appellants, that the courts have held that where the encroachment is slight and the cost of removing it will be great and the corresponding benefit to the adjoining owner small, or compensation and damages can be had, the court will ordinarily decline to compel a removal and will leave the complaining party to his remedy at law. 1 Corpus Juris, 1209. This last rule is sometimes stated as applying only when the encroachment is slight and unintentional. In such cases the owner will ordinarily be left to his legal remedy, and the extraordinary remedy by injunction will be allowable only when strong reasons therefor are shown; but if the encroachment was intentional, the absence of present damage to the owner of the land encroached on will not defeat his right to an injunction."

While there is some authority to the contrary, the rule stated is generally supported by the decisions and is, we think, the correct rule.

In Blake v. McCarthy (Sup. Ct.) 115 N. Y. S. 1014, 1015, the court in discussing the question uses this language:

"Plaintiff is entitled to the removal of this encroachment. It cannot be removed by execution, because of the damage to the remainder of defendant's property. By taking down the wall, it would impose a risk of damage upon the sheriff which he is not bound to incur in an execution. * * * Plaintiff is entitled in a single action to both legal and equitable relief in a case like this. He has enforced his legal right. The jury rendered their verdict for him. He is now seeking his equitable remedy by asking the interposition of the court to remove the encroachment. To this he is entitled."

Our attention has been called to but two California cases bearing upon this question. Respondents cite us to Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal. App. 119, 129, 180 P. 67, and the appellants cite Rothaermel v. Amerige, 55 Cal. App. 273, 203 P. 833. In the Felsenthal Case the court says:

"To justify the issuance of an injunction there must be substantial injury. Substantial 'injury,' however, does not necessarily involve substantial 'damage.' * * * The rule that a chancellor will refuse to enjoin when greater injury will result from granting than from refusing an injunction has no application where the act complained of is in itself, as well as in its incidents, tortious. In such case it cannot be said that injury would result from an injunction, for no man can be heard to say that he is injured by being prevented from doing to the hurt of another that which he has no right to do. When a suitor has brought his cause clearly within the rules of equity jurisprudence, the relief he asks is demandable ex debito justitiæ, and needs not to be implored ex gratia. There can be no balancing of conveniences when such balancing involves the preservation of an established right which will be extinguished if relief be not granted against one who would destroy it—yea, though the right be but that of a peasant to but a part of his small tenement. [Citing cases.] The obvious distinction between injury and damage—a distinction not always observed when dealing with the question before us—is emphasized by Mr. Wood, who, speaking of a man's right of dominion over his property and the jealous care with which the courts have ever guarded this sacred right, says: 'Whatever invades this right is a legal injury, whether damages ensue or not.' Wood on Nuisances, § 783—see, also, sections 376, 782. As is said in Learned v. Castle [78 Cal. 454, 18 P. 872, 21 P. 11], supra, speaking of an injury to another's land that is a nuisance per se: 'It is an injury to the right, and it cannot be continued because other persons (whether jurors or not) might have a low estimate of the damage which it causes. And especially is this so when the continuance of the wrongful act might ripen into a right in the nature of an easement or servitude. * * * The right to an injunction, therefore, in such a case does not depend upon the extent of the damage measured by a money standard—the maxim, de minimis, etc., does not apply.' Though dissenting from the majority decision in Sullivan v. Jones & L. Steel Co. [208 Pa. 540, 57 A. 1065, 66 L. R. A. 712], supra, Justice Mitchell was constrained to say that 'Where a clear legal right is being infringed, I agree that the remedy in equity is as mandatory as in law.'"

The Rothaermel Case, cited by appellants, is distinguishable from the present case. There plaintiffs' predecessor brought ejectment and obtained nominal damages in the sum of $1, and directing the issuance of a writ of assistance without further proceedings. Thereupon plaintiffs came into the ownership of the property and brought an action for a mandatory injunction, pleading the former judgment as establishing the right of ownership and possession in plaintiffs' predecessor, and praying that a mandatory injunction issue compelling defendant to remove a concrete foundation extending an inch and one-half on plaintiffs' land and also to remove a brick wall situated thereon, which, however, did not extend over and upon plaintiffs' land. The appellate court denied the remedy sought, holding it was a case where there was a bare legal right unsupported by any damage shown in which the plaintiff was without right to claim equitable relief. Here the circumstances are different. Defendants invoked the equity jurisdiction of the court through the allegations of their cross-complaint. The trial judge, sitting as a chancellor, found against their contentions and granted equitable relief to plaintiffs. The court was not passing upon a "bare legal right," but was determining the rights of the parties upon equitable principles. It would be a strange interpretation of the law that would permit one party to an action to beseech equity, and, when the court found his prayer for equitable relief unwarranted, to deny that court the application of equitable principles to the other party to the action. The appellants having asked equity cannot complain of equity merely because the court found the equities to be against them.

[7] In determining the relief to be granted the court had a clear understanding of the relative merits of the claims put forth by the respective parties. Koenig purchased the property adjoining that of respondents. His own survey showed that there was a space of but three-quarters of an inch between his line and the wall of the Agmar house. A cursory inspection would have shown him that the rain gutter of the Agmar house extended over his line about 4 inches. If he noticed this—and he probably did—he remained silent. This rain gutter standing out beyond the line shown on his own survey was an open and notorious notice to him and to all the world that the Agmars were claiming title beyond the line claimed by him. According to his own testimony, Koenig told Agmar that the Agmar house was "clear" of his line. Koenig erected his building up against the Agmar house in disregard of the space shown by his own survey. He ignored the fact that the rain gutter of the Agmar house extended out beyond the line of his survey. Koenig was the aggressor. Agmar was not asked to agree to anything or to acquiesce in anything. As to the expense of moving appellants' building the court had before it Koenig's own estimate of the cost, which was given as $1,500 to $2,000. But as the encroachment was intentional and was not the result of accident or innocent mistake, the cost of removing it or the absence of damage to the owner of the land encroached on will not defeat the right of such owner to a mandatory injunction. Pradelt v. Lewis, supra.

In the recent case of Owenson v. Bradley, 50 N. D. 741, 197 N. W. 885, 31 A. L. R. 1296, decided by the Supreme Court of North Dakota, the law on mandatory injunctions is discussed at some length. In that case a mandatory injunction was denied, but the reason for such denial was clearly stated and the power of courts to grant such relief definitely announced. There the relief was denied because of the fact that defendant in placing a concrete foundation and brick wall forming a part of a building 16¼ inches wide at one end and 3 inches wide at the other on plaintiff's lot, which was vacant and likely to remain so for a long period of time, was so placed through an innocent mistake. The authorities collected in the Owenson Case, where mandatory injunction was denied, all turn on the fact of an innocent mistake, but the rule is otherwise where the encroachment is not due to accident or innocent mistake. In the present case the court may well have concluded, and the granting of injunctive relief evidences that it did conclude, that the encroachment upon the land of respondents was not the result of accident or mistake, but was placed there with knowledge of respondents' claim of ownership—that Koenig had actual knowledge of such claim, or if he did not have actual knowledge, by the exercise of ordinary diligence he would have acquired such knowledge.

We think that, under the facts and circumstances here presented, the judgment entered was proper.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

87 Cal. App. 193

BLEY v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3341.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Nov. 30, 1927.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇨11(3)—Testimony that witness, whom dentist was accused of aiding to practice unlawfully, had previously pleaded guilty to practicing without license held inadmissible.

Testimony that witness, whom dentist was accused of having aided and abetted in unlawfully practicing dentistry, had pleaded guilty to practicing without a license 18 months after time alleged in accusation held inadmissible, in proceedings before the board of dental examiners for purpose of revoking license.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇨11(3)—Evidence improperly admitted in proceeding before board of dental examiners will be disregarded on certiorari.

Although in original proceeding in certiorari to review an order of the board of dental examiners revoking license to practice dentistry, order cannot be annulled on mere ground that evidence was improperly admitted, yet such evidence is to be disregarded in determining whether there was sufficient evidence to support order.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇨11(3)—Evidence held insufficient to establish that dentist aided another to unlawfully practice dentistry; "manage or conduct" (Dental Act, § 11).

On certiorari to review an order of the board of dental examiners revoking license to practice dentistry, evidence held insufficient to establish that dentist, whom petitioner was alleged to have unlawfully aided and abetted as unlicensed person, practiced dentistry during period of time alleged in accusation, within meaning of Dental Act (St. 1921, p. 236), § 11, providing that any person should be understood to be practicing dentistry within meaning of act who manages or conducts as manager, proprietor, conductor, or otherwise a place where dental operations are performed; to "manage or conduct a place of business" meaning to exercise control and direction thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manage.]

4. Physicians and surgeons ⇨11(2)—Right to practice dentistry may not be taken away on mere suspicion or conjecture.

The right to practice dentistry, acquired by several years of study and training, is a property right which is not to be taken away by mere suspicion or conjecture.

Original application for a writ of certiorari by Frederic A. Bley to review an order of the Board of Dental Examiners of California revoking the petitioner's license to practice dentistry. Order annulled.

Levinisky & Jones, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the respondent board, hereinafter referred to as respondent, revoking petitioner's license to practice dentistry.

The accusation upon which such order is based charges that:

The petitioner herein "did aid and abet an unlicensed person, to wit, J. P. McEnroe, to practice dentistry unlawfully in the state of California, in that the said Frederic A. Bley did during the period embraced between the 20th day of December, 1925, and the 10th day of January, 1926, practice dentistry in an office known and designated as 913 Fulton street, in the city of Fresno, state of California, and which said office was owned and conducted by the said J. P. McEnroe, * * * and that in so practicing dentistry at the said office, the said accused was under contract of employment to the said J. P. McEnroe; that the said 913 Fulton street * * * was a place where dental operations were performed; and that during all of said times the said J. P. McEnroe was and now is not entitled to practice dentistry in the state of California."

[1, 2] Respondent's return sets forth all the evidence taken at the hearing on the charge. It fairly appears therefrom that the petitioner practiced dentistry at the place and during the time alleged in the accusation. McEnroe testified that during the time alleged he and petitioner "owned the equipment in that office"; that each bought and owned one-half thereof; that the office sign read, "Dr. F. A. Bley, Using Progressive Dentists' System"; that the witness had no license to practice dentistry; that the receipts of the office during the period of time covered by the accusation were deposited in petitioner's name, and that the witness was paid a salary out of such receipts; that no profits were derived from the business, but that if there had been any profits they would have been divided equally between the witness and petitioner; and that the office equipment was purchased in petitioner's name because the witness was not a licensed dentist and therefore could not buy it in his own name. The foregoing is, in substance, all of the evidence tending to prove the charge against petitioner. Over petitioner's objection, McEnroe, who was a witness for the prosecution, was permitted to testify as follows:

"Q. You were charged with * * * practicing dentistry without a license in Fresno, recently, were you not? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. And upon that charge you pleaded guilty? A. Yes, sir."

This testimony was given June 23, 1927, about 18 months after the time alleged in the accusation. It was clearly inadmissible, and the objections thereto should have been sustained. While it is not permissible in this proceeding to annul the order on the mere ground that evidence was improperly admitted, such evidence is to be disregarded in determining whether there is sufficient evidence to support the order. Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 44 Cal. App. 26, 28, 185 P. 1006. It may be said further that no connection of any character was shown between the offense of which McEnroe pleaded guilty and that with which the petitioner was charged. It does not tend in the slightest degree to prove the charge, and it need not be further considered.

[3] It was incumbent on the prosecution to prove that McEnroe practiced dentistry unlawfully during the period of time alleged in the accusation. In this respect the proof entirely fails. Considering the evidence in the light most favorable to the respondent, it merely shows that McEnroe owned a half interest in the office equipment, received a salary, in an amount not stated, for undisclosed services, and would have received half the profits if there had been any. Section 11 of the Dental Act (St. 1921, p. 236) provides:

"Any person shall be understood to be practicing dentistry within the meaning of this act * * * (5) who manages or conducts as manager, proprietor, conductor, or otherwise a place where dental operations are performed."

[4] There is no evidence to justify the inference that McEnroe managed or conducted "as manager, proprietor, conductor, or otherwise a place where dental operations are performed." To manage or conduct a place or business is to exercise control and direction thereof. Gordon v. Industrial Acc. Co., 199 Cal. 420, 426, 249 P. 849; E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 180, 190, 193 P. 105, 16 A. L. R. 611. The evidence does not show that McEnroe had or exercised any voice whatever, either directly or indirectly, in the management or control of the place in question or the operations conducted therein. The right to practice dentistry, acquired by several years of study and training, is a property right which is not to be taken away on mere suspicion or conjecture. In Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 592, 84 P. 39, 40 (3 L. R. A. [N. S.] 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750), it is said:

"The right to practice medicine is, like the right to practice any other profession, a valuable property right, in which, under the Constitution and laws of the state, one is entitled to be protected and secured."

There being no evidence to prove the charge against the petitioner, he is entitled to have the order revoking his license annulled. Garvin v. Chambers, 195 Cal. 212, 223, 232 P. 696; Osborne v. Baughman (Cal. App.) 259 P. 70.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled, and the order revoking petitioner's license is annulled.

MEAGHER v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 3344.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇨11(3)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain order revoking license to practice dentistry.

Evidence in proceeding before board of dental examiners held insufficient to sustain order revoking license to practice dentistry.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇨11(2)—Dentist, to have aided or abetted unlicensed person to practice, must have had knowledge of such person's connection with office.

Dentist, in order to have aided or abetted an unlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully, must have had knowledge of such person's connection with dental office wherein dentist was working.

Original application for certiorari by C. E. Meagher to review an order of the Board of Dental Examiners of California revoking the petitioner's license to practice dentistry. Order annulled.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of review by which the petitioner seeks the annulment of an order of respondent board, hereinafter referred to as respondent, revoking his license to practice dentistry in this state.

The accusation upon which the petitioner was tried alleges that between December 1, 1925, and January 31, 1926, he "did aid and abet an unlicensed person, to wit, J. P. McEnroe, to practice dentistry unlawfully in the state of California, in that the said C. E. Meagher did" during that period "practice dentistry in an office" which "was owned and conducted by the said J. P. McEnroe, * * * and that in so practicing dentistry at the said office, the said accused was under contract of employment to the said J. P. McEnroe;" that said office "was a place where dental operations were performed"; and that McEnroe was not, during said time, "entitled to practice dentistry in the state of California."

McEnroe, as a witness for the prosecution, testified as follows:

"Q. What was your business, Mr. McEnroe, during the period embraced between the 1st day of December, 1925, and the 31st day of January, 1926? A. I was associated with Dr. Bley * * * at Fresno.

"Q. Were you in business with him at Porterville? * * * A. Yes, sir. Now, as far as Dr. Meagher is concerned, * * * he knew nothing about the connection of that office, and as far as he is concerned, he thought that Dr. Bley owned the office. * * *

"Q. Did you have connection with this office in Porterville during the period embraced between the 1st day of December, 1925, and the 31st day of January, 1926? A. Yes, sir. * * * I practically owned the office. * * *

"Q. Did you own the equipment in the office? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Was Dr. Meagher employed in that office during that time? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Dr. Bley was in charge of the office, was he? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And was Dr. Bley associated with you in the ownership of it? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Do you recall any lettering or wording that appeared on that office at all? A. Dr. Bley's name. * * *

"Q. You are not licensed to practice dentistry, are you, Mr. McEnroe? A. No, sir. * * *

"Q. What was the purpose of the employment of Dr. Meagher in the office during that period of time? A. He was acting as manager for Dr. Bley."

The accused testified as follows:

"On the 30th of November, 1925, I was introduced to Mr. McEnroe through one of the supply men here in town (Los Angeles). Mr. McEnroe informed me that he wanted me to go to work in the Porterville office of Dr. Bley. He represented himself to me as being a messenger from Dr. Bley down here to get a man, and I accepted the employment and went to Porterville. While I was there, Mr. McEnroe did not come in the office and neither did Dr. Bley. My money there in the Porterville office was banked to the credit of Dr. Bley as dentist, and my checks, my pay checks, came from Fresno the same way. I left Porterville January 19th, having been there 6 weeks. * * * My pay checks were mailed to me from the Fresno office, * * * signed by Dr. Bley.

"Q. Did you ever see Dr. Bley while you were at the office? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you ever have any conversation with him during the time that you were employed there? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you ever get any instructions from him? A. Only indirectly, * * * from what Mr. McEnroe told me. * * *

"Q. Did you know where Dr. Bley was all during that time? A. In Fresno.

"Q. Did you ever make an endeavor to get in touch with him there? A. I did; yes, sir. * * * I drove to Fresno on two different occasions in the evening. * * *

"Q. And you did not find him? A. No, sir."

[1, 2] The evidence produced by the prosecution and the testimony of the accused show without conflict that he had no knowledge of McEnroe's connection with the dental office in question. Such "knowledge is necessary before it can be said that a dentist has aided or abetted an unlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully." Osborne v. Baughman (Cal. App.) 259 P. 70, hearing denied by Supreme Court October 21, 1927. This point being decisive of the cause, other objections made by petitioner need not be considered.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled, and the order revoking petitioner's license is annulled.

ANGELUS LEASING CO. v. STEPHENS. (Civ. 4778.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 2, 1927.

Frauds, statute of § 139(1)—Oral agreement to permit assignment of lease held not within statute, where lessor performed (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5).

In action for money due as consideration for oral agreement permitting assignment of lease, lessee could not defeat liability on ground that agreement was void under Civ. Code § 1624, subd. 5, requiring agreements for leasing or transfer of interest in realty to be in writing, where lessor performed part of his agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Angelus Leasing Company against Ivan O. Stephens or I. O. Stephens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Earl E. Moss, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Geo. H. Shellenberger, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Defendant, the appellant herein, leased a store from plaintiff, the respondent herein. The lease contained a provision that it could not be assigned without the written consent of the lessor. The parties entered into an oral agreement whereby plaintiff permitted the assignment for a consideration which the trial court found to be $225. The written consent was given, and defendant refuses to pay any part of the consideration, resting his refusal upon the claim that the agreement is void under subdivision 5 of section 1624 of the Civil Code.

That this claim is without foundation is well answered by quoting from the opinion in the case of Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 P. 159:

"When it is clearly and unequivocally made to appear that there has been a performance by a party of his part of an oral agreement required by the statute * * * to be in writing, under such circumstances as to make it inequitable to allow the other party receiving the benefit thereof to repudiate it on the ground that it was not in writing, he is estopped from doing so."

To the same effect are the following cases, to which many others could be added: McMenomy v. Talbot, 84 Cal. 279, 23 P. 1099; Hefferman v. Davis, 24 Cal. App. 295, 140 P. 716; Leavens v. Pinkham, etc., 164 Cal. 243, 128 P. 399; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 30 P. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133; Mills v. Jackson, 19 Cal. App. 695, 127 P. 655; *Colon v. Judgment affirmed.

CHAN YO CHOW et al. v. LIM SING.
(Civ. 5698.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1927.

1. Parties —80(6)—Though personnel of plaintiff partnership was not same as when defendant bought goods, defendant waived objection by not pleading defect of parties by demurrer or answer (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 430, 433, 434).

Although personnel of partnership bringing action against defendant for price of goods sold and delivered had changed since defendant bought goods, and certain of the then partners were not joined and others who were not then partners were joined, plaintiff waived objection under Code Civ. Proc. § 382, providing that parties united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants, by not pleading defect of parties by demurrer or answer, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 433, 434.

2. Parties —80(1)—Where defendant did not plead defect of parties, objection was waived notwithstanding contention that defendant could not maintain counterclaim, where counterclaim was not pleaded (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 430, 433, 434).

Where defendant, in action for goods sold and delivered, did not plead defect of parties under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 430, 433, the defect was waived, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 434, notwithstanding defendant's contention that he was unable to obtain benefit of counterclaim against plaintiffs bringing action, where defendant did not plead counterclaim, and consequently trial court had no opportunity to rule on question of whether it would have been good against plaintiffs' bringing the action.

3. Action —1—Plaintiff's right of action is not affected by or dependent on defendant's right to counterclaim.

The right of a plaintiff to maintain an action against a defendant is not affected by or dependent on the right of a defendant to assert a counterclaim.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Chan Yo Chow and others, doing business under the firm name and style of Quong Lee & Co., against Lim Sing. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse A. Mueller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert L. Levy, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover the purchase price of goods sold and delivered. The complaint contained two counts, one declaring on an open account and the other on an account stated. The allegations were in the usual form; it being alleged among other things that plaintiffs were copartners and that they had duly filed and published a certificate of copartnership to do business under the fictitious name of Quong Lee & Co. Judgment was rendered in plaintiffs' favor, and the defendant appeals.

During the trial, defendant admitted the sale and delivery of the goods to him, but claimed there, as here, that plaintiffs were not the vendors, and that, since they had neither alleged nor proved an assignment to them of the indebtedness sued upon, they were not entitled to a judgment based thereon.

The facts are as follows: For several years preceding the commencement of the action a number of Chinese conducted a copartnership business under the fictitious name of Quong Lee & Co., the personnel of the partners having changed from time to time. Defendant purchased the goods in question from said copartnership during the years 1922 and 1923, at which time it consisted of forty members. In 1925, and prior to the commencement of this action, thirty-two members thereof retired, but the business continued to be operated under the partnership name by the remaining eight partners and two others who are joined with said eight remaining members as plaintiffs herein. The evidence does not show, however, when the two new partners entered the firm, nor whether they acquired their interests by purchase from retiring members or bought in after the retirement of the latter.

[1] In view of the foregoing facts defendant makes the legal contention that the retirement from the firm of the thirty-two members in 1925 operated as a dissolution of the then existing copartnership, and the establishment of a new one consisting of those remaining, and that therefore, in the absence of an assignment of the account to those continuing in the operation of the business, the original forty members alone were entitled to maintain an action thereon. However, defendant did not plead a defect of parties plaintiff either by demurrer or answer; his demurrer being based upon the grounds of insufficiency of facts and that the allegations relating to the contents of the partnership certificate were uncertain and unintelligible, and his answer consisting merely of denials of the material averments of the complaint. We are therefore of the opinion that under the rule established by numerous decisions he is deemed to have waived the point now urged by him. As said in Williams v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 110 Cal. 457, 42 P. 974:

"Our legislation provides that of the parties to an action, those who are united in interest, must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants (Code Civ. Proc. § 382); that the defendant may demur to a complaint for defect of parties plaintiff (section 430); that, if the defect does not appear on the face of the complaint the objection may be taken by answer (section 433); and that, if objection on that ground be not taken by demurrer or answer the defendant is deemed to have waived the same (section 434)."

And, after reviewing a number of cases from this jurisdiction and others, the court concludes:

"We are of the opinion, following the incontestable trend of authority, that the absence as parties of some of the partners from a complaint by one or more of them on a partnership demand does not, strictly speaking, affect the merits, and in order to be considered must be pleaded by the defendant."

The foregoing rule was later approved and followed in the case of Ah Tong v. Earle Fruit Co., 112 Cal. 679, 45 P. 7, which is closely analogous in principle to the present case. There the language of the court was as follows:

"It is argued that plaintiff should not recover because the evidence shows he had a partner who was interested with him in the demand sued upon, and who is not joined as a party to the action; conceding that such was the evidence, yet, as the objection was not raised by the pleadings, it was waived. Williams v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 110 Cal. 457 [42 P. 974]."

The case of Russ v. Tuttle, 158 Cal. 226, 110 P. 813, adheres to the same doctrine, holding as follows:

"Where the complaint shows upon its face that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, or that there is a defect of parties plaintiff, the defendant may demur (Code Civ. Proc. § 430), or, if the ground does not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer (Code Civ. Proc. § 433). But if the objection is not taken either by demurrer or answer, the defendant is deemed to have waived it (Code Civ. Proc. § 434). In the absence of a plea of defect of necessary parties plaintiff, one of several parties jointly interested in a claim may recover the whole amount due"—citing Wendt v. Ross, 33 Cal. 650; Trenor v. Central Pac. R. Co., 50 Cal. 222; Williams v. Southern Pac. R. Co., supra; Ah Tong v. Earle Fruit Co., supra.

To the same effect are Ahlers v. Smiley, 163 Cal. 200, 124 P. 827, and Baker & Hamilton v. Lambert, 5 Cal. App. 708, 91 P. 340.

From the authorities cited, we conclude that, irrespective of the merits of the legal question presented as to whether or not the retirement of the thirty-two members in 1925 had the effect of dissolving the copartnership of forty members, and even assuming, as defendant contends, that it did have such effect, and that consequently, in the absence of an assignment of the debt, the present action should properly have been commenced jointly in the names of the original forty members, the judgment rendered herein is not erroneous because, as said in Russ v. Tuttle, supra, in the absence of a plea of defect of necessary parties plaintiff, any number of the parties jointly interested in the claim may recover the whole amount due.

The cases of Weinreich v. Johnston, 78 Cal. 255, 20 P. 556, and McCord v. Seale, 56 Cal. 262, upon which defendant relies, are not controlling here, for as said in Ahlers v. Smiley, supra:

"Those cases merely hold that a variance arises when persons are described as individuals in the caption and as partners in the body of a pleading and that proof of partnership liability or credit will not sustain a personal judgment or vice versa. It is to be noticed that the doctrine announced in these cases has been somewhat modified in the later cases of Williams v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 110 Cal. 461 [42 P. 974], and Grangers' Union v. Ashe, 12 Cal. App. 757 [108 P. 533]."

[2, 3] Defendant further contends that, because the action was not brought jointly by the original forty copartners from whom he purchased the goods, he was unable to obtain the benefit of a counterclaim for commissions due him from them, amounting to a sum greater than that sued for. But defendant did not plead the counterclaim, and consequently afforded the trial court no opportunity to rule upon the question of whether or not, in view of the defect in parties plaintiff, the same would have constituted a valid counterclaim to the demand upon which these plaintiffs were suing. We are therefore of the opinion that the assumption of an adverse ruling does not entitle the defendant to claim error. Furthermore, and in any event, the right of a plaintiff to maintain an action against a defendant is not affected by nor dependent upon the right of the defendant to assert a counterclaim. The cause of action of each is separate and distinct from the other, and the plaintiff's cause of action is not subject to defeat merely because as against it the defendant's counterclaim is not maintainable.

For the reasons given, we believe the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

GALLAGHER v. J. W. WRIGHT & SONS
INV. CO. (Civ. 6006.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 3, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ☞446—Improvement assessment held not void because of extension of time for performance of work.

Street improvement assessment held not void because supervisors had extended time for the contractor to complete the improvements, after the original time for the completion of the contract had expired, as against contention that an extension must be granted, if at all, before the expiration of the original time stated, under the theory that supervisors could not, under city ordinances, extend a contract no longer in existence.

2. Municipal corporations ☞446—Ordinance permitting supervisors to extend time for completion of contract for street improvement held valid.

Where, in an action to foreclose a public contract street improvement lien, defense was made that the street assessment was void, since the contract providing for the original improvement had been unlawfully extended under power allegedly conferred by ordinance, after the time for contract's completion had expired, ordinance held valid, since it was not a usurpation of authority by such legislative body, and consequently assessment was valid.

3. Trial ☞389—Findings held waived under stipulation constituting the entire trial, eliminating controverted facts.

In action to foreclose public contract street improvement lien, findings held waived under stipulation made in open court constituting the entire trial, since there were no controverted facts on which court should have found.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by E. J. Gallagher against J. W. Wright & Sons Investment Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer and F. W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Oscar Samuels and Jacob Samuels, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This action is one to foreclose a public contract street improvement lien under San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1918. The contract was entered into under date of October 20, 1923. It provided that the work should be done within 90 days. This time expired January 18, 1924. On January 9, 1924, prior to the expiration of the time within which the work was to be completed, pursuant to a previous request by the contractor, the board of public works recommended to the board of supervisors the granting of the desired extension, and on January 21, 1924, three days after the expiration of the original time called for by the contract for the completion of the work, the board of supervisors granted the desired extension, and the work was completed on February 19, 1924, within the life of the extension.

This appeal is limited to two points—both of law. The first point urged is that "this street assessment is void, as the work was not done within the time fixed by contract, and the extension was not granted within the life of the contract," and the second that "findings were not waived, and there are no findings the basis of any judgment."

The ordinance of 1918 under which the work was performed, in so far as it affects the question here presented, provides, quoting from section 18:

"Upon the recommendation of the board of public works, the supervisors may by resolution passed by a majority vote thereof, grant extensions of time within which to complete the said work. No recommendation for an extension of time beyond the expiration of the time of the first extension shall be made by the board of public works unless the application of the contractor therefor, in each instance, is supported by a certificate from the city engineer certifying that at least the major part of the work contracted for has actually been done, or by evidence satisfactory to the said board that the failure to have done the required measure of work was not due to lack of diligence in the prosecution of the work on the part of the contractor. All applications for such extensions of time must be filed in the office of the board of public works before the expiration of the original time fixed in the contract, or of the time granted by extension, as the case may be. In case an extension of time be granted by the supervisors after the expiration of the time originally fixed in the contract for the work, or after the expiration of the time granted in any further extension therefor, the time so granted shall be deemed to commence and be effective from the date of such expiration."

Quoting from section 27:

"No assessment, warrant, diagram, or affidavit of demand and nonpayment after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the board of public works to recommend to the supervisors the ordering of the improvements has been actually published and the notices of improvement posted as in this ordinance provided."

Section 47:

"The provisions of this ordinance shall be liberally construed to promote the objects thereof, and no error, omission, or irregularity in connection with the proceedings thereunder not affecting a substantial right of a party interested shall invalidate any of such proceedings."

Appellant urges that recovery is denied respondent because he was tardy in securing from the board of supervisors an extension of time—that “legislative bodies cannot, nor can courts, re-create, restore to life an act or thing that has ceased to live. When the time fixed in the contract has expired, jurisdiction is lost. The act is dead.” In support of this contention appellant relies upon certain California cases dealing with extension of time to prepare a bill of exceptions or statement of the case or to file a notice of motion for a new trial. Each of these cases is predicated upon a particular Code section held to qualify the jurisdiction of the nisi prius court.

Appellant also advances certain street assessment cases, commencing with Mahoney v. Braverman, 54 Cal. 569, and concluding with Kelso v. Cole, 121 Cal. 121, 53 P. 353. The cases cited are all considered in Oakland Paving Co. v. Whittle Realty Co., 185 Cal. 113, 195 P. 1058, and City Street Imp. Co. v. Watson, 50 Cal. App. 687, 195 P. 967. In the Oakland Paving Co. case it is recognized that the decision in each of the cases cited by appellant was based upon the wording of the particular statute involved without regard to the effect of any saving clause, and there it is said:

“In view of the foregoing, we have no hesitation in saying that the failure of the contractor to secure his extension of time until the day after the contract period had expired, even if the work was then uncompleted, was an ‘informality’ in the prior proceedings which was cured by the provisions of section 26.”

[1] The ordinance of 1918 in the quoted portion of section 27 is in the identical words of the curative clause of the Improvement Act of 1911 before the court in the Oakland Paving Co. Case, and therefore in affirming this judgment we do not have to rely upon analogy, but upon a complete parallelism. It may further be said that in the present case section 18 of the ordinance ex industria provides that an extension given under the very conditions here existing may be granted.

[2] With respect to the power of the Legislature—in this case the board of supervisors—to enact such a provision as section 18 of the ordinance under consideration, the court, in City Street Imp. Co. v. Watson, supra, quoting from Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81, uses this language:

“The Legislature undoubtedly could have enacted a valid law, which would have authorized the extension of the contract after the time first fixed had expired.”

And again:

“It may be conceded that it is a ‘jurisdictional’ requirement that the time must be extended within the time limit of the contract, but it is not one of the jurisdictional requirements necessary to constitute due process of law, and hence is cured.”

There the Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730) was under consideration containing two curative clauses identical with those appearing in sections 27 and 47 of the improvement ordinance of 1918, quoted, on which sole reliance was placed. The act of 1911, however, did not contain the additional provision that an extension granted after the expiration of the original time should relate back to the date of expiration of such time.

Further, with reference to this point, appellant urges that:

“If there was any justification for any such claim (that the ordinance of 1918 authorizes the board of supervisors to extend the original time after its expiration) such ordinance in that respect would be void and unconstitutional.”

In support of this contention appellant cites Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 P. 427. There the Legislature passed a statute attempting “to vitalize a dead contract and validate a void assessment for street work,” and the statute was held unconstitutional. Appellant also refers to Flinn v. Shafter Realty Co., 190 Cal. 316, 212 P. 194. That case and the present case are distinguishable upon the ground that the 1913 ordinance under consideration in the Flinn Case specifies that “the contract shall be void if the work is not completed within the time prescribed and that no assessment shall issue.”

[3] As to appellant’s second point that the court made no findings, and, findings not being waived, they were essential, it may be said that a stipulation made in open court constituted the entire trial. After stipulating to the date of the contract, the original time within which the work should be completed, the date of recommendation by the board of public works to the board of supervisors that the extension be granted, the date of the passage by the latter board of its resolution granting the extension, the date of signing by the mayor and the date of the completion of the work, there follows:

“With that stipulation otherwise all the facts alleged in the complaint are admitted.”

Consequently, there were no controverted facts upon which the court should have found. There was an agreed statement of facts, not evidence.

In support of this latter contention appellant relies principally upon Monteverde v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. App. 252, 212 P. 690. In that case, by stipulation, evidence was introduced from which different inferences could be drawn requiring findings thereon indicating the inference drawn by the court. Here ultimate facts were agreed upon, and the following excerpt from the Monteverde Case, quoted from Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 P. 364, is applicable:

“There have been several rulings by this court to the effect that the want of findings affords no ground for reversing a judgment where the facts have been agreed upon.”

This principle is so firmly grounded that it is thus referred to in Fernandez v. Watt, 26 Cal. App. 89, 146 P. 47:

"It needs no citation of authority to support the proposition that findings upon admitted facts are not required."

In our opinion, there is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer and F. W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Oscar Samuels and Jacob Samuels, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action to foreclose a public contract street improvement lien under San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1918.

The action was tried upon the following facts stipulated in evidence: The contract mentioned in each count of the complaint was entered into on the 20th day of October, 1923, and it provided the work called for thereby should be completed within 90 days from such date, and that the work was not completed within that time. Upon the request of the contractor, the board of public works did, on the 9th day of January, 1924, transmit to the board of supervisors its recommendation that an extension of 90 days be granted unto the contractor to complete the work. The board of supervisors on the 21st day of January, 1924, 3 days after the expiration of the original time prescribed by the contract for the completion of the work, passed its resolution granting the application for an extension of time of 90 days to perform the work, which resolution was approved by the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco on February 1, 1924. The work called for by the contract was not completed until February 19, 1924. Judgment went for plaintiff, and from this judgment defendant has appealed.

The question here presented is passed upon in E. J. Gallagher v. J. W. Wright & Sons Investment Co. (No. 6006), 261 P. 1041, this day decided by this court, and on the authority of that case the judgment is affirmed.

Oscar Samuels and Jacob Samuels, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action to foreclose a public contract street improvement lien under San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1918.

The action was tried upon the following facts stipulated in evidence: The contract mentioned in the complaint was entered into on July 22, 1920, and provided that the work called for thereby should be completed within 150 days from such date, and it was not completed within that time. Upon request of the contractor, the board of public works did, on December 13, 1920, transmit to the board of supervisors its recommendation that an extension of 90 days be granted the contractor to complete the work. The board of supervisors, on December 20, 1920, one day after the expiration of the original time prescribed for the completion of the work, passed its resolution granting the application for the extension of time for a period of 90 days, and the resolution was approved by the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco December 23, 1920. A further extension of time was granted from and after March 19, 1921, and the work was completed within the life of such second extension. There also appears in the stipulated evidence the fact that no assessment or lien was made, entered, recorded, or imposed upon the roadbed, rolling stock, or property pertaining to the municipal car system, for the payment of any portion of the expense of such improvement, but, as this fact is not touched upon in the briefs on file in E. J. Gallagher v. J. W. Wright & Sons Investment Co., upon which this case is submitted, we assume no point is made because of the failure to assess the property of the municipal car system.

The question here presented is passed upon in E. J. Gallagher v. J. W. Wright & Sons Investment Co. (No. 6006), 261 P. 1041, this day decided by this court, and on the authority of that case the judgment is affirmed.

In re BRIGHTMAN'S ESTATE.
DESMOND et al. v. BRIGHTMAN.
(Civ. No. 5837.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 21, 1927.

Executors and administrators ~~C~~216(2)—$4,000 allowed attorneys for extraordinary services in defending will held not abuse of discretion.

$4,000 allowed attorneys for extraordinary services in defending contested will held not an abuse of discretion, where facts showed that counsel prepared motion to strike contest, and amended contest to probate of will, examined large amounts of correspondence, traced accumulation of the property and family relations for years, and whether testator had delusions, conducted search of precedent law applicable, and held many conferences, and witnesses testified that value of services to estate was $5,000.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. S. Crail, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Latham H. Brightman, deceased. From an order allowing Walter J. Desmond and others attorney's fees for extraordinary services, Mary C. Brightman, as executrix, appeals. Affirmed.

Denio, Hart, Taubman & Simpson, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This appeal is from an order allowing the sum of $4,000 to the respondents, $1,000 of which had already been paid, as attorney's fees for extraordinary services. The facts are briefly: That appellant is the widow of decedent, and the sole legatee under and executrix of the last will and testament of deceased, except that $4,000 was willed to the daughters of deceased by a former marriage; that, after the admission to probate of the will, a contest was filed by Clarence E. Brightman, a son of the deceased by a former marriage, in which the contestant alleged unsoundness of mind on the part of the testator and undue influence exerted upon the testator by appellant as grounds for the revocation of the order admitting the will to probate, and also averred that, by reason of undue influence by appellant upon deceased, and with a preconceived plan to defraud the heirs of the deceased, she had through a course of years secured to be placed in her name property belonging to deceased, of great value. The estate which was inventoried amounted at appraised values to the sum of $23,240. Respondents prepared and filed a demurrer and motion to strike, and upon argument the demurrer was sustained. An amended contest was filed, to which respondents also interposed a demurrer and motion to strike. The demurrer to the count on undue influence was sustained without leave to amend, and an answer was prepared, served, and filed responsive to the count alleging unsoundness of mind. On March 2, 1925, when the case was called for trial, and respondents were ready to proceed, with their witnesses in court, the contest was dismissed. While it appears from the evidence that Mrs. Brightman was possessed of considerable property, title to which might have been open to attack had the will been set aside, and which she was bound to inherit, if in fact it belonged to the estate, if the will stood, yet we are of the opinion that this is beside the question. If services were rendered to Mrs. Brightman in this respect, it was to her individually, and not to the estate. It also appears, however, and this bears upon the question at issue, that, in addition to the work done and already recited, counsel examined large amounts of correspondence, traced the accumulation of the property and the family relations for years, and whether the deceased had any delusion concerning the relation of the sons to him; conducted a search of the precedent law applicable to the case; and held many conferences. Two witnesses testified that the value of the services in their opinion was $25,000, and that of this sum the value of the services rendered to the estate was $5,000.

Counsel for appellant argue that the court should not have taken into consideration the amount of property standing in the name of Mary C. Brightman, title to which was indirectly protected against possible litigation by the defense to the contest. However, it does not appear that the court did consider this element. In fact, in addition to the presumption which we must indulge in favor of the order in this respect, the evidence of the two witnesses that $25,000 was a reasonable fee for the services rendered, of which $5,000 was a reasonable charge against the estate, would seem to indicate that the distinction was well in the mind of counsel and the trial judge. The fee allowed for the services rendered is considerably less than that testified to by the witnesses. It does not appear to have been arbitrarily assessed, nor does it appear, after a consideration of the character of the effort put forth, that there was an abuse of discretion by the trial court in arriving at the amount. As conceded by appellant, the rule is that "the order of the lower court as to attorneys' fees will not be interfered with except in case of a plain abuse of discretion." Freese v. Pennie, 110 Cal. 470, 42 P. 978; Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 418, 63 P. 838. See, also, Estate of Duffill, 188 Cal. 536, 206 P. 42.

PEOPLE v. DARDEN. (Cr. 996.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 410—Tacit admission of counsel in running argument does not rise to dignity of specific admission.

Tacit admission of state's counsel, disclosed by record as occurring in running argument, does not rise to dignity of specific admission.

2. Indictment and information § 196(5)—Defendant, who proceeded to trial under information charging maintenance of liquor nuisance "to the present time," waived objection that information covered time subsequent to filing original complaint (Pen. Code, §§ 995, 996).

Defendant, charged by information with maintaining liquor nuisance continuously "to the present time," waived objection to time covered by information and testimony thereunder as to sales of liquor after date of filing original criminal complaint in magistrate's court, under Pen. Code, §§ 995, 996, where defendant went to trial on charge as contained in information.

3. Indictment and information § 196(5)—Objection to information charging offense at period subsequent to original complaint must be presented on arraignment (Pen. Code, §§ 995, 996).

Objection to information on ground that it charges commission of offense over period subsequent to that covered by original criminal complaint must be presented on arraignment; otherwise, it is waived, under Pen. Code, §§ 995, 996.

4. Criminal law § 373—Evidence of common practice immediately before or after date alleged is admissible to prove continuing offense.

Evidence of common practice of defendant immediately before or after date charged is properly received in evidence to sustain charge of continuing offense, where matters testified to are sufficiently near time charged to indicate intent, plan, and purpose.

5. Criminal law § 373—Testimony as to sales made within reasonable period after filing original criminal complaint, where supplementing evidence of prior sales, is admissible to prove liquor nuisance.

In prosecution for maintaining common nuisance by keeping place for sale of liquors, where testimony showed large numbers of sales over period alleged in information and prior to filing of criminal complaint in magistrate's court, testimony as to other sales, made after filing of complaint, but within period of information, was admissible to show intent, even if date of filing complaint could be considered.

6. Criminal law § 373—Determination of what constitutes reasonable period before or after time charged, within which evidence of continuing offense is admissible, is for trial court.

What constitutes reasonable period before or after time alleged in information, within which evidence of continuing offense may be admitted, is for trial court's determination.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Edwin Darden was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance by keeping a place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hale Day, of Los Angeles, E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, and Donald McKisick, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted in the county of El Dorado of the crime of maintaining a common nuisance in the town of Diamond in said county, in that he kept a place where intoxicating liquors were bartered and sold. The information charged that said nuisance was maintained from November 1, 1926, continuously "to the present time." This information was filed June 10, 1927. The defendant entered a plea to this information without interposing any motion to set aside the same on the grounds specified in section 995 of the Penal Code, as said section then stood. Trial was had under this information on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of July, 1927. Upon a conviction of the defendant, he moved for a new trial, and upon denial of that motion, and subsequent sentence by the court, defendant appealed from the order of the court denying said motion and from the judgment of conviction herein.

[1-3] In appellant's brief but one point is urged for the reversal of the judgment and order of the trial court. Appellant claims that, as the original criminal complaint herein was filed in the magistrate's court on "May 31, 1927," it was error on the part of the trial court to admit testimony of sales of intoxicating liquors after "May 31, 1927." The record before us does not disclose the date upon which the original criminal complaint herein was filed in the justice's court. It is quite true that the record discloses a tacit admission of the district attorney that such was the date of said filing, but it is only so shown in a running argument, and does not rise to the dignity of a specific admission. There is no direct proof as to when the complaint was originally filed.

It is now too late to question the information in that respect. Defendant went to trial upon the charge as contained in the information. Had defendant even attempted during the trial to introduce testimony of the date of the filing of the original criminal complaint, for any purpose in the way of challenge to that pleading, such testimony would have been subject to objection. There was a time and a place when it might have been proper to question this information. That time was upon arraignment, and the grounds of objection are laid down in said section 995 of the Penal Code. Section 996 of the Penal Code specifically provides that, if the objections permitted by section 995 are not made, the defendant is deemed to have waived them. See People v. Knight, 63 Cal. App. 65 and 66, 218 P. 79.

[4-6] Conceding that an objection was before the trial court as to testimony of sales, either before or after the time covered by the criminal complaint, as the same was claimed to have been in the magistrate's court, or under the information as filed, we are of the opinion that, if sufficient testimony was given of such illegal sales within the dates from November 1, 1926, until May 31, 1927, testimony could then be properly received of such sales both before and after these dates, but within a reasonable period either before or after, to be determined by the trial court. The gist of the offense charged was its continuing character. It must have been proven to have been "common" or "habitual," and evidence of a common practice, even at dates immediately before the date charged, and after, are properly received in evidence to sustain such charge, providing they are sufficiently near the time charged to evidence intent, plan, and purpose.

As we construe the testimony given, it was relevant to prove the habitual doing of the illegal acts. A large number of sales within the period described were given in evidence. A few related to times before the period covered by the charge, and a few after the 31st day of May, 1927. It is apparent from the evidence at the trial that, while some witnesses did say sales occurred along in the first of June, or along the last part of May or first of June, none testified to a positive date after June 10th. In section 382 of Wigmore on Evidence it is said:

"The prior or the subsequent existence of such a fact (a course of human conduct) is always evidential to show its existence at a time in issue, upon the general experience that such facts involve a human attitude more or less continuous and permanent. The probability of continuance depends much, of course, on the nature of the specific fact and the circumstances of each case, and therefore, in setting a limit of time for the range of the evidence, the discretion of the trial court should control. The principle is illustrated by many sorts of facts. Such evidence is receivable to show the mode of conducting a business, the keeping of liquors illegally. * * * The occasional repudiation of such evidence in some of the above precedents is not to be taken as a negation of the general principle, but only as a determination that in the case at hand the contingencies of change were too many to allow the prior or the subsequent condition of things to be of probative value, or that no presumption of continuity (post, section 2530), in the strict sense, will be enforced."

The order of the trial court denying defendant's motion for a new trial and the judgment of conviction herein are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action for damages for eviction by Otto Miller and others against Mrs. Miriam Nathan and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellants.

Keith C. Eversole, of Ukiah, for respondents.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs entered into possession of lands in Mendocino county under a lease from the defendants for a period of five years from May 16, 1922. The rent reserved by the lease was the sum of $40 per month, beginning June 1, 1922, and payable on the 1st day of each month thereafter, except that on October 1 of each year the sum of $800 was payable. The lessees made the monthly payments of rental up to the first October payment. In the month of September a large stack of hay belonging to them was burned and they received $432 insurance thereon, which was paid by them to the defendants on account of the $800 October installment. The defendants Locke and Mason live outside of Mendocino county, and their co-owner and lessor, Mrs. Nathan, resided in that county and received all payments and transacted all business connected with the leased premises. At the time of the payment of the insurance money the plaintiffs notified Mrs. Nathan that they would not be able to pay the balance of the October installment and offered to give her a note for it. After some negotiations between the parties a note was given and accepted by defendants payable twelve months after date, with the agreement that when the grain crop was planted on the premises a new note would be given secured by a mortgage on the crop. The monthly instalments of rent falling due thereafter were paid by plaintiffs and accepted by defendants up to and including the one due January 1, 1923. On January 27 a constable and deputy sheriff served upon plaintiffs a notice signed by defendants, by Mrs. Nathan, informing plaintiffs that unless they vacated the premises action for possession would be begun immediately, and setting forth as the reason that a breach of the lease had been committed in not paying the installment of rent due in October, and other alleged breaches. This notice began with a "scare head" in large letters and equally large words, and directed plaintiffs to deliver possession to one E. M. Whitney as defendants' agent. It was accompanied by a letter from Whitney on his letterhead as "United States Commissioner, Justice of the Peace, Notary Public, Insurance," in which they were told that, "While I do not want to commence a suit against you for possession of the property I will have to do so unless everything can be arranged satisfactory immediately." Within a few days after the service of this notice and letter the plaintiff Miller had several meetings with Whitney, at which the latter urged Miller to vacate the premises and avoid a lawsuit. Within a week after the service of the notice defendants filed an action in Whitney's court for $299 on account of the October installment, and attached wood on the leased premises belonging to plaintiffs. It appears that plaintiffs were ignorant and inexperienced in the law and did not know what their rights were in relation to the controversy between them and the defendants. Plaintiffs vacated the premises a few days later, and thereafter brought this action for damages for eviction.

The case was tried before a jury which found for plaintiffs and assessed their damages at $2,500. Judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict, from which defendants appeal.

[1] Upon the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case defendants made a motion for a nonsuit upon the specific ground that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the charge of eviction. The motion was denied. The questions raised by this appeal are in effect the same as in the motion for nonsuit. Appellants rely in support of their position on the case of Black v. Knight, 176 Cal. 722, 169 P. 382, L. R. A. 1918C, 319. In that case the plaintiff surrendered possession of the leased premises after entry of judgment in an action of unlawful detainer brought against him by the defendant, which judgment was finally reversed by the Supreme Court. No execution had been issued upon the judgment and no demand for possession thereunder had been made. The court held that there was no disturbance of the plaintiff's possession which would support a charge of eviction. The court, however, disclaimed making any definition of what facts would constitute an eviction.

We think the plaintiffs were under all the circumstances justified in quitting the premises. The service upon them of an imposing and peremptory notice by defendants' agent with his many and magniloquent titles, the agent's subsequent issuance in his capacity of justice of the peace of an attachment for a debt admittedly not due which was levied upon their personal property, his repeated urgent demands that they quit possession and avoid another lawsuit, all within the space of a few days, constituted an intensive campaign against which the plaintiffs in their state of general apparent ignorance could not, and evidently were not expected to, stand. The evidence was sufficient to justify the judgment as to the eviction.

[2] The further contention is made that the amount of the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. It is enough to say that the evidence as to the damages suffered by plaintiffs was conflicting, and the finding of the jury will not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte STEIGER. (Cr. 1571.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 19, 1927.

1. Intoxicating liquors ☞132—Offense of unlawful possession of liquor held governed by state law and not federal law (Pen. Code Cal. § 17; Pen. Code U. S. § 335 [18 USCA § 541]).

Offense of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor in violation of the Wright Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3784), which adopted the Volstead Act, considered as an offense against state law, is governed by Penal Code Cal. § 17, and not by Penal Code U. S. § 335 (18 USCA § 541).

2. Criminal law ☞90(2)—Unlawful possession of liquor held "misdemeanor" within jurisdiction of municipal court of Los Angeles (Pen. Code, § 17).

Considered as an offense against state law, unlawful possession of liquor is "misdemeanor" under Pen. Code, § 17, and is within jurisdiction of municipal court of the city of Los Angeles.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and second Series, Misdemeanor.]

3. Criminal law ☞1188—Pronouncement of sentence after 12 o'clock noon on Saturday would only require remand of prisoner for sentence.

That sentence of conviction was pronounced after 12 o'clock noon on a Saturday, which time is a legal holiday, would only require that prisoner be remanded for sentence.

4. Criminal law ☞1144(17)—On record showing pronouncement of sentences on Saturday, it is presumed that it was before noon.

Where record shows that sentences were pronounced on a stated date, which was a Saturday, it was presumptively before noon, and appellate court cannot go outside of record for evidence to the contrary.

5. Criminal law ☞991(1)—Court had jurisdiction to order sentences to be made consecutive, where convictions were of record before any sentence was pronounced.

Where three convictions were of record before any sentence was pronounced, court did not exceed its jurisdiction in ordering sentences to be made consecutive rather than concurrent.

6. Habeas corpus ☞50—Habeas corpus is not available because court exceeded its jurisdiction in ordering sentences to be made consecutive, until expiration of first period of sentence.

That court exceeded its jurisdiction in ordering sentences to be made consecutive instead of running concurrently, furnishes no ground for writ of habeas corpus prior to expiration of first period of sentence.

Application by Louis A. Steiger for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner is in jail pursuant to three sentences for violation of the "unlawful possession" provisions of the Wright Act, all within the city of Los Angeles. In each case the charge states and the conviction establishes two prior convictions of like offenses.

The statutory provisions involved are Wright Act (Deering's General Laws, 1923 Edition, p. 1396); Volstead Act (Barnes' Federal Code, 1919-1924 Supplement, pp. 848, 849, and 858).

[1, 2] First point: That the municipal court was without jurisdiction; that under section 335 of United States Penal Code (18 USCA § 541) the alleged offenses were felonies, because they were subject to imprisonment for a term exceeding one year. We think that the character of the offense, considered as an offense against a state law, is governed by the Penal Code of the state and not by the Penal Code of the United States. Under section 17 of the Penal Code of California, the several offenses charged are misdemeanors. It is true that they are what are commonly called "high-grade" misdemeanors, but they are within the jurisdiction of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. In re Luna (Cal Sup.) 257 P. 76; People v. Daault (Cal. App.) 253 P. 151.

[3, 4] The second point is that the judgments are void because each of them was pronounced after 12 o'clock noon on a Saturday, which time is a legal holiday. If the fact as to the hour of the sentence may be inquired into in this proceeding, as against the presumption of regularity on the face of the record, it would appear that this point is well taken. In re Dal Porte, 198 Cal. 216, 244 P. 355. At most, however, this would only require that the prisoner be remanded for sentence. But as the record shows sentences pronounced on the 19th day of March, 1927 (which was a Saturday), this presumptively was before noon, and we cannot go outside of that record for evidence to the contrary. In re Selowsky, 189 Cal. 331, 208 P. 99.

[5, 6] The third point is that the sentences should run concurrently and that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in ordering that they be made consecutive. The cases cited are In re Cohen, 198 Cal. 226, 244 P. 359, and Ex parte Casey, 160 Cal. 357, 116 P. 1104. There is no merit in the point stated. So far as appears (and the petition so alleges), the convictions were of record in all of the cases before any sentence was pronounced. In re Mann, 192 Cal. 393, 220 P. 305. Besides, even if the point were well taken, it would not furnish ground for a writ of habeas corpus prior to expiration of the first period of sentence.

The petition is denied.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 706(5) — That driver of truck colliding with automobile might have avoided collision does not prove negligence.

In action for death of plaintiff's intestate while driving as guest in automobile which was struck by defendant's truck when car in which deceased was driving negligently attempted left turn, fact that truck driver might have performed or omitted certain acts which would have avoided collision does not prove that failure to do so was negligence, and does not establish that any such acts or omission would constitute proximate cause of death of deceased.

2. Trial $\S$ 108½ — In proper case, counsel may question jurors on interest in defendant's insurer.

In action for damages for death growing out of automobile collision, though it is improper for counsel to unnecessarily bring before jury claim that casualty company has undertaken to reimburse defendant for damages that may be awarded, counsel in proper case may ascertain by examination of jurors whether any of them are so interested in any such casualty company as to make them interested in litigation.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 688(2) — Exception to refusal to question jurors concerning interest in defendant's insurer held entitled to consideration on merits under record showing court examining jurors rejected question.

Record showing that court conducting examination of jurors refused to ask requested question whether any jurors were stockholders in insurance company indemnifying defendant, and instructed that question of insurance could not be brought before jury, held to entitle plaintiffs to consideration of exception to refusal to submit question of interest on its merits; it being error to allow jurors to sit in case in which they are financially interested.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(6) — Refusal to question jurors as to interest in defendant's insurer if error, was not prejudicial, where affidavit on motion for new trial showed no jurors were interested; "entire cause" (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

In action for damages for death growing out of automobile collision, refusal of request to question jurors as to interest in defendants' insurance carrier, if error, was not prejudicial, where affidavit by officer of insurer on motion for new trial, which constituted part of "entire cause" within Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, showed that none of jurors who tried case were interested in insurer, since verdict could not have been affected though questions were asked of jurors.

5. Jury $\S$ 131(6) — Refusal to permit jurors to state whether they were acquainted with truck drivers other than defendant held not error.

In action for damages for death of plaintiff's intestate riding in automobile struck by defendant's truck, refusal to permit jurors to state whether they were acquainted with any truck drivers or certain truck drivers other than defendant driver was not error.

6. Municipal corporations $\S$ 705(10) — Charge that truck driver's duty to avoid collision commenced when he saw peril, not when automobile was cutting corner, held proper.

In suit for damages for death of plaintiff's intestate riding in automobile struck by defendant's truck, instruction that truck driver's duty to stop and avoid accident, if possible, commenced when he saw occupants of automobile were in peril, and not necessarily when he saw automobile was going to cut corner, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Charlotte Sharkey and Clara Sharkey and others, minors, by Charlotte Sharkey, guardian ad litem, against C. L. Sheets and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bertrand J. Wellman, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

H. T. Morrow and Henry L. Knoop, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. In this action a jury trial resulted in a verdict for the defendants. The action was commenced by the surviving widow and minor children of Thomas Sharkey, deceased, for the alleged wrongful death of said deceased, claimed to have been caused by the negligent operation of a truck owned and operated by the defendants and respondents. The deceased was riding as a guest in a Ford touring car in the city of Los Angeles. The Ford, proceeding easterly on Whittier street, made a left-hand turn into Hillvale street and, in doing so, cut the corner. The truck was proceeding westerly on Whittier street and collided with the Ford at a point west of the center of Hillvale and north of the center line of Whittier. In cutting the corner while making the turn, the driver of the Ford car was negligent, but the deceased, being a guest, and in this case having no control over the operation of the car, was not guilty of contributory negligence. The jury by its verdict decided that the driver of the truck was not negligent in any way contributing to the injury or death of the deceased.

[1] Appellants contend that the verdict is contrary to the evidence in that it must necessarily be true that the driver of the truck was guilty of at least some negligence. They contend that had the truck driver stopped a little sooner, checked his speed a little more, or swerved his truck a very little more a collision would not have occurred and therefore his failure to do some one of these things must be accounted as actionable negligence in this case. The fact that the truck driver might have performed or omitted certain acts which would have avoided the collision does not prove that his failure to do so was negligent and neither does it establish that any such acts or omissions would constitute a proximate cause of the injury and death of the deceased. The evidence convinces us that it was entirely a matter within the province of the jury to decide in this case that the truck driver was guilty of no actionable negligence.

[2] The appellants claim reversible error in the action of the court in prohibiting counsel for the plaintiff from asking the jurors, when examining them on their voir dire, whether they were interested as stockholders or otherwise in the Individual Indemnity Insurance Company. The authorities hold that while it is improper for counsel unnecessarily to bring before the jury the claim or fact that a casualty company had undertaken to reimburse the defendant for such damages as may be awarded in the action, nevertheless, in a proper case and in a proper manner, counsel is entitled to ascertain by an examination of the jurors whether any of them are so interested in any such casualty company as to make them interested in the litigation. Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700; Arnold v. California

Portland Cement Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 183 P. 171; Baldarachi v. Leach, 44 Cal. App. 603, 186 P. 1060; Williamson v. Hardy, 47 Cal. App. 377, 190 P. 646; Murphy v. Shaffer, 58 Cal. App. 453, 208 P. 1003.

In the trial of this case the examination of the jurors seems to have been largely conducted by the court. After the trial judge had asked the jurors in the box collectively certain questions, he then appears to have become the interlocutor for the attorneys, who suggested the questions that they wished to ask the jurors, and the judge put them to the jurymen collectively in his own language. When this opportunity came to counsel for plaintiffs he stated, "I would like to know if any of the jurors are stockholders or interested in the Individual Indemnity Insurance Company." Whereupon the court responded, "I won't ask that. I will say to the jurors now that the question of insurance must not enter into this case. You will conclusively presume that there is no insurance and try the case as between plaintiffs and defendants without reference to any insurance." The court also stated, a few moments later, that insurance was not a matter that ought to be brought before the jury, and then asked counsel for plaintiffs to suggest further questions. Counsel for plaintiffs duly took exception to the ruling of the court.

[3] Respondents challenge the sufficiency of this record to show error in the ruling. Plaintiffs' counsel referred to the insurance carrier by a misnomer and also failed to pursue the inquiry vigorously and state the object and purpose of his question. Considering the manner in which the examination was conducted as a whole as shown by the record, we think appellants were not permitted to inquire concerning the interest or bias of the jurors in this respect and are entitled to a consideration of this exception upon its merits. To allow jurors to sit in a case in the outcome of which they are financially interested would be an error too grave to be excused for any slight cause.

[4] Respondents claim the error was not prejudicial because it has not been made to appear that any of the jurors finally selected to try the case were in fact interested in the insurance carrier of the defendants. This appears from the affidavit of the vice president of the Individual Underwriting Corporation, which was the corporate attorney in fact for the Pacific Automobile Indemnity Exchange, the insurance carrier of the defendants. According to this affidavit, none of the jurors who tried the case were members of the corporation nor of the exchange. This affidavit was used in opposition to the appellants' motion for a new trial. The affidavit used in support of the motion for a new trial contained nothing to the contrary. These affidavits constitute a part of the "entire cause" within the meaning of article 6, § 4½ of the Constitution. People v. Piero (Cal.

App.) 249 P. 541. Under these circumstances we are obliged to say that had the question been permitted the jurors under examination would have answered that they were not interested in the insurance carrier of the defendants. The error therefore cannot be said to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The same verdict would have resulted, and by the same jurors, even though the jurors had been permitted to respond to this question. None of them would have been excused for bias on this account.

[5] We see no error in the court's refusing to permit the jurors to state whether they were acquainted with any truck drivers or certain truck drivers other than the defendant.

Appellants complain of the refusal of the court to give plaintiffs' requested instructions numbers 1, 2, 4, 6, and 8. No argument is advanced to support the claim, although respondents have well pointed out the vice of the requested instructions refused by the court, and have pointed out where the valid parts of those refused were given by the court in substance in other parts of the instructions. Our examination discloses no error in the refusing of these instructions.

[6] The court properly stated in its instructions that the truck driver's duty to stop and avoid the accident, if he had time and could do so, commenced when he saw that the occupants of the Ford were in peril, and not necessarily when he saw the Ford was going to cut the corner. His duty arose from the obligation to avoid the injurious results of the Ford driver's negligence in cutting the corner if he could do so. This was not due to any rule of the road requiring him to yield the right of way to one making a left-hand turn at an unauthorized place, but due to considerations of humanity and ordinary care. The situation was like a case where the last clear chance doctrine applies despite negligence of the one injured.

The judgment is affirmed.

STRONG et al. v. MORRISON. (Civ. 5511.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1071(5)—In landlord's action for lease rescission, court's finding on lease rules held not error, because not required since lease provided lessor might change rules at will.

Where a landlord sued for rescission of a lease trial court's finding relative to landlord's rules affecting tenancy was not error, since such finding was not required at all as the lease provided the lessor might change the rules as he willed.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Reviewing court will not disturb trial court's finding where evidence conflicted.

A reviewing court will not disturb the trial court's finding where the basic evidence was conflicting.

3. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 48(1/2)—Tenant having exclusive grocery selling concession under lease could not hold landlord liable for damage from other tenants' infringement before informing landlord so condition could be corrected.

Where, in a landlord's action for rescission of a lease of space in a market house for grocery selling purposes, the tenant counterclaimed for damages for breach of the lease in that the landlord had permitted others to sell groceries in violation of the agreement for exclusive selling privileges, held, that the landlord was not liable for other tenants' infringement, in the absence of the tenant's having informed landlord of such infringement and given him a chance to correct the condition.

4. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 34(5)—In action for lease rescission, held that evidence not supporting counterclaim for damages would not support cross-complaint for rescission.

Where, in a landlord's action to rescind a contract leasing space in a market house with an exclusive grocery selling concession, the tenant filed a cross-complaint for rescission and also a counterclaim for damages, held, that evidence not supporting a counterclaim for damages would not support cross-complaint for rescission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Strong and others, doing business under the fictitious name of the Beverly Western Public Market, against E. A. Morrison. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward M. Selby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kemp, Partridge & Kemp and Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover rent for space in a market house leased by plaintiffs to defendant. The complaint is in two counts, one for rent reserved in a written lease, the other for the reasonable rental value of the premises. In each count there are, in addition, claims for advertising of defendant's business, and furnishing refrigeration in accordance with the provisions of the lease. Defendant counterclaimed for damages for breach of the lease, and filed a cross-complaint for rescission and for damages.

The court found for plaintiffs on all of the issues except the claim for advertising, and defendant appeals from the judgment.

All of the provisions of the rather lengthy lease, which was introduced in evidence, were for the benefit of the lessors except the covenant that the lessee should have "the exclusive grocery privilege in this market as represented by our catalog issued monthly," and the agreement of the lessors to "maintain and conduct a public market in the above-mentioned building." The lease also contained a provision that the lessee should "comply with the rules and regulations of the lessor as printed hereon now in force or which may hereafter be adopted."

On May 8, 1922, the defendant gave notice to plaintiffs of rescission of the contract of lease for failure to comply with the agreements to maintain a public market and to reserve to him the exclusive grocery privilege and other alleged breaches of the agreement. On August 19 plaintiffs gave notice to defendant to pay the sums due under the contract within 3 days or quit. On August 23 defendant surrendered possession of the leased premises.

[1] Appellant specifies in the bill of exceptions a number of particulars in which he claims the findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence, but all of the findings to which he objects, except those relating to the exclusive grocery privilege and lessors' agreement to conduct a public market, are findings as to "rules and regulations" of the lessors, not covenants on their part. It was not necessary for the court to find at all as to those, which were evidently to be observed by the lessee, and which he expressly agreed might be changed at any time at the will of the lessors.

[2] The term "public market," is used in the lease, manifestly in a sense which is not its common or ordinary significance. Both parties recognized this, as each introduced evidence to show its meaning in the locality.

This evidence was conflicting and the finding of the court will not be disturbed.

[3] The defendant wrote several letters to the plaintiffs complaining of violations of his exclusive grocery privilege, and had one or more conversations with them in regard to it, but it does not appear that the defendant ever made any specific statement to the lessors of more than a few articles of groceries which were being handled by other lessees. On the day on which he gave notice of rescission, he made an extended list of such articles, which was introduced in evidence. He did not at that time or later, although they had requested a specific statement, communicate it to the lessors. The nature and extent of infringement by other lessees of defendant's exclusive rights were matters which he was especially in a position to determine. The defendant himself admitted, on his cross-examination at the trial, that there were many articles as to which he complained which it was perfectly proper that other concessionaires should handle. In this indefinite state of his own mind as to the exact limits of his exclusive privilege, it was certainly his duty to point out to the lessors the specific articles and give them an opportunity to correct the condition. Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 P. 260. Not having done so, he cannot hold them liable for the damages he suffered by reason of the infringement.

[4] The defendant's claim of right to rescind the lease was based upon the same facts as those contained in his counterclaim. As the evidence did not support the latter, the trial court properly found against him on his cross-complaint for rescission.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BLACKMORE. (Cr. 1546.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Embezzlement ⇨23—Defendant retaining possession and selling automobile to corporation, which executed back conditional sales contract, was estopped, in embezzlement prosecution, to deny corporation's title.

Where defendant sold automobile to corporation, which executed back to him conditional contract of sale, car remaining in defendant's possession, and defendant promised when contract was delivered to deliver slip transferring title, but thereafter repeatedly put off officers of corporation with same promise, defendant was estopped, in prosecution for embezzlement, in which automobile was subject of the crime, to deny corporation's title.

2. Estoppel ⇨52—Doctrine of estoppel applies in criminal cases.

Doctrine of estoppel may be applied in criminal cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

D. M. Blackmore was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh L. Dickson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John M. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement, and appeals from the judgment.

The property which was the subject of the crime was an automobile. Appellant sold the car to a certain corporation for the sum of $1,675 and the corporation executed back to him a conditional contract of sale, the car remaining in appellant's possession. Thereafter the alleged embezzlement occurred. Appellant's sole contention is that at the time he sold the car to the corporation no delivery of possession was made, and this point is based upon the single ground that appellant, at the time of the sale, never delivered to the corporation a certain "pink slip" of paper. This slip is referred to continually in the testimony, and the evidence is undisputed that it was never, either at the time of the sale or afterward, delivered.

[1, 2] In his brief appellant does not acquaint us with the nature of the "pink slip," but his entire argument is based upon the idea that, if it had been delivered, the corporation would have been vested with the title to the car. It is possible that the slip was the certificate of registration referred to in sections 41 and 45 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Act 5128, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923), but, whether it was or not, we repeat that appellant treats it as if it were an all-sufficient muniment of title to the automobile. We think appellant is estopped to assert that the paper was not delivered to the corporation. Not only did he take from the organization the conditional contract of sale, which necessarily was based upon the idea that the corporation was the owner of the car, but the evidence showed that at the time the contract was delivered to him appellant promised to make delivery of the pink slip, and that he repeatedly put off the officers of the corporation afterward with the same promise. Under such circumstances he cannot be heard to deny the corporation's title. The doctrine of estoppel has often been applied in criminal cases, notably in People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 P. 630, 39 P. 524, and in People v. Leonard, 106 Cal. 302, 39 P. 617. We think it has a ready application here.

Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 28, 1927. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Statutes ⇨181(2)—Statute capable of reasonable and certain interpretation without straining will not be given unreasonable and uncertain interpretation.

A statute capable of a reasonable and certain interpretation without being strained will not be given an unreasonable and uncertain interpretation.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨290(1)—Statute held to authorize action in unlawful detainer for possession of building leased for "term" exceeding tenant's life expectancy (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161; Civ. Code, § 761).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, providing that "tenant of real property, for a term less than life, is guilty of unlawful detainer," held applicable to estates for years and at will, which are classified in Civ. Code, § 761, as estates for less than life, so as to authorize action in unlawful detainer for possession of building leased for 99 years, as against contention that act applies only to tenancy for term of years less than tenant's life expectancy, as word "term" may well refer to "duration of enjoyment" of estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Term.]

3. Constitutional law ⇨249—Landlord and tenant ⇨289—Unlawful detainer statute held not unconstitutional as depriving lessee of equal protection in denying right to set-off, counterclaim, or cross-complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, which provides uniform, though special and summary, proceeding in unlawful detainer for quick and ready determination of forfeiture of lease, is not unconstitutional as depriving lessee of equal protection of law in denying him right to set-off, counterclaim, or cross-complaint; classification being based on natural and reasonable distinction between such cases, which require prompt hearing and particular form of judgment, and ordinary cases at law or in equity.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(8)—Complaint in unlawful detainer held not demurrable for failure to plead service of notice to pay rent or quit on subtenants not shown to be in default.

Lessor's failure to plead in unlawful detainer that it had served notice to pay rent or quit on all subtenants, who were not shown to be in default, held not ground for demurrer.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(6)—Subtenants not in default need not be made defendants in unlawful detainer against tenant.

Subtenants not shown to be in default need not be joined as parties defendant in lessor's action of unlawful detainer against tenant.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(1)—Premature service of notice to pay rent or quit premises did not affect lessor's right to proceed in unlawful detainer under later notice.

That notice to pay July rent or quit premises was served on same day as notice of default, whereas lease authorized lessor to claim forfeiture if rent was not paid within 5 days from service of notice on lessee and 20 days after service of notice on leasehold mortgagee, and another claim of forfeiture for nonpayment of August rent was later served, did not affect lessor's right to proceed in unlawful detainer under subsequent notice served over 20 days after service of claim of default for nonpayment of July rent.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(1)—Validity of lessor's notice to pay rent or quit held not affected by disputed claim of offset for amount owed by lessor as subtenant.

Validity of landlord's notice to pay rent or quit premises was not affected by lessee's disputed claim of offset, based on theory that lessor owed amount, remitted by it, as lessee's subtenant under another name, in absence of showing of reason for remission.

8. Continuance ⇨26(3)—Refusal of continuance for absence of available witness held not abuse of discretion.

Refusal of continuance for absence of witness, who was available and could have been called by defendant during trial, held not abuse of discretion.

9. Landlord and tenant ⇨190(1)—Appointment of receiver in unlawful detainer, who assumes full possession and control of premises, is "eviction," relieving tenant from paying rent during receiver's occupancy.

Appointment of receiver in unlawful detainer, who assumes full possession and control of premises and collects rents from subtenants or removes them from possession, is eviction of tenant, and relieves him from payment of rent during receiver's occupancy; receiver being receiver of landlord as party entitled to possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Eviction (Of Tenant).]

10. Landlord and tenant ⇨190(1)—Any act of landlord dispossessing tenant amounts to "eviction," relieving him from paying "rent."

Any act of landlord which results in dispossessing tenant and depriving him of use, occupancy, and enjoyment of premises amounts to eviction, relieving tenant from payment of "rent," which is landlord's right to receive compensation from tenant for benefits accruing to him from his possession and enjoyment of land.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Rent.]

11. Landlord and tenant ⇨314—Defendants' right to redeem by depositing in court amount of judgment in unlawful detainer within five days is substantial one, of which they cannot be deprived by trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1174).

Privilege granted every defendant in unlawful detainer proceedings by Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, to redeem by depositing in court amount found due within five days from entry of judgment, is a substantial right, of which he cannot be deprived by any action of trial court.

12. Appeal and error ⇨1073(7)—Inclusion of rentals, accruing during receiver's occupancy, in unlawful detainer judgment, held not reversible error, where defendant failed to pay clerk of court sum admitted to be due (Code Civ. Proc. § 1174).

Erroneous inclusion of rentals accruing during receiver's occupancy of premises in judgment for lessor in unlawful detainer held not prejudicial, so as to justify reversal, where defendant did not pay to clerk of court sum admitted to be due under proper judgment, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1174.

defendant has appealed from the judgment upon a typewritten record.

The lease in question was executed under date of December 31, 1923, and covered a term of 99 years which specified monthly rentals graduating from $2,475 to $5,000 each month. The lease specified, among other things, that in the event of a default in the payment of rent, continuing for a period of 5 days after written notice thereof served upon the lessee, and continuing for a period of 20 days after written notice thereof served upon any mortgagee of the lease who had given written notice of his mortgage, the lessor might, at his option, declare the term of the lease ended and re-enter the premises.

After the lessee had entered into possession under the lease he executed a mortgage of the lease to the defendant Bird and a second mortgage to the defendant Jensen. The latter gave written notice of his mortgage to the lessor entitling him to notice of nonpayment of rent within the provisions of the lease above noted. The premises were occupied as a public market and sublet to some 50 subtenants. On July 30, 1925, the lessor served upon the lessee and mortgagees a notice declaring a default in the payment of the July rent, amounting to $3,850, and at the same time served upon them the statutory notice to pay the rent alleged to be due or to quit the premises within 3 days. On August 7, 1925, similar notices were served by the lessor touching the nonpayment of rent due for the month of August. On September 1, 1925, notice to pay the rentals for July and August or to quit the premises were served upon the lessee, the mortgagees, and eight of the subtenants. On September 10, 1925, this action was commenced against all these parties who had been served with the notice just mentioned. On September 18, 1925, at the instigation of the plaintiff in the action, a receiver was appointed ex parte who took possession and control of the premises, collected all rents from subtenants which were paid by them and remained in possession until the entry of judgment. After numerous delays the cause was brought to trial on April 19, 1926, and this resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff as above stated. The money judgment represented the sum of $40,700, total rent claimed to have been due, less the sum of $2,116.65, which was voluntarily remitted by plaintiff on defendant's claim that this was not due under a separate defense, which was stricken from the answer during the early course of the trial. Of the sum awarded $29,150 represented the rent which accrued during the occupancy of the receiver.

[1, 2] On this appeal the lessee, who is the only defendant appealing, advances the argument that the court was without jurisdiction to try the action because the Code section relating to proceedings of this nature does not include a tenancy for a 99-year period. The argument is that section 1161,

Code of Civil Procedure, providing that "a tenant of real property, for a term less than life, is guilty of unlawful detainer," etc., uses the expression, "term less than life," as applying to a term of years less than the usual expectancy of a man's life. In support of the point it is argued that the expectancy of life being less than 61 years at all events for any male person at any age and less than 45 years for any male person capable of entering into a leasing contract, we must assume that the Legislature intended to apply the provisions of the unlawful detainer act to a tenancy for a term of years less than this term of expectancy. The argument is not sound, because it requires an unreasonable and uncertain interpretation of a statute which without being strained at all is capable of a reasonable and certain interpretation. The word "term" as applied to estates is frequently used as referring to the character of the estate as well as to the time or period of enjoyment. Blackstone, vol. 2, p. 144, says: "Thus the word term does not merely signify the time specified in the lease, but the estate also and the interest that passes by the lease; and therefore the term may expire during the continuance of the time." Lang v. Pacific Brewing Co., 44 Cal. App. 618, 187 P. 81. Section 761 of the Civil Code defines estates in real property in respect to "the duration of their enjoyment" as including estates of inheritance, for life, for years, and at will. The word "term" as used in section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, might well refer to the "duration of enjoyment" of the estate, and as so interpreted the section would become applicable to estates for years and estates at will, which are expressly classified in section 761 of the Civil Code as estates less than life. As so interpreted the section would have a reasonable and certain meaning and it is such an interpretation which should be put upon it.

[3] The argument is made that section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, is unconstitutional because it deprives the lessee of equal protection of the law in that, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 P. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370, it denies a defendant in an unlawful detainer action to a set-off, counterclaim, or cross-complaint. The trend of the argument is that this is inequitable and unfair to defendants in proceedings of this character because, in an action by the landlord against the tenant for rent, as well as in an action by the tenant against the landlord for breach of covenant, the defendant may plead a set-off, counterclaim, or cross-complaint and that such defenses may be pleaded in other actions in equity and at law. The argument is without merit because the Code sections relating to unlawful detainer provide a uniform, though special and summary, proceeding for a quick and ready determination of the forfeiture of the lease, and these provisions relate to all actions brought for that purpose. The classification which the Legislature has made cannot be said to be arbitrary or made for the mere purpose of classification, but it is based upon a natural and reasonable distinction between cases of this character, which require prompt hearing and a particular form of judgment, and the ordinary cases at law or in equity.

[4, 5] Failure of the respondent to plead that it had served notice on all the subtenants and to join them as parties to the action was raised by demurrer going to the sufficiency of the complaint. It does not appear that the subtenants were in default, and, if they were not, it would certainly have been futile to have given them notice to pay the rent or quit, and it would likewise have been unnecessary to join them as parties defendant in this action. Tujague v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 35, 39, 230 P. 198.

[6, 7] It is argued that the notices given by the respondent to pay rent or to quit the premises were premature because they were served upon the same day as notice of default of the rent; that these were ineffective because they did not take into account a claim for money due the appellant from the respondent and therefore demanded the payment of rent in excess of the amount due; and that there was no proof that the individual who served the notices was authorized to act for the respondent in that particular. The argument is that inasmuch as the lease provided that the lessor might claim a forfeiture if the rent was not paid within 5 days from the service of notice upon the lessee and within 20 days after service of notice upon the mortgagee, that the lessor could not institute proceedings under the unlawful detainer statute until these respective periods had passed. There is little merit in the argument because, if we should assume that the notice to pay rent or quit served on July 28, 1925, was premature, the same could not be said as to the notice to the same purpose served on September 1, 1925. The claim of default for nonpayment of the July rent was sufficient in itself to justify a claim of forfeiture of the lease, and this was served more than 20 days before the service on September 1st of the notice to pay rent or quit the premises. The fact that in the interim another claim of forfeiture because of nonpayment of the August rent was served cannot affect the lessor's right to proceed under the September notice. It is equally clear that the validity of the notice to pay rent or quit the premises is not affected by the claim of offset against the lessor. The notice specified the rent which was due under the terms of the lease. The claim of offset was a disputed claim based upon appellant's theory that the respondent was in fact interested under another name as one of his subtenants and as such owed the appellant the sum of $2,000. The validity of this claim was not tried because the trial court properly ruled that a counterclaim was improper in an action of this nature, but the respondent voluntarily remitted from the judgment the sum of $2,000 in addition to interest thereon. There is nothing, however, in the record to show the reason for the remission of this portion of the judgment, and it does not therefore appear that it should have been deducted from either the July or August rent due from the lessee.

[8] Criticism is made of the action of the trial court in refusing to give the appellant a continuance of the trial of the case on his motion made in open court on the day which had been set for the trial. The ground for the motion was the absence of a witness which appellant claimed to be material in the proof of his case, but it appears that this witness was available and could have been called by the appellant during the course of the trial. No effort was made to call the witness and we are satisfied that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing appellant's motion.

[9] The more serious question is the propriety of that portion of the judgment which awarded to the respondent the full amount of rental claimed to be due under the lease during the period of occupancy by the receiver. The receiver was appointed upon the application of the respondent. The trial court found "that on the 18th day of September, 1925, said receiver did * * * enter into the control and possession of said premises as such receiver and ever since said date has been and now is in control of said premises, as such receiver, and has collected the rents from subtenants of said premises, but no part of said rents has been paid to either plaintiff or defendant. * * *" On the part of the appellant it is claimed that the action of the court in giving the receiver the sole possession and control of the premises was in effect an eviction of the tenant at the instance of the landlord, which automatically stopped the accrual of rental from the tenant under the lease. The facts are undisputed that the receiver did take and hold exclusive possession during the period found by the trial court and that he collected all rents that were paid by subtenants during that period and that he ousted or dispossessed other subtenants from the premises.

It is conceded by all parties that there is no liability on the part of the lessee to pay rent if he is evicted. 36 C. J. § 1113. The respondent argues that the appointment of the receiver was for the benefit of all parties and did not in itself oust the tenant from his right to possession, but the facts of this case, as found by the trial court, do not support the respondent. The jurisdiction of the court to appoint a receiver in proceedings of this nature was added to section 564, Code of Civil Procedure, by an amendment in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 251). There are no California cases which have come to our attention interpreting this amendment to the Code in so far as it relates to the question before us. The great weight of authority from other jurisdictions uniformly supports the doctrine that the appointment of a receiver who assumes full possession and control of the premises in a proceeding of this nature is an eviction of the tenant and relieves him from payment of the rent called for by the lease during the period of the receiver's occupancy. The respondent has not called to our attention any authorities in opposition to this rule, and our own examination satisfies us that the rule is practically uniform.

[10] The rule follows the general principle that any act of the landlord which results in dispossessing the tenant and which deprives him of the use, occupancy, and enjoyment of the premises amounts to an eviction. The reason for the rule is that rent is the landlord's right to receive from the tenant compensation for the benefits that are accruing to the tenant from his possession and enjoyment of the land, and that when the tenant is deprived of this right of possession and enjoyment by the action of the landlord, the right of the landlord to receive compensation automatically ceases. Gilbert, Treatise on Rent, p. 145; Hoeverler v. Fleming, 91 Pa. 322; Palmtag v. Doutrick, 59 Cal. 154, 167, 43 Am. Rep. 245; Veysey v. Moriyama, 184 Cal. 802, 805, 195 P. 662; 16 R. C. L. pp. 684, 948; 36 C. J. 255; 15 Cal. Jur. 679.

It is, of course, true that the appointment of a receiver is not in every instance an ousting of possession of the property over which the receiver exercises control, but where, as here, a receiver is appointed at the instance of the plaintiff in an action in unlawful detainer, the very nature of which is to terminate the tenancy and to place the plaintiff in possession of the property, the receiver in such a case must be treated as the receiver of the party entitled to the possession (Sturgis v. Knapp, 33 Vt. 487, 528), and where, as here, this receiver takes exclusive control and possession of the premises, all of which were occupied by subtenants under separate tenancies, and either collects the rents from such subtenants or removes them from possession, he must be treated as a receiver for the landlord, whose entry into possession is an eviction of the lessee. Mariner v. Chamberlain, 21 Wis. 253, 256.

[11, 12] It follows from what has been said that that portion of the judgment awarding the respondent the sum of $29,150 rentals becoming due under the lease during the receiver's occupancy of the premises was error. The appellant insists that because of section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, the error demands a reversal of the judgment. The Code section permits the tenant, after judgment adverse to him, to redeem by depositing in court the amount found in the judgment to be due within 5 days from the entry of the judgment, and the same privilege is accorded to any subtenant, mortgagee of the term, or other party interested. This is, of course, a privilege granted to every defendant brought in under proceedings of this nature, and it is a substantial right of which he cannot be deprived by any action of the trial court, but it does not follow from this that because the judgment was excessive in this respect it must be reversed. The appellant might have paid to the clerk of the court the sum which he admitted to be due and owing under a proper judgment, and respondent would then have been called upon to confess the error or take the consequences. Nothing of this kind was done, and it seems evident from an examination of the entire record that the appellant was not concerned in any stage of the proceedings with the protection of his rights under the lease, but that his entire course of action was to delay and hamper the respondent in the conduct of the proceedings. We are satisfied from our examination of the record that the judgment should be modified by striking therefrom the sum of $29,150 and that the inclusion of this sum in the judgment, though error of a substantial kind, would not justify a reversal of the judgment under the facts of this case, because it appears from appellant's conduct that this error did not prejudice his rights in this litigation.

Judgment modified by striking $29,150 therefrom, and, as so modified, affirmed, with costs to appellant.

PEOPLE v. GIBBS. (Cr. 993.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Criminal law ☞742(2)—Whether witness was an accomplice held question for jury.

In prosecution for grand larceny, whether witness alleged to be an accomplice but who denied his complicity in commission of offense, was an accomplice, held a question for jury.

2. Criminal law ☞1144(13)—Record of conviction will be sustained on appeal on theory that jury found witness alleged to be accomplice was not accomplice.

Where, in larceny prosecution, alleged accomplice denied complicity in theft and jury found defendant guilty, appellate court will sustain record on theory that jury believed witness was not an accomplice.

3. Criminal law ☞511(1)—Corroboration of alleged accomplice in larceny prosecution held sufficient to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for grand larceny, evidence corroborating alleged accomplice held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Bud Gibbs was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Hardy, of Susanville, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of the county of Lassen of the crime of grand larceny. He appeals from the judgment of conviction. The only alleged error of the trial court, claimed by the appellant, is that the conviction was had on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, one Paul Hendron.

The question thus presented is properly severable into two parts: First, Was the witness, Paul Hendron, an accomplice? And second, If he were an accomplice in the commission of the crime, was there at the trial other evidence in corroboration of Hendron's testimony?

A conviction being had, we will not concern ourselves with a full recital of all the testimony. There are some disputes in the testimony as to certain facts, but we will content ourselves with stating so much of the evidence as could be said to support the judgment of conviction, and we will not concern ourselves with the disputed matters.

The testimony of witnesses, other than said Hendron, disclosed that the Susanville Country Club had a clubhouse some 14 miles distant from Susanville, in Lassen county. On October 25, 1926, in the nighttime, this clubhouse was entered by some one, and a number of blankets, comforters, sheets, and other like articles, a number of electric light globes, together with a radio and fixtures, were stolen therefrom. No one saw the perpetrator. The theft was accomplished by breaking into the clubhouse. At the time the clubhouse was closed for the winter season. Tracks disclosed that an automobile had been parked on the "top of the hill" near the clubhouse. Some electric light globes had been dropped where a machine had been parked "on the top of the hill," near the clubhouse, on a public road. Many of the stolen blankets, comforters, and like articles were found some months later in the house of one Susie A. Sorahan, in the town of Susanville. They were in some old trunks in a back room. Susie A. Sorahan was a cousin of defendant, and she ran a lodging house in Susanville, at which various people lodged. The defendant had roomed at the Sorahan house at times, about the date of the theft and thereafter. The radio and fixtures were traced some months later into the possession of the witness, Paul Hendron. Upon being arrested, defendant, Gibbs, asked to see the warrant of arrest, and then asked the arresting officer if he "had been down to Susie's." It was further proven as an independent fact that defendant had been seen by various people, upon many occasions, with Susie A. Sorahan.

Paul Hendron, the alleged accomplice, gave testimony at the trial to the effect that he did assist the defendant in the following manner only: Hendron testified that on the night in question he was asked by the defendant, Gibbs, to take defendant out of town, to a place on the public road, near the said clubhouse, which Hendron did, in his (Hendron's) automobile. According to Hendron's version, he was to leave Gibbs near the clubhouse, and go back to town and return by a different route at a later hour. Hendron did take Gibbs to the place near the clubhouse and returned to town, going later in the night to about the same place, and was hailed, by Gibbs at a point on the road near the clubhouse. Gibbs then told Hendron to drive a short distance further along the road, saying: "I got some stuff to take in." On going a short distance to the "top of the hill," Gibbs requested Hendron to stop his machine. At this place Gibbs and Hendron got out of the car and loaded therein three bundles wrapped in blankets. One of these bundles contained the radio and fixtures. Hendron testified that he knew nothing of the theft. He says that his idea was that Gibbs was out that night to get some illicit liquor from a still that he knew had been in that locality. On arriving in Susanville this property, excepting the radio, was left at Susie A. Sorahan's house. Hendron helped unload the bundles, Gibbs taking them into the same house where they were afterwards found by the officers. Gibbs then and there gave Hendron the radio as compensation for the use of Hendron's machine. That night Hendron took the radio to another place in town, where he was then living. A few days later, at the request of Gibbs, Hendron removed the radio from this house and took it into the woods, where there was an abandoned sawmill, at which he had formerly worked, and there buried the radio in a sawdust pile. He later brought it to town, removed the number plate, and sold it.

[1] Usually the accomplice comes upon the stand admitting his complicity in the commission of the offense. It is then purely a question of law for the trial court to determine. Under facts as shown here, it is a question for the jury to determine whether or not the witness is an accomplice. Under this evidence they could have determined as a fact that Hendron was not an accomplice.

In Corpus Juris, vol. 16, p. 677, it is said: said:

"The question of complicity is one to be decided by the jury where, although there is evidence tending to connect the witness with the crime, the facts are disputed or susceptible of different inferences."

The note to the above text cites People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 423, 119 P. 901. In that case at page 448 (119 P. 907) the true definition of an accomplice is stated.

[2, 3] In the present case the alleged accomplice denied complicity in the theft. The jury having found that the defendant was guilty, the record, as we view it, should now be sustained upon the theory that they believed he was not an accomplice. Assuming, however, that Hendron was an accomplice, we are of the opinion that the corroboration was sufficient to sustain this conviction. The stolen property was found at the home of Susie A. Sorahan, where Hendron said it was taken. This woman was a cousin of defendant. Defendant had lived at her house. When arrested, defendant, after asking to see the warrant of arrest, inquired of the officer if he "had been down to Susie's." The defendant was arrested some distance from Susanville. The proof shows that, independent of Hendron, defendant immediately thought of "Susie's" house. The stolen property was found there.

The decisions have not, and, perhaps, cannot, lay down an inflexible rule as to just what degree of corroboration must be had of the testimony of an accomplice. In 16 Corpus Juris, p. 704, it is said:

"If he (the accomplice) is corroborated as to some material fact or facts this is sufficient to authorize an inference by the jury that he has testified truly even with respect to matters as to which he has not been corroborated, and thus sustain a conviction."

This text is supported by a large number of California cases.

The judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. SCHULER. (Cr. 1545.) ★

District Court of Appeals, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 21, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Criminal law §311—One charged with crime is presumed sane until contrary is established by preponderance of evidence.

One charged with crime is presumed sane until contrary is established by preponderance of evidence.

2. Criminal law §48—"Insanity," to constitute defense in criminal action, must be such as to render person incapable of knowing nature of act or of distinguishing between right and wrong.

"Insanity," interposed as defense in criminal action, must be such a diseased and deranged condition of mind as to render person incapable of knowing nature and quality of act he is charged with doing, or, if he did not know this, incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to such act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Insane—Insanity.]

3. Homicide §270—Defendant's Insanity, at time of homicide, held for jury.

In homicide prosecution, question of defendant's insanity at time of commission of homicide held for jury.

4. Criminal law §1159(3)—Jury's finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed on appeal.

Finding of jury on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Insane persons §26—Adjudication of defendant's insanity one month after homicide is not conclusive of his insanity at time of homicide.

That defendant, charged with homicide, was adjudged insane one month after commission of offense, is not conclusive that he was insane at time of homicide.

6. Homicide §237—Defendant, in homicide prosecution, must prove insanity by preponderance of evidence.

In homicide prosecution, wherein defense was insanity, instruction requiring defendant to prove insanity by preponderance of evidence held proper.

7. Criminal law §311—Presumption of continued existence of insanity arises only when it is shown that impairment is such as to produce general habitual derangement.

Insanity, once shown to exist, is presumed to exist until contrary is shown, only when it is shown that the intellectual faculties are so impaired as to produce a general habitual derangement of them, not traceable to a temporary cause.

8. Homicide §237—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that defendant was sane before and at time of commission of homicide.

In homicide prosecution, defense being insanity, evidence held sufficient to justify finding that defendant was sane before and at time of commission of offense, warranting verdict of guilty, notwithstanding he was adjudged insane shortly after commission of crime.

9. Criminal law §1030(3)—Defendant adjudged insane, but thereafter tried for offense, without requesting second trial for sanity, cannot assert that he was insane at time of trial.

Defendant, who, after commission of homicide, was adjudged insane, but thereafter placed on trial, and who did not request he be again tried for sanity, cannot, on appeal from conviction of murder, be heard to complain that he was insane at time of trial.

10. Criminal law §730(7)—District attorney's statement that defendant was released from asylum as sane held not prejudicial in view of court's statement that question was for jury.

In homicide prosecution, defense being insanity, district attorney's statement that defendant was released from insane asylum as being sane, though not supported by the evidence, was not prejudicial, in view of court's statement that question was for jury when opposing counsel differed.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(9) — Presumption arises that, where defendant was prosecuted after having been committed to insane asylum, proper legal steps were taken before defendant was brought to trial.

Where defendant was prosecuted for homicide after having been committed to insane asylum, and record is silent as to his discharge from asylum as being cured, presumption arises that all proper steps were taken as required by law before defendant was brought to trial.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(1) — District attorney's statement that defendant could not be returned to insane asylum, though error, held not prejudicial.

District attorney's statement in homicide prosecution, defense being insanity, that defendant, who had theretofore been committed to an insane asylum, "could not be returned to the insane asylum," though error, was not prejudicial, in view of sufficiency of evidence to support finding that defendant was not insane at time of commission of offense and failure of defendant to seek determination of his insanity at time of trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Louis Schuler was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears that the defendant was employed as a gardner by Harrison Chandler, and had been so employed for several years. The deceased, Godfrey Repensek, had also been employed by Chandler as a chauffeur for a little more than one year prior to his death. On March 3, 1925, when Chandler was approaching his home, about 75 yards from the garage he heard two shots which he thought was the exhaust from his automobile, as he knew the chauffeur was working on the car in the garage. After the lapse of about one minute, he heard a third shot, and then went into the house. Ten or fifteen minutes later the maid informed him that something had happened to the chauffeur; whereupon he went to the garage, and found Repensek lying underneath the automobile. After the shots were heard, Chandler saw the defendant proceed to the yard, where he worked on the lawn until the police officers arrived. Chandler testified that, so far as he knew, the defendant and the deceased were good friends, and that during all the time Schuler was working for him he never had any trouble; that he had never known Schu-ler to have a gun in his possession; that he was not of a quarrelsome disposition; but that the witness "had noticed a little while before this happened that he was grouchy, a little grouchier than usual." F. F. Stevens, sergeant of police, testified that, upon arriving at the Chandler residence, he pulled the dead body of Repensek from underneath the automobile, and found two bullet holes in his head, and located the defendant pushing a wheelbarrow; that he asked the defendant if he shot Repensek, which the defendant denied. The sergeant saw a large lump on the defendant's head, "half as big as a hen's egg," and a small round hole in his head with a slight stream of blood coming from it. He asked the defendant if he had shot himself, to which the defendant replied that he had not; but, when asked, "How came that hole in there?" replied, "I shot." He asked him where the gun was, and, being told that it was up over the garage, proceeded to the garage, during which time the defendant stated that he had shot Repensek; that defendant said, "He is no good; I have trouble with him." The officer went upstairs in the garage, and found the gun under the bed-clothes, "which was all full of blood." On cross-examination the witness testified that the defendant, Schuler, was not in the best of mental condition at the time the witness talked with him; that the defendant kept saying he was suspicious of the man he shot; that defendant "had the attitude of an enraged bull—just a wild, sullen bull"; and that defendant did not talk coherently. A statement was taken from defendant at the time of his arrest, in which he stated that he shot Repensek; that Repensek tried to get the defendant to go down town with him the evening before the shooting, but that defendant refused to go; that nothing led up to the shooting, but that defendant was suspicious of Repensek; that "I thought he might meet a gang; I got suspicious that he wanted to lure me down town to get me beat up, or something like that." When inquiry was made as to what aroused defendant's suspicions, he replied, "Well, I was ordered to gather some flowers around the border, early to-morrow morning"; that this order was made by Mrs. Chandler.

Dr. Victor Parkin examined the defendant at the county jail on or about April 7, 1925. He testified that in his opinion the defendant was paranoiac, and at that time was suffering from delusions of persecution, of which the homicide was the direct result; that defendant did not know the difference between right and wrong, by reason of the fact that his belief in regard to what the deceased had been doing to him was false; that defendant believed he committed the act in self-defense; that defendant knew what he was doing when he killed decedent, but did not know the consequences of his act. On cross-examination the witness testified that he saw the defendant but once during a period of from one to one and one-half hours; that both sane and insane persons have mental delusions; that defendant was in a paranoiac state, which was the result of mental disease; that, even though defendant felt impelled to commit the act under delusions which were false in fact, defendant probably knew that it was wrong to commit the act; that, if defendant received a blow in the nature of a bullet wound in the head, it might cause delusions that would develop following the injury, but not such delusions as antedated the injury; that in his opinion the delusions of the defendant, inasmuch as they were the basis upon which he committed the act, existed prior to the defendant's attempting to kill himself; that a recovery from such delusions may follow custody or care.

Dr. D. H. Calder testified that he was a member of the lunacy commission when the defendant was committed to the asylum in April, 1925; that in his opinion the defendant was insane at that time, but that he could not state the duration of insanity; that the delusion of persecution had been of long standing; that, although defendant might have known it was wrong to kill, yet he might have absolutely no restraint upon himself; that in his opinion the entrance of the bullet into the head of defendant would not have created delusions which existed in the defendant's mind; and that he doubted if the paranoiac state was ever recoverable.

Defendant took the witness stand, and testified that he had known the deceased for about nine months; that their relations were friendly; that on March 3, 1925, the deceased was in the garage working on the automobile; that the defendant was working on the lawn, and went into the garage for a drink of water; that the deceased had not spoken to defendant for a week or ten days, and seemed kind of sullen; that, when the defendant went into the garage, he was struck in the head with something solid; that he remembered nothing that occurred thereafter; that he did not remember shooting himself, and did not remember the doctors examining him; he remembered being in the asylum for over two years. On cross-examination the defendant stated that he had never been suspicious of the deceased; that the deceased was standing in the garage when he went into it, and also when the defendant was struck on the head. The witness further testified that he realized he was on trial for murder, and understood everything that was going on in the courtroom; that he had been discharged from the asylum as cured.

C. W. Ostrum, one of the attorneys for defendant, testified that he first saw the defendant in the early part of March, 1925; that defendant told him he was being persecuted; that the man he killed wanted him to go down town and had a gang there that wanted to beat him up and kill him; that the defendant had a peculiar glitter in his eye; that, when he told the defendant that he was basing his defense on insanity, the defendant attacked him; that in his opinion the defendant was insane at that time.

On cross-examination the witness testified that the defendant told him he shot Repensek, but that he was justified. It was then stipulated that the defendant was shot over the right eye about the 3d of March, the date of the alleged homicide; that subsequently the defendant was committed to the asylum under an order of a judge of the superior court; and that defendant was in the asylum for two years. But one witness was called in rebuttal for the prosecution. Mrs. Pauline Pearl testified that defendant called on her on Sundays for a period of six months before the killing of the deceased; that she never noticed anything peculiar about him, and that he was a perfect gentleman; that all his actions were those of a sane man; that defendant never told her that people were plotting against him or persecuting him, or that he was suspicious of any person, or that he had troubles with any other persons; that she and the defendant were friends at all times.

[1-4] Appellant urges that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the defendant was insane when Repensek was killed; insane at all times pending trial, during the trial, and at the time of sentence. He takes the position that the evidence shows that defendant was paranoiac before, at the time of, and after, the offense was committed, and therefore was not capable of committing the crime charged in the information. The evidence upon which appellant bases his contention that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict is the testimony of Drs. Parkin and Calder; of the arresting officer that, at the time he arrested defendant, defendant acted like a "mad bull"; the fact that some years prior to the homicide the defendant had some trouble in Kansas City; and the fact that defendant was committed to an asylum soon after the homicide. It should be remembered that the testimony of the arresting officer was based upon his observation of the defendant immediately after the defendant had attempted to take his own life by shooting himself in the head; also that the observation of the alienists should be considered with the fact that the examinations were made soon after the defendant had shot himself. Pauline Pearl, an intimate acquaintance of the defendant, who testified concerning the defendant's actions for a period of six months prior to the homicide, stated that all of his actions were those of a sane man, and that she observed no peculiarities whatsoever. There was also testimony before the jury as to defendant's actions immediately surrounding the homicide, which the jury were entitled to take into consideration; and the prosecution might rely upon the presumption of sanity in controverting the testimony of the alienists. The weight and credibility to be given to these witnesses was solely for the jury, and the testimony was to be considered by the jury in connection with all of the other evidence as to the acts and conduct of the defendant; all of which was material to the question of insanity.

The rule is well settled in this state that a person charged with crime is presumed to be sane until the contrary is established by a preponderance of evidence, and that insanity, interposed as a defense in a criminal action, means such a diseased and deranged condition of the mind as to render the person incapable of knowing the nature and quality of the act he is charged with doing; or, if he did know this, incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to such act. People v. Williams, 184 Cal. 590, 194 P. 1019. In the present case, there was some evidence tending to show insanity, but there was also evidence tending to show the defendant was sane. Under such evidence it was clearly a question of fact for the jury to determine whether, at the time of the homicide, the defendant was sane; and the finding of a jury on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed in this court. People v. Niino, 183 Cal. 126, 190 P. 626; People v. Loomis, 170 Cal. 347, 149 P. 581.

[5] Appellant urges that there can be no doubt that defendant was insane at the time the offense was committed, since within one month after the commission of the offense the defendant was tried by the lunacy commission and pronounced insane, and that the same persons who examined the defendant at that time were witnesses in this case. The judgment of insanity necessarily was that the defendant was insane at the time the judgment was pronounced, and not that defendant was insane at the time the offense was committed. The issue as to whether the defendant was insane at the time the offense was committed was decided by the jury in this trial upon conflicting evidence.

[6] Appellant complains of the language used by the court, commencing with the word "therefore" in the latter part of the following instruction:

"Insanity, as the expression is used in these instructions, means such a diseased and deranged condition of the mental faculties as to render the person incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to the act with which he is charged. An irresistible impulse to commit an act which a party knows to be wrong and unlawful (if it ever exists) does not constitute the insanity which is a legal defense. The standard of accountability is this: Had the party sufficient mental capacity to appreciate the character and quality of the act?

Did he know and understand that it was a violation of the rights of another, and in itself wrong? Did he know that it was prohibited by the laws of the land, and that its commission would entail punishment and penalties upon himself? If he had the capacity thus to appreciate the character and comprehend the possible or probable consequences of his act, he is responsible to the law for the act thus committed, and is to be judged accordingly. Although it is true, as you have been instructed, that generally the burden of proof is upon the prosecution, yet to this rule there is this exception: Where insanity is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proving the existence of such insanity is on defendant, and it is incumbent upon him to establish, by preponderance of evidence, that he was insane at the time of committing the act charged, and the evidence of mental derangement must be such, in amount, that, if the single issue of sanity or insanity of the defendant should be submitted to the jury in a civil case, they must find that he is insane. Insanity must be established by a preponderance of the evidence. Therefore, if you believe that the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the sanity of the defendant, or that there is not a preponderance of evidence to the effect that he was insane, at the time of the transaction involved herein, you will act upon the hypothesis that he was sane at that time. And, in considering the evidence relative to the defense of insanity, it will be proper for you to remember that ordinary experience teaches us that the majority of men are sane, and hence, it is to be presumed, until the contrary is proven by a preponderance of evidence, that the defendant was sane at the time of the commission of the act with which he stands charged, if you find from the evidence he committed such act."

The principles laid down by the foregoing instruction are in accord with those pronounced in People v. Williams, supra, and People v. Loomis, supra. The case cited by appellant (People v. Kelley, 7 Cal. App. 554, 95 P. 45) is to be distinguished from the present case, in that the jury in effect were told in that case, that, even though they believed the defendant insane, they could not find him not guilty of any crime included within that charged in the information other than murder of the first degree. In the Kelley Case the court instructed the jury:

"If you believe and find from the evidence that the defendant was, at the time of the alleged killing, insane from any cause either of a temporary or settled nature, then you should not find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, for if insane he could not form that willful, deliberate, premeditated and malice aforethought intent which the law absolutely requires to constitute murder in the first degree."

As stated by the court, the vice of the instruction was that there was not in any other of the court's instructions an instruction that:

"If the defendant was shown by sufficient proof to have been insane at the time of the commission of the act, he was thereby under our law absolved from responsibility for the same, and, consequently, entitled to an absolute acquittal, or a verdict of not guilty of any offense comprehended in the charge preferred against him."

In the present case the jury was instructed that:

"The court instructs you that an insane person is not capable of committing a crime, and, if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant killed Godfrey Repensek as alleged in the information, still if you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the act, you must find the defendant not guilty."

Thus the jury were clearly instructed to find the defendant not guilty of any charge embraced in the information, if they found from the evidence that the defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the act.

[7, 8] Appellant's contention that the burden was upon the prosecution to prove insanity is without merit. The rule that insanity once shown to exist is presumed to exist until the contrary is shown arises only when it is shown that the intellectual faculties are so impaired as to produce a general, habitual derangement of them, not traceable to a temporary cause. People v. Francis, 38 Cal. 183, 189. In the present case, it was not shown that the defendant had ever been adjudged insane prior to the homicide, nor that the intellectual faculties of the defendant were so impaired before the offense was committed as to produce a general, habitual derangement of them; but there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that defendant was sane before and at the time the offense was committed, and accordingly to find the defendant guilty.

[9] Appellant contends that defendant should not have been brought to trial, but that he should have been returned to the asylum. The record is silent as to the defendant having been returned by the officers of the asylum to Los Angeles county for trial. In view of this silence of the record, it will be presumed that the proceedings required by law were taken. People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 576, 580, 581. The defendant did not request that he be again tried for sanity, and cannot be heard to complain on appeal that he was insane at the time of the trial. In People v. Rice (Cal. App.) 256 P. 450, 453, the court said:

"In the instant case no application was made by any person to submit the question of the then mental status of the defendant to a jury for determination; in the absence of any such request and where no objection was made at the opening of the trial to proceeding therewith by the defendant, any irregularities, if there were such, in the procedure leading up to the bringing of the defendant from the state hospital before the superior court for trial, were immaterial and of no consequence, and did not in any way affect his substantial rights."

[10] During the closing argument the following colloquy occurred:

"Mr. Clark: Mr. Kendrick talked at considerable length of the insane asylum as a worse place than the penitentiary or death. But we can exclude that from consideration, ladies and gentlemen. The lunacy commission or the persons in charge of the insane asylum at Stockton have found that this man was sane. This man could not be returned to the insane asylum.

"Mr. Kendrick: If the court please, I hate to interrupt, but I want to assign that remark as prejudicial error and misconduct of the district attorney, and ask that the jury be instructed to disregard it. There is no evidence of that. He has never been declared sane. It is not true he cannot be sent back to the asylum immediately upon the end of this trial.

"Mr. Clark: The evidence is that he was declared sane, and was released from the asylum, by the defendant's own statement. If he was not sane, he would not be and could not be tried here.

"The Court: It will be for the jury to determine and remember what the evidence does show upon that point. They will be governed by the evidence, and will not be governed by the statements of counsel as to what the evidence is, when counsel are not in accord with each other."

[11, 12] In view of the statement of the trial court that the jury would determine and remember what the evidence shows, and will be governed by the evidence, and not governed by the statements of counsel when counsel are not in accord with each other, we do not believe defendant was prejudiced by the statement made by the district attorney, even though there be no evidence shown that defendant was released from the asylum as being sane, except by the defendant's own testimony on cross-examination. The circumstances in this case are such that the defendant was brought to trial after having been committed to the asylum, and, the record being silent as to his having been discharged from the asylum as being cured, except with respect to his own testimony, the presumption arises that all proper steps were taken as required by law before defendant was brought to trial. People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 576, 581. While it was error for the district attorney to state that "this man could not be returned to the insane asylum," yet, in view of the fact that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that defendant was not insane at the time the offense was committed, and, further, that no objection was made on behalf of defendant that he was insane at the time of trial, or that he be tried as to his sanity at the time of the trial, we conclude that the error complained of was not prejudicial.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PERHAM v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF LA VERNE. (Civ. 3371.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence held conclusive.

Findings of trial court on conflicting evidence, in action against bank for money deposited, held conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇐931(f)—All reasonable inferences will be indulged on appeal in support of trial court's findings.

On appeal all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of trial court's findings.

3. Appeal and error ⇐901—Burden is on appellant to show error in trial court's findings.

Burden is on appellant, who claims error in trial court's findings, to show its existence.

4. Banks and banking ⇐195—Where plaintiff delivered money to bank for purpose of loan to certain named persons, bank held not liable because persons were not financially responsible or security was insufficient.

Where trial court found that plaintiff, through her agent, delivered money to bank for purpose of loan to certain named persons, bank held not liable for fraud or negligence in making loans to persons not financially responsible or on insufficient security, especially where pleadings did not raise question of bank's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action for money deposited by Susie W. Perham against the First National Bank of La Verne. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Hickson and Nichols, Cooper & Hickson, all of Pomona, for appellant.

Lucius K. Chase, of Pomona, and Alan Nichols, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff, Susie W. Perham, brought this action against the defendant, First National Bank of La Verne, to recover the sum of $7,000, which she claims was deposited by her with said bank to be loaned for her benefit. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, First National Bank of La Verne. From this judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The complaint is in form a simple action for money had and received, and so denominated by the plaintiff, and alleges:

"That on the 24th day of June, 1922, * * * the defendant received from the plaintiff the sum of $7,000 for the use and benefit of said plaintiff, * * * and that plaintiff has not received anything of value from defendant, and that the said $7,000, or any part thereof, has not been repaid to this plaintiff, except that on the 24th of September, 1923, defendant credited plaintiff's account with said bank with the sum of $135, and on the 24th of December, 1922, defendant also credited plaintiff's account with the sum of $135, which plaintiff assumes, and alleges to have been interest accruing on said $7,000, but that no other sum, either on account of principal or interest, has been paid to plaintiff by defendant, and that the whole of said $7,000 together with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on $5,000, and 7 per cent. per annum on $2,000, from December 24, 1922, is due, owing, and unpaid. * * *

The answer of defendant denies the material allegations of the complaint and avers the facts to be that on or about the 24th of June, 1922, the plaintiff, Susie W. Perham, delivered to said defendant $7,000 for the purpose of having $5,000 thereof loaned to one R. M. Martin at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and for the further purpose of loaning $2,000 thereof to one H. J. Vaniman, and the answer further alleges that, pursuant to said understanding, the $5,000 and $2,000, respectively, were so loaned, and both loans evidenced by promissory notes.

The court, among other things, found:

"That on or about the 24th day of June, 1922, said plaintiff did deliver to said defendant the sum of $7,000 for the purpose of having $5,000 thereof loaned to one R. M. Martin at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable in three months after date, and for the purpose of obtaining from said R. M. Martin a promissory note, to be signed by said R. M. Martin, payable in three months after date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and for the further purpose of loaning $2,000 thereof to one H. J. Vaniman, said last-mentioned loan to be evidenced by a note in the sum of $2,000, payable in six months after date to Susie W. Perham, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and to be signed by said H. J. Vaniman; that, pursuant to said understanding, said sum of $5,000 was loaned on the 24th day of June, 1922, to said R. M. Martin, and his note in the sum of $5,000 dated June 24, 1922, payable three months after date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, executed by said R. M. Martin, was delivered by said R. M. Martin to said defendant for said Susie W. Perham, and that said $2,000 was loaned to H. J. Vaniman, and said loan was evidenced by a note dated June 24, 1922, in the sum of $2,000, payable six months after date to Susie W. Perham, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and duly executed by H. J. Vaniman, which said note was delivered by said H. J. Vaniman to said defendant for Susie W. Perham; that thereafter said Susie W. Perham was advised thereof by said defendant, and said defendant was instructed by her, through her husband and agent, W. C. Perham, to retain possession of both of said notes for her, which said defendant has ever since done. * * *

"The court further finds that no part of said sum of $7,000 has been repaid by said defendant to said plaintiff, excepting that on or about the 24th day of September, 1922, said defendant credited the said plaintiff's account with said bank with the sum of $135, and on the 24th day of December, 1922, the defendant also credited plaintiff's account with said bank with the sum of $135, interest accruing on said dates, and that no other sum, either on account of principal or interest, has been received by said plaintiff from said defendant, but further finds that, said defendant having loaned said money as aforesaid for said plaintiff, said defendant is under no obligations to pay to said plaintiff the sum of $7,000, or any part thereof, and further finds that no part of said sum of $7,000, and no part of any interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, or otherwise on $5,000 thereof, or 7 per cent. on $2,000 thereof from December 24, 1922, or any portion thereof, is now wholly or in part due or unpaid from said defendant to said plaintiff. * * *

Appellant strenuously contends that these findings are not supported by the evidence. On the contrary, respondent insists that the evidence is ample to support all the findings made by the trial court.

[1-3] The evidence upon the material issues of the case is decidedly conflicting. The law is, of course, well established that the findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive on appeal, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings, and the burden is upon appellant, who claims error, to show its existence. Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 7, 239 P. 332; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) p. 1574; Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111.

In Treadwell v. Nickel, supra, the court said:

"When a verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the jury. If, on any material point, the testimony is in conflict, it must be assumed that the jury resolved the conflict in favor of the prevailing party."

Again, in Wilbur v. Wilbur, supra, the court said:

"Where two or more inferences may reasonably be deduced from a certain state of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court."

We will therefore refer briefly to that portion of the evidence in the case which supports the findings of the trial court. Plaintiff and her husband, Willis C. Perham, had been since 1910, and were at the time of the transaction in controversy, customers of the defendant bank, and had transacted their business for several years with H. J. Vaniman, who was its vice president and cashier. On or about the 22d of June, 1922, said Willis C. Perham sold his ranch for some $18,000, and deposited the proceeds thereof with the defendant bank in the joint names of W. C. Perham and Susie W. Perham. On the day the money from the sale of the ranch was deposited in defendant bank W. C. Perham asked Vaniman if he could loan $7,000 for him, and Vaniman replied in substance:

"I have a friend in Los Angeles by the name of R. M. Martin who could use $5,000, and if you figure that my name is good for $2,000, I could use $2,000. Mr. Martin has agreed to pay 8 per cent., but for myself I do not wish to pay over 7 per cent. Mr. Martin has given me a deed to an orange grove containing 26 acres as security for a loan of something like $8,000 which I have already made him, and I will include your $5,000 in the same security."

W. C. Perham replied that he would let Vaniman know within a couple of days about the loans. Thereafter, and on June 24, 1922, Mr. Perham, together with his wife, the appellant herein, again called at the bank and had a further conversation with Vaniman regarding the proposed loans, which resulted in authorizing Vaniman to make the loan of $5,000 to R. M. Martin and loaning $2,000 to Vaniman. W. C. Perham gave Vaniman his personal check on defendant bank for $7,000, and stated to him that on account of his ill health the notes should be made to his wife, Susie W. Perham. Thereupon Vaniman made and delivered to Mrs. Perham a receipt reading as follows:

"Received from Susie W. Perham, seven thousand dollars ($7,000.00), $5,000.00 at 8%, $2,000, at 7%, same loaned for her benefit. [Signed by rubber stamp:] First National Bank, La Verne, California, H. J. Vaniman."

Vaniman then made his note to Mrs. Susie W. Perham for $2,000, and told Mr. and Mrs. Perham he would send the other note to Los Angeles for Martin's signature.

Vaniman further testified that Mr. Perham told Vaniman, after the Martin note had been received, to keep the notes in the bank and that he would call for the interest when it became due.

The notes remained in the possession of the bank until the time of the trial. Thereafter two interest payments were credited by Vaniman on each note, and $135, purporting to be the interest, was deposited to the account of Mr. and Mrs. Perham in defendant bank. After this transaction Vaniman continued to act as cashier and vice president of the defendant bank until March, 1923, when it was discovered that he had been for some time speculating in oil and losing heavily, and had misappropriated the funds of the bank. Shortly after his discharge as cashier and vice president, and in April, 1923, Vaniman made an assignment to the president of defendant bank of all his property, including the security that he claimed he had taken for the Martin note, and in the following July was declared a bankrupt.

W. C. Perham died on the 23d of June, 1923.

Mrs. Perham made demand on the bank for the money on July 13, 1923, and this action was commenced on August 3, 1923, and tried in July, 1924. Prior to the death of Mr. Perham no claim or demand was made against the defendant bank for the $7,000 or any part thereof, and Mr. Yundt, the president of the defendant bank, testified that about a year after the loan was made Mr. and Mrs. Perham called upon him and inquired of him relative to Vaniman's resources, stating that they held certain notes, having made a loan to R. M. Martin and H. J. Vaniman. There is also some testimony in the record to the effect that Mr. Perham had, shortly before his death, attended a meeting of Vaniman's creditors and had listed his $2,000 note among the liabilities of Vaniman. It is evident, from the findings of the trial court, that it accepted the testimony of Vaniman as a true statement of the transaction in question.

The appellant, Susie W. Perham, in her testimony flatly contradicts the foregoing testimony of Vaniman on almost every material point. She testified that she and her husband told Mr. Vaniman that they had decided to let the bank handle their money and loan $7,000 for them, and Vaniman replied that the bank was glad to handle their money and that "we were wise to bring it to the bank instead of investing it in some wildcat scheme, where we would be liable to lose it," and, adding "that it makes business good for citizens to bring money to the bank." She also testified as follows:

"Q. Did Mr. Vaniman say anything relative to what would be done with the $7,000? A. He said, when we spoke about the seven thousand, he said, 'I know right now where we can place five thousand of that to good advantage.'

"Q. Did he say where it was to be placed? A. He said it would be on a grove.

"Q. Did he mention the name of the man? A. I think not that I heard.

"Q. Did he say at that time where he was going to put the $2,000? A. Well, he said, 'We will find some good place to put that where it will be good security.'

"Q. Did you ever see any notes for which this money was loaned? A. No, sir; I never heard of it.

"Q. Did Mr. Vaniman or any one else ever tell you about any notes? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did he ever deliver any notes to you or offer to deliver any? A. No; never mentioned.

"Q. Did you ever see Mr. Vaniman after this loan was made? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you ever talk to him about this loan or these loans? A. No.

"Q. When was the first time that you ever heard that $5,000 was loaned to R. M. Martin of Los Angeles and $2,000 to H. J. Vaniman, cashier? A. Not till after Mr. Perham was gone.

"The Court: State that again. A. Not till after Mr. Perham was gone and suit had been instituted against the bank.

"Q. By whom? A. By myself.

"Q. The first information you had was what was made in the answer of this bank? A. Yes, sir."

A great many other facts and circumstances were adduced at the trial, but the above is sufficient to show the conflicting character of the testimony on the vital points. From all the facts and circumstances in the case the trial court might well have decided in favor of the plaintiff, and there would have been ample evidence to support such conclusion.

[4] Appellant contends that the acts of the bank were fraudulent per se, in that the bank, by its cashier, loaned appellant's money to its cashier, who then had outstanding more than $23,000 of unsecured notes and was on the verge of bankruptcy. The difficulty with this contention is that the court found, upon conflicting evidence, that Perham himself authorized the loan to Vaniman, and not the bank.

Appellant also contends that the acts of the bank were fraudulent per se in making the loan of $5,000 to Martin, when Martin already owed Vaniman and the bank $8,000 on insufficient security. This contention is also answered by the fact that the court found that the bank did not authorize the loan to Martin, but that Perham himself authorized that the loan be made to R. M. Martin.

It is also contended by appellant that the bank was negligent in making the loans, in that the money was loaned to persons not financially responsible and without security. This contention is also answered by the finding that the money was loaned according to the directions of the husband of plaintiff, and also that such a cause of action is not raised by the pleadings.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss further any of the other contentions made, for the reason that the case in its last analysis is simply a case where the evidence is conflicting, and, the court having resolved the conflicts in favor of the defendant, such findings are conclusive on appeal, and the questions of law raised by appellant, however correct in the abstract, can avail her nothing in the face of such findings. Under such a situation we are not authorized to disturb the judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

REDD v. GARFORD MOTOR TRUCK CO., Inc., et al. (Civ. 4882.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Sales $\S$ 477(6)—Sellers' rights arising under conditional sales contract from buyer's failure to pay first installment held not waived by payment of subsequent installment.

Where buyer of truck under conditional sales contract failed to pay first installment, sellers' rights arising under contract held not to have been waived by payment of subsequent installment.

2. Sales $\S$ 481—Evidence attempting to show credit arrangement held not to support finding that defendants wrongfully repossessed truck under conditional sales contract.

Indefinite evidence attempting to show credit arrangement between buyer and sellers under conditional sales contract for sale of truck held insufficient to support finding that when defendants repossessed truck plaintiff was entitled to immediate possession, or that defendants wrongfully withheld possession from plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by C. C. Redd against the Garford Motor Truck Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. Cloyd Snyder, of Santa Paula, for appellants.

I. R. Rubin and M. G. C. Harris, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff purchased a truck of Garford Motor Truck Company, Inc., on a conditional sales contract. The sales price was $5,670.15, upon which he received credit for another truck turned in at $1,550, leaving a balance of $4,120.15, payable monthly as follows: October 14, 1923, $465, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, the balance payable at the rate of $215 with interest on the 14th of each succeeding month until the whole amount was paid. Time was of the essence of the contract, which provided that no representation other than contained in the contract would be recognized by lessee or lessor, and "that any payment made by the lessee to the lessor may at the option of the lessor be applied to any open or current account owing by the lessee to the lessor for any reason whatsoever."

Upon receipt of notice of the due date of the first installment of $465 and interest of $27.46, or total of $492.46, plaintiff gave the defendant Dean, Garford Company's agent, a check for $300, receiving back a memorandum credit: "By Cash 10/15/23 $205.50, By credit, 10/15/23, $50.00." The credit was for securing a buyer for the old car. At this time plaintiff owed $94.50 for merchandise. The $300 check was then applied as follows: $94.50 in merchandise, leaving the credit mentioned of $205.50, credit for sale of old truck, $50; total credits, $255.50—leaving unpaid on first installment, $236.96. In due time plaintiff received notice of second installment and paid it.

On November 21, 1923, plaintiff took this truck into defendants' place of business and left it there under an oral agreement that defendants would attempt to sell it. The next day defendants notified plaintiff that they had repossessed it under the contract. Shortly thereafter plaintiff offered to pay defendants $239.96, the unpaid balance of the first installment, but defendants refused to take it. The truck was worth $3,000 on November 22d. Judgment was given for plaintiff for the redelivery of the truck or $3,000 as the value thereof, and for $2,000 for its detention.

[1] These facts demonstrate that on the date of repossession of the truck there was unpaid on the first installment the sum of $236.96. The mere fact that a subsequent installment had been paid does not constitute a waiver of any rights under the contract. Pacific Finance, etc., Co. v. Pierce, 48 Cal. App. 600, 191 P. 1115; Benedict v. Greer-Robbins Co., 26 Cal. App. 468, 147 P. 486. But plaintiff claims some relief from the situation because of a claimed arrangement with defendant that he should be carried on an open book account. It is impossible, however, to get anything definite on that subject from the evidence. The trial judge expressed this difficulty, and, after direct and cross examination of plaintiff, the following took place at the trial:

"The Court: What do you mean by this open account? Do you mean that of the initial payment of $1,550, paid at the outset, there was a part that was not paid? A. Yes; that was our understanding, that I could pay that unpaid balance at any time I desired, any time that I could make the payment.

"Mr. Snyder: That is objected to as a conclusion, what the understanding was.

"The Court: When you refer to the open account you mean that there was carried on the books of Mr. Dean—of the Garford Motor Truck Company—a part of your first payment? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How much? A. The difference between $1,550 and a one-third value of the truck.

"Q. Well; what does that amount to? What was the total value of the truck? A. $5,500 and some odd dollars.

"Q. Well; it was $1,550 plus $4,120.15, was it not? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That would be $5,670.15? A. Yes, sir; the full value of the truck, less $50 credit.

"Q. And you say the amount of the open account was one-fourth of the difference? A. One-third.

"Q. One-third of the difference between $5,620.15 and $1,550? A. Yes; less that $50—well, I see you have deducted that already.

"Q. That would be over $1,000; it would be $1,356.71, according to your explanation. A. It shows on the statements the amount of the unpaid balance of the open account, which I always went by—on the statements that I received."

There is no statement in evidence alluding to an unpaid balance of an open account. On the contrary, all of the statements in evidence refer to the contract. If anything can be made out of this, it is that the ordinary terms of sale of the truck was one-fourth of the whole sales price down, but that because plaintiff had not sufficient funds he was allowed to take the truck on $1,550 down. In some unaccountable manner plaintiff got the idea that the difference was a book account credit. Of course, the contract shows that the price of the truck less initial payment was strung out through 18 monthly payments, and the contract embraces the whole agreement.

[2] It is obvious that the evidence does not support the finding that on the day of dis-possession plaintiff was entitled to the immediate possession of the truck, or that defendants wrongfully and unlawfully withheld it from plaintiff; but, on the other hand, the evidence shows affirmatively and without contradiction that defendants' retention of the truck was within their rights under the contract. It follows that the damages allowed in the judgment as the value of the truck and for the detention thereof from plaintiff are left without support.

Judgment reversed.

Austin W. Arnold, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery in the first degree. The ground of appeal is the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict.

The complaining witness, upon reaching his home, was informed of a telephone message requesting him to go to the apartment of Miss Harris, a place where he had frequently called before. The message said that a party was in progress. He went there. Miss Harris was not at home, but was out of town and in Del Monte. He was admitted by a man and was almost immediately attacked by two men who robbed him, bound his hands and feet, and threatened to shoot him. One of the robbers remained behind him. He could not be described to the police. The other robber worked in front. The complaining witness' description of this man to the police and to Miss Harris subsequently led them to declare in the presence of defendant that the description was that of a man known as "Slick," who was a friend, companion, and "partner" of the defendant. Slick was never found after the robbery. The complaining witness worked himself free from his bindings after the robbers left him lying upon a bed in the apartment. He gathered three or four friends, and while returning to the scene of the robbery met the defendant on the street in company with a woman companion with whom the defendant lived. He complained to the defendant of his misfortune. Defendant asked him to say nothing on the street, but took him and his friends into his own apartment, which was just across the hall from the apartment of Miss Harris. Defendant there urged him to say nothing for two or three days, and that he would give a party and probably find out who it was that committed the robbery. The complaining witness testified that later at the police station the defendant said that, "if I would on the oath of my mother swear to God that I would not press charges if he got me my ring," he would try to get it back if I would go to Oakland with him. There was also testimony that Slick was a friend of defendant; that the purpose of going to Oakland to try and get the ring was to try and locate "Slick." Defendant refused to go to Oakland in company with the police, but offered to go with the complaining witness. When the complaining witness at the police headquarters asked defendant, "Jack, why don't you come clean and give me my ring and keys, because you are the fellow who did the framing of this job," defendant said, "Well, if I come clean, I do time anyway." Defendant's own version of this was: "They wanted me to go over to Oakland and find Slick. I said, 'Well, if I get the ring what guaranty have I got I will get out of this. What guaranty have I got?'"

Miss Harris testified that she had gone into defendant's apartment on the night of the robbery; that she there saw another man with defendant; that she told them she was then going to Del Monte; that defendant had access to her apartment by means of a key to her door which was kept in a certain hiding place; that she knew no one else besides the defendant who had knowledge of the hiding place of the key.

The arresting police officer testified that defendant, upon being arrested, denied knowing any other name for Slick and declared he knew him only casually. He denied having a gun, although he had a number of automatic pistol cartridges upon his person when searched and had dropped 30 or 40 of them in the patrol wagon. Defendant later admitted ownership of the pistol which the police obtained from his apartment by stating to his woman companion that he had sent for it. This pistol was produced in court and said by the complaining witness to be similar to the one used by one of the robbers. Defendant later admitted knowing Slick by his correct name, and that he formerly had lived with him.

There is no question about the robbery having been committed at the time, place, and manner testified to. We think the evidence for the prosecution which we have reviewed is sufficient to support the jury's finding that the defendant was one of the principals to the robbery.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILNER v. TOLIVER (two cases).★
(Civ. 4672.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 19, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Municipal corporations ⇨706(6, 7)—Conflicting evidence held to make negligence of automobile driver and contributory negligence of pedestrian question for jury, whose verdict is conclusive.

In action by pedestrians for injuries from being struck by automobile, conflicting evidence held to make negligence and contributory negligence questions for jury, whose verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1066—Instruction which might have been construed as applying inapplicable doctrine of last clear chance held not prejudicial error, where contributory negligence was not shown.

In action by pedestrians for injuries from being struck by automobile, held that, in view of absence of evidence of contributory negligence, no prejudicial error resulted from instruction which might have been construed by jury as stating doctrine of last clear chance, which was inapplicable to the case, since to make such doctrine applicable contributory negligence must be presupposed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Anna Milner against W. O. Toliver, and by Olive Milner against same defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph Musgrove and Fred O. McGirr, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. The appeal in the above-entitled action is from two verdicts by a jury in the consolidated cases, one in favor of Anna Milner for $2,000 and one in favor of Olive Milner, her daughter, in the sum of $1,000. These actions grew out of an accident occurring about 9:50 p. m. on the 18th day of February, 1922, at or near the intersection of Alvarado and Sixth streets in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiffs were crossing Alvarado street from the southeast corner of Alvarado and Sixth streets to the westerly side of Alvarado street, and were struck by the car of defendant. Plaintiffs allege negligence on the part of defendant and the answer alleges contributory negligence on the part of plaintiffs. It was contended by plaintiffs that they were crossing Alvarado street after having looked in both directions, particularly, first to the south, and, after they crossed the street car lines, to the north; that they did not see any car but the street car until the automobile was within about a foot of them; that they were walking at a moderate rate of speed and were within about 6 feet of the west side of Alvarado street when hit by the car. The defendant claims that they were proceeding westerly on Sixth street and had stopped at the intersection of Sixth and Alvarado streets before starting into the intersection; that there was no one on the street when they started to make the turn except the street car, which was at the south side of Sixth street, just west of Alvarado street, preparing to turn south on Alvarado street; that they were going about 15 to 18 miles an hour and did not see the plaintiffs until they observed them just in front of the car, running across to the west. The evidence of J. W. Bond, a motorman on the street car, was that at the time he first saw the plaintiffs they were just west on the west car track on Alvarado street and that they moved about 10 feet further before they were hit by the automobile; that the automobile was 25 to 50 feet north of the plaintiffs when he first observed them; and that it hit them, as stated, when the plaintiffs had moved about 10 feet further. The evidence shows that the plaintiffs were hit while crossing to the west curb about 6 or 8 feet from the west curb. The motorman of the street car testified that the defendants were going more than 20 miles an hour, and he said in a statement made soon after the accident that they were going probably 35 miles. A passenger on the street car stated that the plaintiffs were running across the car tracks and that the defendant was going faster than 20 miles an hour and possibly not 30. Both of these witnesses testified that the defendant crossed in front of the street car after the bell was rung by the motorman. One of them stated that he believed that the automobile speeded up.

Considering the evidence in the light of the testimony of either of these witnesses and that of the plaintiffs and of defendant and his wife, if the plaintiffs were moving at an ordinary gait, they were not going more than 3 miles an hour, and, according to defendant's wife, the defendant was moving about 15 miles an hour, or about five times as fast as plaintiffs. If we take the testimony of plaintiffs that they were walking across the street, the first notice of danger would have been after the defendant's car turned south, and, allowing the greatest distance estimated by witness Bond to be 50 feet between plaintiffs and defendant, and the speed of the defendant to be 15 miles per hour, they would have reached plaintiffs in about two seconds. If, on the contrary, we consider that plaintiffs were running at 6 miles per hour, then defendant would have traveled about 30 miles an hour. The relative speed, as the testimony shows, would have been five or six or more times as fast on the part of defendant, and if the plaintiffs were running the speed of defendant, then would have been that much more negligent. There is nothing in the evidence to show that there was any reason why the plaintiffs should not cross Alvarado street directly south of Sixth street from curb to curb, and, while they had the same right in the street as the defendant, the law places more of a burden upon those who turn in an intersection than it does upon those who go straight across the street. Outside of the street car, which did not preclude the crossing of the plaintiffs, there seems to have been no other object to interfere with the view of the defendant or of the plaintiffs. There is no evidence that any sound or signal was given by the defendant which could have been observed by the plaintiffs until the lights flashed upon them. The law requires that those turning at an intersection shall see that the way is clear. The evidence of the motorman on the street car is that the plaintiffs were across the car tracks and moving directly to the west at about the time the automobile passed in front of his car, and his view was apparently not obscured until the automobile hit the plaintiffs. This tends to show that the plaintiffs were moving in accordance with the law and at a proper speed and that there was no reason on the part of the defendant for not having observed plaintiffs at least after the turn of the defendant's car south on Alvarado street. The light would not have in any way attracted plaintiffs so as to warn them before that turn was made. Taking the evidence of plaintiffs and the other two witnesses, it would appear that that car of the defendant was going at least five times as fast as the plaintiffs, who were, according to the motorman, west of the street car tracks at the time the turn was made by the defendant.

This is a sufficient discussion of the testimony to show the conflict therein and that the facts were such as should have been and were determined by the jury. There is no particular dispute as to the injury suffered, and only two questions seem to be raised by the briefs of appellant and respondent.

[1] Whatever conflict of evidence there was, was in regard to the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiffs and the negligence of the defendant. The jury by their verdict must have found the plaintiffs not guilty of contributory negligence and the defendant guilty of negligence, or they could not have rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiffs. This conflict of evidence is a matter for the jury and, after being passed upon by them, is not to be disturbed by this court. In the case of Moss v. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 476, 186 P. 631, 632, it is said:

"Contributory negligence 'is a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference than that in the one case the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. * * * When the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from those facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, then, and only then, does the law step in and forbid plaintiff a recovery. * * * Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury.' Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 P. 513; Wing v. Western Pac. Co., 41 Cal. App. 251, 182 P. 969. And the question of contributory negligence must be determined without regard to any negligence on the part of defendant. Hutson v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 903, 89 P. 1093."

[2] The only other point raised is whether the instruction of the court which reads as follows: "The liability is placed upon the party inflicting the injury if immediately before the actual infliction of the injury the injured person was in such a situation as to be unable by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care on her part to extricate herself, and vigilance on her part would not have averted the injury," was of such a nature as to materially affect the verdict of the jury against defendant when considered in connection with all of the other instructions given by the trial court. The instruction complained of is not an instruction on the doctrine of the last clear chance, nor is this a case where an instruction on that doctrine is allowable for the reason that contributory negligence must be presupposed to make the doctrine applicable; therefore it becomes a question of whether the jury put such a construction on it, considered with all the other instructions, as to affect the substantial rights of the defendant.

There being a conflict of testimony as to negligence of the parties and the jury having passed on the evidence, and as the instruction complained of could be harmonized with other instructions in case there was no contributory negligence, no prejudicial error is found in the instruction taken as a whole. In the case of Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 218 P. 36, it is said:

"The appellant complains of the giving of one instruction which is justly subject to the criticism that it was likely to be misleading. It should not have been given without further qualifications or explanation, but it is not probable that the jurors were misled thereby under the evidence herein."

The words quoted from the opinion in Palmer v. Tschudy, supra, seem very appropriate in this case, for we find nothing in the evidence as given in the transcript which would warrant a finding of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. On the contrary, the plaintiffs were crossing Alvarado street on the south side of Sixth street toward the west, and were past the center of Alvarado street before the defendant turned south thereon, and the plaintiffs were moving at least at an ordinary pace or faster, according to the defendant's testimony, and were within 6 or 8 feet of the west curb when struck by defendant's car. Quoting the criticism of the court in the case cited above in connection with the instruction complained of here we say, "It should not have been given without further qualifications or explanation;" but under all the evidence in this case it is not probable that the jurors were misled, or would have rendered any different verdict had the instruction complained of not been given.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FRAZIER. (Cr. 1495.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 21, 1927.

1. Parent and child $\S$ 17(6)—Evidence held to show father's failure to support minor child, willful and without lawful excuse (Pen. Code, $\S$ 270).

In prosecution for failure to provide minor child with necessary food, clothing, etc., defendant's failure to furnish support for which he was legally obligated held willful and without lawful excuse within Pen. Code $\S$ 270, under evidence establishing fact that some provision for support of child was necessary, since father is not relieved from criminal liability for such omission merely because some other person furnishes necessary food, etc., for such child.

2. Parent and child $\S$ 17(2)—Father's contributing certain sums for support of minor child and inability for few months to make contribution held not inconsistent with criminal negligence and omission.

The fact that on certain occasions father gave to mother of minor child certain small sums of money for child's support, and that during a few months a situation prevented him from making any contributions towards the child's support, held not inconsistent with fact that father was guilty of criminal negligence and omission to provide for such child.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 150—Crime of failure to support minor child is in nature of continuing offense.

Crime of neglect and refusal to support minor child is in the nature of a continuing offense, and may be established by proving that it was committed any time before statute of limitations barred prosecution therefor.

4. Parent and child $\S$ 17(6)—It may be inferred that father might have applied some of money earned towards support of minor child (Pen. Code, $\S$ 270).

Where father of minor child was free to work, and actually did work and earn substantial sums of money all of time between 1922 and 1926, it may be inferred that he might have applied some of money earned towards support of minor child, pursuant to requirement under Pen. Code, $\S$ 270, since its amendment of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 592).

5. Criminal law $\S$ 170(2)—Defendant held not substantially prejudiced by exclusion of facts on cross-examination of prosecuting witness covered by other evidence.

Where substantially all of facts excluded by rulings on cross-examination of prosecuting witness were covered by other evidence introduced as a part of defendant's case, defendant will not be held to have been substantially prejudiced thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Paul Frazier was convicted for neglect and refusal to provide minor child with necessary food, clothing, etc., and he appeals. Affirmed.

David W. Richards, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. [1, 2] The record does not show any motion for a new trial. On appeal from the judgment, defendant contends that the verdict is contrary to law, in that the evidence failed to prove that the minor child was in need of any of the common necessities of life, and that the evidence fails to show that defendant at any time failed or refused to pay for the support of said minor child. Section 270 of the Penal Code, referring to the offense which is the subject of this action, provides that the omission by the father of a child to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter, or medical attendance, or other remedial care, for his child, is prima facie evidence that such omission is willful and without excuse. It is also provided that the father is not relieved from criminal liability for such omission merely because the mother of such child, or any other person, furnishes such necessary food, etc., for such child. There is in the record abundant evidence that during a large part of the time for several years, down to and including the date definitely stated in the information (November 15, 1926, "and prior thereto"), the defendant was earning a substantial income, but did not make any provision for his child, or even trouble himself so far as to investigate and find out how she was provided for, or to what extent other persons were contributing to the child's support. It is in evidence that, at and before the period of time covered by the information, said child was being supported by a person not legally bound to do so, to wit, the second husband of the child's mother, to whom said mother had been married after her divorce from the defendant. We think that the evidence is sufficient to establish the fact that some provision for the support of this child was necessary; that the defendant was legally obligated to furnish such support; and that his failure to do so was willful, and without lawful excuse. The fact that on a very few occasions the defendant gave to the child's mother certain small sums for the support of the child, and the further fact that during a few months the defendant's situation prevented him from making any contribution toward the child's support, is not inconsistent with the fact that for long periods of time and within the period covered by the information the defendant was guilty of criminal neglect and omission to provide for said child.

[3] The crime charged in the information is in the nature of a continuing offense, and may be established by proving that it was committed at any time before the statute of limitations bars prosecution therefor. People v. Curry, 69 Cal. App. 501, 231 P. 358.

[4] Counsel for appellant claims that, because section 270 of the Penal Code was amended in 1925 (amendment effective July 23, 1925 [St. 1925, p. 544]), to read as it now is, therefore the only law under which the evidence could involve him in any criminal liability would be for the period beginning

July 23, 1925. It is a fact, however, that all of those portions of said section 270 to which we have referred, and which established the law under which defendant was prosecuted, have been a part of that section since the amendment of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 592). The evidence admitted tends to prove, and the defendant admitted, that during approximately all of the time between 1922 and 1926 the defendant was free to work, and actually did work and earn substantial sums of money. It is a fair inference that he might have applied some of this money toward the support of his minor child, if he had been disposed so to do.

[5] Appellant complains of two rulings of the court on cross-examination of the prosecuting witness. Substantially all of the facts excluded by those rulings were covered by other evidence introduced as a part of the defendant's case. Without holding that the rulings were erroneous, it is enough to say that the defendant was not substantially prejudiced thereby.

Finally, appellant contends that there was no proof of willful failure to provide for the child during the time that the defendant was in the marine corps and during the World War. In view of the fact that there is ample evidence to establish such willful neglect during the period extending from 1923 to 1926 the point suggested is not material to the merits of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PARISI. (Cr. 1386.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Witnesses ⇨363(1)—As respects attempt to extort money from defendant, motives of adverse witness may be inquired into to repel presumption witness speaks truth (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, as respects alleged attempt to extort money from defendant, motives of adverse witnesses could be inquired into to repel presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 1847, that witnesses spoke truth.

2. Witnesses ⇨372(2)—As foundation for impeaching witness for attempted extortion or revenge, first question must be whether prosecution was not begun for such purposes.

To lay foundation for impeachment of witness because he instigated prosecution for purpose of extortion or revenge, witness must first be asked direct question if he has not begun prosecution for purposes named.

3. Witnesses $\S$ 372(2)—As regards question of extortion, sustaining objection to question as to what took place after prosecuting witnesses left defendant's apartment where offense was committed not touched on in direct examination, held proper.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, where direct examination of boy's mother and detective ended at point where mother and boy left defendant's apartment, where offense was committed, and started home, as regards question of extortion of money from defendant, sustaining objection to question as to what took place after prosecuting witnesses left was proper, where such matter had not been touched on in direct examination.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(3)—Defendant was not harmed by rulings on impeaching testimony as regards extortion, in view of his own testimony.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, defendant was not harmed by sustaining of objections to his cross-examination of prosecuting witnesses as to what took place subsequent to the time witnesses left his apartment, as affecting question of extortion, where, according to his own testimony, no one connected with the prosecution had demanded money from him.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(2)—Court's comment that evidence of prosecuting witness was immaterial was harmless, in view of charge that jury were sole judges of evidence.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, comment of trial court, in overruling prosecution's objections to defendant's examination of boy victim as to contradictory statements made at previous trial, that, although testimony was immaterial, it would be allowed to stand, was harmless, in view of charge that jury were sole judges of weight of evidence.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1119(2)—Transcript of evidence at former trial not being offered, reviewing court cannot say that ruling that evidence was immaterial was wrong.

In criminal prosecution, where transcript of evidence at former trial was not offered, reviewing court cannot say that trial court's ruling in overruling prosecution's objections to cross-examination of boy witness as to testimony at former trial that evidence was immaterial but would be allowed to stand was wrong.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 959—Refusal to continue motion for new trial on oral application to permit securing of affidavits held not abuse of discretion.

Trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to continue hearing of motion for new trial on oral application of defendant's counsel, in which he requested time to secure affidavits to support motion, but did not disclose whose affidavits he expected to obtain or what contents thereof would be nor why they had not already been obtained or that there were grounds to believe they would be obtained in future.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Antone Parisi was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George Lipman and Milton T. U'ren, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant was charged by indictment with the infamous crime against nature, and upon trial was found guilty. He has appealed from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial. As grounds for reversal, he contends that the trial court improperly limited his cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses, and thereby deprived him of the right to show that his arrest and prosecution were the result of an attempted extortion; also that the court erred in arbitrarily refusing to grant him time to secure affidavits to be used on motion for a new trial.

The circumstances leading up to the defendant's arrest, as they appear from the evidence, were as follows: The alleged crime was committed upon a boy 18 years of age, with whom and with whose family defendant had been on friendly terms for many years. At the time of his arrest and for some time prior thereto defendant lived alone in a couple of rooms constructed mostly of windows and glass doors on the roof of a building which he owned on Kearny street, San Francisco. During the early part of May, the boy's mother became suspicious of her son's appearance and conduct, and, unknown to the boy, employed a private detective named Otts to ascertain the character of the boy's habits and associates. While pursuing this employment, and about 6 o'clock on the evening of May 19th, Otts saw defendant talking to the boy on the street near defendant's premises and overheard him apparently make an appointment to meet the boy at 8 o'clock, pointing in the direction of his (the defendant's) apartment. Thereupon Otts informed the boy's mother that her son had been frequenting defendant's living quarters and was going to meet him there that night at 8 o'clock. She replied that there was no objection in his doing so; that defendant had been a good friend to the family for many years, particularly since the death of her husband some six years before; that he had been like a father to the boy, and consequently she was glad to have the boy in defendant's company. Being unable to convince her of the probability of improper relations existing between the two, and without notifying her or any one else of his intention, Otts planned to conceal one of his operatives in or near de-defendant's apartment at the appointed hour that night, which he succeeded in doing in the following manner: The rear portion of defendant's premises, facing an alley, contained a garage, the keys to which were in defendant's possession, wherein were stored certain motor vehicles, one being a truck belonging to an acquaintance named Mrs. Donati, which she wanted to sell. Otts told the boy's mother he desired to purchase the truck for a friend and to have Mrs. Donati meet them at the garage that night about 8 o'clock for the purpose of allowing him to inspect the truck. According to the testimony of the prosecution's witnesses, none of them knew of Otts' real purpose in asking to inspect the truck. The boy's mother and Mrs. Donati were accompanied to the garage by the boy, his married sister, and Otts, whereupon defendant was summoned from his apartment by the boy's sister to open the garage and allow the inspection to be made. While the defendant was thus engaged, Otts left the garage under the pretext of going to phone to the prospective buyer of the truck, and while gone he succeeded in concealing his operative in the defendant's apartment. Soon after Otts left the garage the women and the boy started to leave, but, according to the testimony of the boy, his mother, and his sister, defendant placed his hand on the boy's arm and asked him to remain, which he consented to do. The women then left, and defendant, after closing and locking the garage proceeded with the boy up the back way to his apartment, where it is claimed the alleged criminal act was committed. During the perpetration of the act, Otts' operative came out from his place of concealment under the bed and called loudly for Otts, who, it seems, after leaving the garage, returned to the street to bring the boy's mother and his sister to the roof and then concealed himself near a window where he could observe what occurred inside defendant's apartment. Immediately upon hearing his operative call for him, Otts broke through the glass door and entered the apartment, followed by the boy's mother and sister, and according to their testimony, they saw the defendant and the boy just coming out of the bedroom, both partly disrobed. It is unnecessary to relate the details of the animated discussion which followed, more than to say that, according to the prosecution's witnesses, the boy, in defendant's presence, admitted that the crime charged had been committed upon him by defendant not only that night but on frequent occasions ever since the death of his father, as a result of which he had become diseased. The defendant did not deny these accusations, so the prosecution's witnesses testified, but tried to persuade the boy's mother and Otts against causing his arrest, stating that such action on their part would only bring disgrace upon the boy, that he would see to it that the boy was cured of the disease, and that he would

"fix the whole thing" by paying the boy's mother a large sum of money, and, furthermore, that he offered to pay Otts $1,500, saying he had known similar cases to be fixed for $1,000. All of these propositions were emphatically rejected, however, and the boy's mother insisted that defendant be taken to prison. Thereupon she left for home, accompanied by her son and her daughter.

At the trial, defendant denied ever having had improper relations with the boy, and charged that his arrest was the result of a scheme to extort money from him. In support of his claim of innocence, defendant testified that on the night in question the boy left the garage with the others; that thereupon he locked the doors and proceeded toward his apartment alone; that about the time he reached the roof he observed Otts and the boy's mother and his sister standing near his front door waiting, as he thought, for him to open the door; that the front door was fastened with a nail on the inside, and, that, consequently he entered through the rear door, intending to pass through the house to open the front door, but that, as he entered the rooms, he found the boy lying on the bed and at the same time saw a man with a pistol crawling out from beneath the bed, immediately following which Otts, the boy's mother and his sister entered the room and accused him of having committed the criminal act charged.

The numerous rulings criticized by defendant run throughout the record and are discussed in his brief in the order in which they were made. In considering the same here, we shall for convenience group them with reference to the subject-matter to which they relate.

[1-3] The direct examination of the boy's mother and of Otts ended at the point where the women and the boy left defendant's apartment and started for home. On cross-examination, defendant's counsel sought to prove what had taken place subsequent to that time. The prosecution interposed numerous objections, mainly upon the ground that the testimony sought to be elicited was not cross-examination, and many of these objections were sustained. Defendant contends that as a result of these rulings he was deprived of the right to show that later on that night, at Otts' office, an attempt was made to extort money from him. With respect to the admissibility of this kind of proof the law doubtless allows the motives of an adverse witness to be inquired into for the purpose of repelling the presumption that he speaks the truth (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847), and consequently a witness may be impeached by showing that he has instigated the prosecution for the purpose of extortion or revenge. But the decisions hold that, in order to lay the foundation for such impeachment, the witness must first be asked the direct question if he had not begun the prosecution for the purposes mentioned. People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 P. 131; People v. Emmons, 7 Cal. App. 685, 95 P. 1032. In the present case, defendant's counsel did not follow the foregoing rule, but, on the contrary, proceeded to prove on cross-examination the subsequent occurrences of that night in the chronological order in which they happened; that is, to show step by step what next occurred after the women and the boy left defendant's apartment. The trial court was consequently justified, we think, in sustaining the objections to the questions put in the form mentioned.

[4] In announcing its rulings and in explanation thereof, however, the trial court stated, in effect, on at least two occasions, that it recognized defendant's right to impeach the prosecution's witnesses upon the grounds mentioned and was willing that he should do so providing he complied with the rule above stated, and pointed out to defendant that under such rule he would be allowed to ask direct questions to show the motives of the witnesses, but was not allowed to accomplish that purpose by interrogating the witnesses as to the subsequent transactions occurring that night which were not touched upon during their direct examination, because, the court remarked, if such course were followed much immaterial matter would be brought before the jury. Finally, however, counsel for defendant did elicit from the witnesses testimony sufficient to lay the foundation for the introduction of impeachment evidence; the boy's mother having testified that no demands for money were made in her presence, and Otts having testified that no one other than the defendant mentioned the payment of money to drop the case. But, when the time arrived to bring forth the impeachment evidence, defendant, although having previously stated that "they" demanded money, etc., indicating that Otts and the boy's mother had done so, expressly disclaimed that either of them had ever made such a demand, and stated that the only demand came from a man named Montgomery which was made in Otts' office on Market street, where he was subsequently taken and detained by Otts until midnight, after which he was delivered into the custody of the police at the police station; that those present at Otts' office besides Otts and the defendant were Montgomery, and part of the time at least, an attorney called in by the defendant, the boy, his mother, and his sister; but, in answer to questions propounded by the court, defendant clearly stated that the only demand made upon him for money came from Montgomery while only himself and Otts were present. No evidence was thereafter offered on behalf of the defendant to prove, nor did it anywhere appear in the record, how or under what circumstances Montgomery appeared in the case or what his connection was therewith; neither did Montgomery testify as a witness in the case; therefore, on motion of the district attorney, the court ordered stricken out as hearsay defendant's previous testimony indicating that the demand for money came from the prosecution's witnesses. Immediately following this ruling, defendant's counsel resumed the examination, and defendant repeated his former statement that no one except Montgomery had ever made a demand for money, his testimony being as follows:

"Mr. Lipman (Attorney for Defendant) Q. Now, how long were you in this office, Mr. Parisi, on Market street? * * * A. I was there more than three hours. Mr. Lipman Q. Well, did any one else besides Mr. Montgomery speak to you regarding money in that room at that time that night? * * * A. No."

This latter testimony was not stricken out, and thereupon the evidence as to the demand for money ended. It therefore appears that, notwithstanding the rulings complained of limiting the cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses, defendant was permitted to and did in fact establish the foundation for the impeachment testimony, and furthermore was afforded an opportunity to produce the same, but by his own testimony proved that the demand which he claims was made came from one not shown to be connected in any way with the witnesses who had appeared against him. Since the defendant contradicted Otts' testimony to the effect that no demand for money was made by anybody in his presence, defendant was doubtless entitled, in support of his claim that such a demand was made to relate the nature of the demand and the circumstances under which he claims it was made. But, as pointed out, after he had sworn to the fact that it was Montgomery who made the demand, further examination by his counsel on this point was apparently abandoned; therefore, since Montgomery was not called as a witness, the conflict arising between defendant's testimony and that of Otts, as to whether Montgomery had made such demand, was left for the jury to resolve from such evidence as it had before it. The state of the record described therefore shows that, despite any technical errors which may have been committed by the trial court in ruling upon particular questions, defendant was not deprived of any substantial right.

Defendant further contends that he was denied the right to prove on cross-examination of the boy that the latter knew of Otts' employment and of the latter's plan to entrap the defendant; but the record does not support this contention, for it shows that the boy was cross-examined upon the subjects mentioned, and testified that he had no conversation with his mother or sister or with Otts about the matter; and that he was not aware of the nature of Otts' business. Neither does the record sustain defendant's claim that he was not allowed to cross-examine the boy as to what occurred after leaving defendant's apartment, for it shows that defendant did quite fully interrogate the boy upon such matters. The only question ruled out related to the hour defendant left Otts' office, and this fact was established by other proof and in any event was not disputed.

[5, 6] Defendant complains also of the comment made by the trial court in overruling the prosecution's objections to the cross-examination of the boy with reference to certain contradictory statements claimed to have been made by him at a previous trial of the action relating to the question of whether or not the detective who was under the bed was armed, and as to the description given by the boy of the defendant's clothing. In making its ruling, the court remarked that, although in its opinion the testimony was immaterial, the same would be allowed to stand; that the jury was to weigh it for what it was worth. But the jury was charged at the conclusion of the evidence that the jurors were the sole and exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and that the court had not intended to intimate what inferences were to be drawn from the evidence adduced, and that, if any expression of the court so indicated, such expression was to be disregarded. Therefore we do not believe that the remarks complained of operated against the defendant with any prejudicial effect. Defendant did not offer in evidence the portion of the transcript of evidence taken at the former trial by which he sought to impeach the boy's testimony as to the period of time elapsing between the time he left the garage and the time when Otts broke into defendant's apartment; consequently we are unable to say whether or not the court erred in holding as it did that the asserted contradiction was immaterial.

The rulings complained of in connection with the cross-examination of the boy's mother, other than those already noticed, are not of a serious nature. As to whether or not she knew who lived on defendant's premises would seem to be unimportant, because she had already testified that on the night in question she saw none of the inmates of the house; and the asserted suggestion by the court of two answers during the cross-examination of the witness about which complaint is made was harmless, because the court, apparently to save time, merely repeated the answers already given by the witness on cross-examination on the same point, neither of which answers was vital, having relation only to the witness' estimate of the period of time elapsing between the time she was going from the garage to the roof and while she was waiting at the top of the stairway near the roof before entering defendant's apartment.

Neither can we sustain the contention that defendant was not allowed on cross-examination to test the memory of the witness Otts as to the kind of a coat defendant was wearing, and as to the order in which the parties left defendant's apartment that night; also with reference to fixing the time when Otts first arrived at the garage. An examination of the record discloses that either before or after the rulings complained of were made the witness was interrogated upon these points. We have examined the remaining points urged by defendant relating to the cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses, but do not believe they possess sufficient merit to require discussion.

[7] Defendant's final contention is that the court abused its discretion in refusing to continue the hearing of the motion for a new trial. The application for continuance was made orally by defendant's counsel, in which he stated that defendant desired time to secure affidavits in support of his motion; but he did not disclose whose affidavits defendant expected to obtain nor what the contents of the affidavits would be, nor why the affidavits had not already been secured; neither was it stated that there were reasonable grounds to believe that the same could or would be obtained in the future, or, if so, when. As said in People v. Burrows, 27 Cal. App. 428, 150 P. 382:

"In the absence of any showing that it [the continuance] will inure to the benefit of the defendant or be likely to right some wrong that may have been done him, how can the court say that any continuance should be granted? This cannot be assumed from the mere application for a delay. There must be some evidence offered in support of the application. Here the bald request was made of the court without any pretense of evidence or suggestion of any fact that would indicate the justice or propriety of granting the motion. There was no intimation of what was expected to be set forth in said affidavits, nor was any reason shown why the affidavits had not already been secured."

For the reasons stated in that case, it is apparent that the application for the continuance in the present case was properly denied. People v. Winthrop, 118 Cal. 85, 50 P. 390; People v. Ross, 134 Cal. 256, 66 P. 229; People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 229 P. 40; People v. Ortiz, 63 Cal. App. 662, 219 P. 1024.

In conclusion, it may be stated that, in view of the serious nature of the charge against the defendant and the circumstances attending his arrest, we have scrutinized the record in the case with care, and, although it would seem that the trial court required defendant's counsel in the presentation of the defense to adhere strictly to the rigid rules of evidence, we are not prepared to say that the rulings complained of had the effect of depriving defendant of a fair trial, nor do we believe, in view of the evidence adduced against him, that the trial has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

WHETSTONE v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA.
(Civ. 3248.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Physicians and surgeons ☞§11(3)—Accusation charging unprofessional conduct in that dentist permitted his office nurse to clean teeth and administer treatment for pyorrhea held sufficient (Dental Act, § 14).

On proceedings under Dental Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 2048) § 14, to suspend license to practice dentistry, accusation alleging that respondent did unlawfully aid and abet an unlicensed person to practice dentistry, in that he permitted his office nurse to clean teeth and administer treatment for pyorrhea, held sufficient in substance and form.

2. Physicians and surgeons ☞§11(3)—Refusal of board of dental examiners, in proceeding to suspend for unprofessional conduct, to grant continuance for further testimony, held not to show abuse of discretion.

In proceeding before board of dental examiners for suspension of license to practice dentistry, board held not to have abused its discretion in refusing to grant respondent's motion for continuance in order to produce rebuttal testimony, where it was not shown that respondent had any such testimony to offer or could produce it.

3. Physicians and surgeons ☞§11(3)—Suspension of license to practice dentistry will not be disturbed, if supported by substantial testimony.

Finding of board of dental examiners, suspending license to practice dentistry, will not be disturbed, if there is any substantial testimony supporting it.

4. Physicians and surgeons ☞§11(3)—Dentist, charged with permitting office nurse to practice dentistry without license, has burden of proving that such office nurse was duly licensed.

In proceeding to suspend dentist's license to practice because he permitted his office nurse to clean teeth and treat pyorrhea, it is matter of defense to show that such nurse was duly licensed, but burden is on dentist to prove it.

5. Physicians and surgeons ☞§11(3)—Evidence that dentist permitted nurse to clean teeth and treat pyorrhea held sufficient to show "practice of dentistry" by unlicensed person (Dental Act, § 11).

In proceeding to suspend dentist's license to practice on ground that he permitted office nurse to practice dentistry without license, evidence that office nurse cleaned teeth and treated pyorrhea held sufficient to show "practice of dentistry" within Dental Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 2048) § 11.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Proceeding by the State Board of Dental Examiners against L. S. Whetstone for suspension of respondent's license to practice dentistry. Order suspending respondent's license was, on writ of certiorari to superior court, annulled, and the Board appeals. Judgment reversed, and writ denied.

Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for appellant.

J. M. Inman and P. G. West, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 15th day of March, 1926, the dental board of examiners of the state of California, after hearing had upon the accusation charging the petitioner with unprofessional conduct, made and entered its order suspending the petitioner's license to practice dentistry in the state of California for the period of five years. Upon writ of certiorari, this order was annulled. From this judgment the board of dental examiners of the state of California appeals.

The accusation filed with the dental board of examiners, and upon which the petitioner was tried and found guilty, alleges that the petitioner, on or about the 12th day of January, 1926, did willfully and unlawfully aid and abet an unlicensed person to practice dentistry in the state of California, in that the said L. S. Whetstone did knowingly and unlawfully allow and permit his office nurse to clean teeth and administer treatment for pyorrhea on the gums of one J. W. Cull, at the office of said L. S. Whetstone, in the city of Sacramento, and that the said L. S. Whetstone did, prior thereto, and on or about the 15th day of August, 1925, knowingly and willfully permit and allow his office nurse to treat the gums of one J. O. Babcock for pyorrhea, and that the said L. S. Whetstone did willfully, knowingly, and unlawfully permit and allow his office nurse, at his office, to clean the teeth of various other persons, at various other times, and that during all of said times said office nurse was not licensed to practice dentistry in the state of California, which said fact was, during all of said time, well known to the said L. S. Whetstone.

[1] It was contended in the trial court, and is also contended here, that the accusation filed against petitioner is insufficient in substance and form, and that it does not sufficiently comply with the provisions of section 14 of the Dental Act of the state of California, known as Act 2048, Deering's General Laws. That section reads as follows:

"The proceedings to revoke or suspend any license under the third subdivision of section 13, may be taken upon the information of another. All accusations must be in writing, verified by some party familiar with the facts therein charged, and three copies thereof must be filed with the secretary of the board. Upon receiving the accusation the board shall, if it deem the complaint sufficient, make an order setting the same for hearing, at a specified time and place, and the secretary shall cause a copy of the order and of the accusation to be served upon the accused at least ten days before the day appointed in the order for said hearing."

No question is raised as to service of citation nor as to the statutory time allowed petitioner to answer the accusation. The objection is directed to the fact that at the hearing two witnesses were permitted to testify to other acts relating to the practice of dentistry where the patients were other than those specifically mentioned in the accusation. This testimony was admitted under the general allegation contained in the accusation that the petitioner had permitted the nurses in his office to perform the same and similar acts upon other patients, just as set out in the accusation in relation to the patients named Cull and Babcock.

In support of his contention that the accusation is insufficient and does not comply with the statute by reason of this general portion thereof, which we have set forth, the petitioner cites the case of McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 P. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691. An examination of the facts set out in the opinion in that case discloses, however, that it does not support petitioner's contention. In the McClatchy Case the petitioner was denied an opportunity to present testimony. The sufficiency of the accusation or the pleadings upon which McClatchy was being tried were really not involved. It was simply the right to be heard and to present testimony which was denied. The petitioner also relies upon the case of Dyment v. Board of Medical Examiners, 57 Cal. App. 265, 207 P. 411. In the Dyment Case the sufficiency of the accusation was directly involved, but the circumstances there are readily distinguishable from those presented to us in the case at bar. In the Dyment Case the accusation charged the petitioner with being guilty of unprofessional conduct by violating section 14 of chapter 354 of the General Statutes of 1913 and acts amendatory thereof of the state of California, "In that he * * * procured by fraud and misrepresentation a certificate to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California." No facts or acts were set forth in the accusation upon which the charge of fraud was based. No intimation was given by the accusation of the acts relied upon to sustain the charge or what kind of testimony would be introduced in order to sustain the charge. In the case at bar the petitioner is charged with specific acts. Those acts are specifically alleged to have been performed in relation to certain patients, and the same kind of acts in relation to other patients. In the Dyment Case the accusation contained no specific allegations of fact. No one, from reading the accusation, could form a conclusion as to what kind of acts would be relied upon as proving the fraud charged or as constituting the fraud charged. In the case at bar the petitioner is given direct and specific notice of the acts with which he is charged. The unprofessional conduct is the gravamen of the charge, not the names of the patients. What the petitioner did constituted his unprofessional conduct, and what the petitioner did, as we have just stated, is directly and specifically set forth. And, while we agree with the petitioner that "the right to practice dentistry is a vested property right, and dentists holding such rights under the board of dental examiners, and subject to its rules and regulations are entitled as a matter of right to have such rules and regulations relative to their removal from their profession fairly invoked and implied," we are of the opinion that the accusation in this case sufficiently conforms in all matters of substance with the Dental Act of the state of California, and that the petitioner has not been prejudiced by any want of either form or substance in the accusation, and therefore had full notice of the acts charged as being unprofessional.

[2] No testimony having been introduced relative to the charge of treating the patient Babcock, the petitioner's motion to strike that portion of the charge was granted. The cause was then submitted by the petitioner without the introduction of any testimony. After the cause had been submitted the petitioner moved the dental board of examiners to reopen the cause and continue the hearing in order that the petitioner might introduce testimony rebutting the testimony of the two witnesses relative to the general charges contained in the accusation. This motion was denied. While we are not prepared to say that boards acting in the capacity such as the defendant was in this case, should follow the strict letter of the law relative to reopening cases and permitting opportunity to introduce further testimony, it does not appear in this case that the petitioner had any such testimony or offered any evidence whatever to the dental board of examiners that such testimony could be produced, nor was any showing made as to any efforts made by the petitioner to secure such evidence. Under such circumstances we cannot say that the dental board of examiners abused its discretion in refusing to grant the continuance. We may here state that the testimony of the two witnesses, as to the general charges, presented nothing of substance for the consideration of the dental board of examiners, and does not appear to have been relied upon in support of the accusation filed against the petitioner, and is not presented to us as containing evidentiary matter in support of the judgment of the dental board of examiners.

[3] It is further contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment. The transcript sets forth the following uncontroverted testimony: The witness Cull, after testifying that he had gone to the office of Dr. Whetstone, in the city of Sacramento, received treatment from him in the removal of tartar from his teeth, and had his gums examined, that an agreement was entered into between him and Dr. Whetstone for a course of treatment costing the sum of $35; that the patient called at different periods of time and received treatment; that the witness called at the office of Dr. Whetstone and received treatment upon five different occasions; that after the first treatment by the doctor, as just described, he called at the office of Dr. Whetstone and received the following treatment from one of the doctor's nurses—we will describe it by setting forth the questions and answers:

"Q. What did the treatment consist of? Explain to the board what was done. A. Well, I don't know the right name for it, but it was just a slight scraping and medicine injected in the gums, the same as he had done. Q. A slight scraping and medicine injected in the gum? A. Yes, sir. Q. The same, you say, as Dr. Whetstone? A. Only a slighter nature. Q. A slighter nature; and this nurse, Mrs. Babcock, did this at that time? A. Yes, sir."

On the subsequent occasion the testimony shows the following:

"Q. What, if anything, was done by either Dr. Whetstone or by the nurses on this fourth occasion? A. Yes, sir; just medicine put into the teeth the same as the time before by the nurse. Q. And were any instruments injected or used by the nurse on your mouth? A. Yes, sir; she poked around in my teeth with them and tested around. Q. And some medicine was injected? A. Yes, sir. Q. Into your gums? A. Well, not exactly injected—poked between the teeth."

On another occasion the testimony is as follows:

"Q. On this occasion, February 1, 1926, you met Mrs. Babcock at the office there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was anything done on that occasion? A. I believe that was the time that my teeth were scraped or brushed with the drill. Q. Was any paste used on your teeth on that occasion? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, you testified that she inserted instruments in your mouth?

A. Yes, sir. Q. And that she put medicine between your teeth? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that she used paste? A. Yes, sir. Q. And did she use—what did—I don't know whether you would know what to call it or not, did she use a scraper or something to scrape the tartar off your teeth? A. Yes, sir."

As to what took place upon the first visit of the witness to Dr. Whetstone's office, the transcript shows the following, upon cross-examination:

"Q. What discussion was had there with regard to the trouble with your teeth? A. Well, he just told me I needed a few fillings and told me that tartar should come off, and made me a price of $35; told me how many treatments there would be, etc. Q. Well, did he tell you what was the matter with your teeth? A. Well, I cannot say that he did, just what was the matter with my teeth; he said there was an awful lot of tartar, I know that. Q. Did he say anything about pyorrhea at that time? A. I cannot say whether he did or not. Q. Did he ever say anything to you about pyorrhea? A. No, sir. Q. Did anybody in his office ever say anything to you about pyorrhea? A. I can't say whether they did or not; if they did, I can't remember it. Q. You were up there to get information, weren't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you can't recall whether anybody in that office told you a single time whether you had pyorrhea or not? A. True enough. Q. You knew you had it, didn't you? A. I wasn't sure that I had it, but they told me I had it. Q. Who do you mean by 'they'? A. Dr. Renwick."

The transcript further shows similar treatment at the different visits made by the witness to the office of Dr. Whetstone, and that every time he was treated by the nurse, he paid therefor the sum of $2.50.

We do not need to follow the discussion of counsel as to what may be inquired into upon certiorari. The law seems to be well settled that jurisdictional matters only can be considered, but where there is an entire want of admissible testimony, it appears to be held that jurisdiction is lacking. In this case if there is any substantial testimony supporting the conclusion of the dental board, the judgment of the trial court should be reversed.

[4, 5] Section 11 of the Dental Act to which we have referred defines the practice of dentistry, among other things, as follows: One who shall "for a fee, salary or reward, paid directly or indirectly either to himself or to some other person, perform an operation of any kind, or treat diseases or lesions of the human teeth or jaws, or correct malimposed positions thereof, or in any way indicate that he will perform by himself or his agents or servants any operations upon the human teeth or jaws, or make an examination of, with the intent to perform or cause to be performed any operation on the human teeth or jaws," etc., is practicing dentistry. In the case of Jacobs v. Board of Dental Examiners, 189 Cal.

709, 209 P. 1006, the Supreme Court had occasion to define some of the terms used, which we have just quoted, constituting the practice of dentistry. In relation to the intent of the Legislature in using the word "operation," it is there said:

"It does not require the performance of a surgical operation to bring one within the purview of the law. The words 'operate' and 'operation,' technically used in connection with surgery, mean 'to perform some manual act upon the body of the patient, usually with instruments, with a view to restore soundness or health, or otherwise improve the physical condition,' and 'the act or series of acts and manipulations performed upon a patient's body, as in setting a bone, amputating a limb, extracting a tooth, etc.' Century Dictionary. They have also a plain ordinary meaning, in the light of which this act may and, we think, should be construed. According to the authority just quoted 'operate' means 'to perform or to be at work,' 'to produce an effect, act, work'; and 'operation' means 'action,' 'working,' 'a specific act or activity,' and 'the course of action or series of acts by which some result is accomplished.' The same dictionary defines 'an operator' as 'one who operates in any way, or on or against anything.'"

In the Jacobs Case, the acts which were held to come within the definition of practicing dentistry, as set forth in section 11, supra, the work performed was as follows: A plaster paris mould or cast of the mouth was taken for the purpose of getting the measure for a plate. This was done on the first visit. On the next day a wax bite of the mouth was taken by placing a piece of wax in the patient's mouth and telling him to bite on it. On the third visit a wax plate set with teeth was placed in the patient's mouth for him to try in, causing the patient to bite into the wax mould for a "try in." On the fourth visit the finished plate was delivered to the patient. He paid therefor the sum of $10. All this work was done in Dr. Jacobs' office by one Findley, not a licensed dentist.

In the case of State v. Sexton, 37 Wash. 110, 79 P. 634, the Supreme Court of Washington affirmed the judgment of the lower court wherein an accusation against the appellant was held sufficient, in that it charged the crime of practicing dentistry without a license, in that the appellant did treat a disease and lesion of the human teeth, and did correct malpositions of the human teeth and jaws of one R. A. Metzger, in violation of the provisions of the dental laws of that state. The facts in that case established the following: That the appellant cleaned the teeth of Metzger by removing tartar therefrom, and made an examination of them in order to give an estimate of the cost of having them fixed; that he "sounded" them and "picked" them. This testimony, even though controverted, was held sufficient to sustain a judgment in a criminal prosecution finding the defendant guilty of practicing dentistry without a license. As to what is meant by the term "aiding" and "abetting" an unlicensed person to practice dentistry, it is sufficient to refer to the case of Lassen v. Board of Dental Examiners. 24 Cal. App. 767, 142 P. 505, where those terms have received consideration. It is likewise a matter of defense in hearings of this kind to show that the person employed in the practice of dentistry has been duly licensed. Anderson v. Board of Dental Examiners, 27 Cal. App. 336, 149 P. 1006. The burden of proof is upon the employer to show that his employee is duly licensed. Where instruments are used in the removal of any accumulations upon the teeth, where medicines are employed in treating the gums of a patient, where paste is placed upon the teeth as a part of such treatment and thereafter removed by a revolving brush, propelled by a power not stated, which is used in removing the paste and as a part of the process of cleaning them or as a part of the treatment, we think a charge of practicing dentistry as defined by the Dental Act has been made out, and, if one is charged, as in this case, with aiding and abetting an unlicensed person to practice dentistry who, in his office performs such acts upon his patient, a judgment so finding is supported by the testimony.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the trial court should be, and the same is hereby, reversed, the writ of review denied, and the petition therefor dismissed.

86 Cal. App. 558

PEOPLE v. STERLING REFINING CO.
(Civ. 5955.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 3, 1927.

1. Evidence — 29—Reviewing court could take judicial notice that Vehicle Act was passed prior to effective date of Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 571; Code Civ. Proc. § 1875; St. 1923, p. 517).

Since the Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 577), § 17, provided that the act should go into effect on September 30, 1923, provided there should have been theretofore enacted act known as California Vehicle Act, the District Court of Appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, could take judicial knowledge that the Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) became a law prior to September 30, 1923, the effective date of the Fuel or License Act.

2. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 51—Reviewing court in taking judicial knowledge of public and private legislative acts can examine into legislative history (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875).

The District Court of Appeal, being authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, to take judicial knowledge of public and private acts of the Legislature, has right to examine into legislative history of acts.

3. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 259—That Vehicle Act differed on final enactment from original draft held not to affect Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act conditioned on Vehicle Act being previously enacted (St. 1923, p. 577, § 17; Vehicle Act).

It being common knowledge that almost every legislative bill is amended, modified, or changed before it becomes law, that Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 577) differed in final enactment from draft of act as originally introduced did not affect Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 577), § 17, which provided that it became effective on September 30, 1923, provided a California Vehicle Act should have been enacted prior thereto.

4. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 255—Statutes speak from date of enactment.

Statutes speak from date of enactment, and not from date of their introduction in the Legislature.

5. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 121(1)—Act regulating and licensing business of producing motor vehicle fuels held not invalid as to title (St. 1923, p. 571; Const. art. 4, § 24).

Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 571), entitled an act to regulate and license business of producing and distributing motor vehicle fuels, providing for collection and disposition of license taxes, and prescribing penalties, held not to violate Const. art. 4, § 24, providing every act shall embrace one subject which shall be expressed in title.

6. Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 48—Statute is declared unconstitutional only when it clearly violates Constitution.

Before courts will declare an act unconstitutional, it must be made clearly apparent that it is violative of some provision of Constitution and inconsistent with it.

7. Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 48—If there is reasonable doubt as to validity of act, it must be upheld.

If there is reasonable doubt as to the validity of an act, its constitutionality must be upheld.

8. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 105(1)—Constitutional provision, requiring subject of act to be expressed in title, must be liberally construed (Const. art. 4, § 24).

Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring subject of act to be expressed in title, must be liberally construed, and all that is required to be contained therein is reasonably intelligent reference to subject to which legislation is addressed.

9. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 109—Title of act need not embrace abstract of its contents.

It is not necessary that title of act should embrace an abstract of its contents; it being general custom to state subject in general terms.

10. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 109—When general purpose of act is declared in title, details for accomplishment of purpose are regarded as necessary incidents.

When general purpose of an act is declared in title, details provided for accomplishment of that purpose will be regarded as necessary incidents.

11. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 121(1)—That title of Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act did not state that act would take effect September 30, 1923, did not affect its validity (St. 1923, p. 571).

Where Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 571) provided in section 17 that act should go into effect on September 30, 1923, provided California Vehicle Act had been previously enacted, that title of act did not state that it should take effect on September 30, 1923, did not affect its validity, since the people are presumed to know when law goes into effect.

12. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 64(8)—Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act held not invalidated because single section was invalid, in view of legislative intent (Const. art. 4, § 1; St. 1923, p. 577, §§ 15, 17).

Conceding that Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 577), § 17, was invalid because act was not to go into effect unless California Vehicle Act had been previously enacted, it was legislative intent that balance of the act should not be affected thereby, under Const. art. 4, § 1, since section 15 of the act provided that, if any part of act was held unconstitutional, validity of remaining portion of act was to be unaffected.

13. Statutes $\hookrightarrow$ 64(1)—If remaining severable part of statute can be carried into effect if void part is eliminated, unconstitutional provision is disregarded.

If different parts of statute are severable and independent and are capable of being carried into effect if void part is eliminated, and statute indicates that it was intention to enact such provisions irrespective of others, unconstitutional provision will be disregarded and the statute read as if void provisions were not there.

14. Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 60—Legislature in enacting Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act effective after enactment of Vehicle Act did not transfer responsibility of deciding expediency of legislation (St. 1923, p. 571).

In enacting the Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 577), § 17, providing that act should go into effect on September 30, 1923, provided Vehicle Act had been previously enacted, the Legislature did not transfer to others responsibility of deciding what legislation was expedient and proper, since entire matter remained in hands of same lawmaking body.

15. Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 60—Legislature cannot transfer to others responsibility of deciding expediency of legislation.

The Legislature cannot transfer to others responsibility of deciding what legislation is expedient and proper with reference to either present conditions or future contingencies.

16. Venue ⇨16—Statute providing that controller collect moneys due state by suit in courts of Sacramento county did not give such court exclusive jurisdiction (Pol. Code, § 433; Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act).

Pol. Code, § 433, directing collection of moneys due state by suit in controller's name, of which suits courts of Sacramento county have jurisdiction, without regard to residence of defendants, did not give exclusive jurisdiction to superior court therein, and hence superior court of county of Los Angeles had jurisdiction of action by controller to collect moneys claimed to be due under the Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 571).

17. Venue ⇨17—Defendants, not objecting to superior court's jurisdiction nor demanding change of venue, waived right to complain (Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 396, 397).

Where, in suit by controller in superior court of Los Angeles county to collect moneys claimed to be due to state of California as license taxes under Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 571), defendant did not object to court's jurisdiction or demand change of venue, he waived right to complain of jurisdiction, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 396, 397.

18. Venue ⇨3—Superior court of Los Angeles county had jurisdiction of suit by Attorney General to collect license taxes on motor vehicle fuel (Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act, § 9; Pol. Code, § 433).

Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, p. 574), § 9, providing that controller may request Attorney General to sue in any court of competent jurisdiction to collect taxes, is not in conflict with Pol. Code, § 433, providing that controller may bring suits in Sacramento county to collect moneys due state, and hence action for collection of license taxes on motor vehicle fuels was properly brought in superior court of Los Angeles county.

19. Licenses ⇨19(3)—Defendant selling mixture of gasoline and kerosene as motor vehicle fuel could not claim when paying tax it was one-half kerosene (Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act, § 1, subd. (b); § 6).

Where refining company sold gasoline, which was in fact one-half kerosene, for motor vehicle fuel, it could not claim, when called on to pay license taxes on motor vehicle fuel under Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act (St. 1923, pp. 571, 573), § 1, subd. (b), and section 6, that it was one-half kerosene and claim 50 per cent. of fuel sold by it was exempt from taxation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Sterling Refining Company. From a judgment for the People, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guereña, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The Attorney General, at the request of the state controller, commenced this action in the name of the people of the state of California, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, against defendant and appellant, Sterling Refining Company, a corporation, to collect from it the sum of $6,184.69, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from May 10, 1924, claimed to be due to the state of California as license taxes on certain motor vehicle fuel under what is known as the "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act of 1923" (Stats. 1923, p. 571).

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the full amount claimed. From this judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal, based upon the judgment roll alone.

The complaint alleges, and the court found:

"II. That during the quarter of the year beginning January 1, 1924, and ending March 31, 1924, said defendant refined, manufactured, produced, and compounded in said state, and sold and delivered therein, 616,269 gallons of motor vehicle fuel. * * * That in the refining, manufacture, production, and compounding of said 616,269 gallons of motor vehicle fuel, the defendant used kerosene to the extent of 50 per cent. That all of said 616,269 gallons of motor vehicle fuel were sold by defendant for use in and for the purpose of operating and propelling motor vehicles upon the highways in California.

"III. That thereafter on the 11th day of April, 1924, said defendant filed with the state board of equalization of said state on a form prescribed by said state board a verified statement and report showing the total number of gallons of motor vehicle fuel refined, manufactured, produced, and compounded by it within said state and sold by it therein during the quarter of the year ending March 31, 1924, and in said statement the number of said gallons was stated to be 616,269; that thereupon said state board computed the license tax due, or to become due, from said defendant because of such sales so made by it, and found to be due upon said statement and report the sum of $12,325.38, and from said amount so computed and found to be due there was allowed as a deduction the sum of $123.25, the same being 1 per cent. of said sum of $12,325.38, and the balance due from said defendant upon and by reason of said tax after allowing said deduction was the sum of $12,202.13; that thereupon said board of equalization extended said sum of $12,202.13 upon a tax roll prepared and kept for the purpose, and thereafter and on or before the 30th day of April, 1924, delivered said tax roll to the state controller of said state, and said state controller did within 10 days thereafter notify said defendant that said license tax in said sum was due from it and payable to the state controller on or before May 10, 1924.

"IV. That said sum of $12,202.13 so due to said state from said defendant as and for said license tax has not, nor has any part, been paid to said state or to said state controller, except the sum of $6,017.44, and there is now due, owing, and unpaid the sum of $6,184.69."

The answer of defendant admits that it did, on the 11th day of April, 1924, file with the state board of equalization a verified statement and report showing that during the quarter ending March 31, 1924, it had produced 616,269 gallons of motor vehicle fuel.

A number of points are urged by appellant in its attack upon the judgment, and these contentions will be considered in the order in which they appear in appellant's brief.

[1] The first contention is that the Motor Vehicle Fuel or License Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 571), under which this action is brought, never went into effect on September 30, 1923, as provided in section 17 of the act, nor has it since gone into effect.

Section 17 of said act provides:

"This act shall go into effect upon the thirtieth day of September, one thousand nine hundred twenty-three, provided there shall have been theretofore enacted that certain act to be known and cited as the 'California Vehicle Act,' introduced in the forty-fifth session of the Legislature as Senate Bill No. 743."

[2] Section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part:

"Courts take judicial notice of the following facts:

"3. Public and private official acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this state and of the United States. * * *

Under this statute, we have a right to examine into the legislative history of these two acts, and upon such examination we find that the "California Vehicle Act" (St. 1923, p. 517) was introduced in the forty-fifth session of the Legislature of 1923, and designated Senate Bill No. 743. The "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" was introduced at the same session and designated Senate Bill No. 744. Each bill was introduced, according to the final official calendar of legislative business, on May 4, 1923. The original draft of each bill was amended during its consideration. Senate Bill No. 743 was passed by the Assembly on May 16th, and by the Senate, after a free conference, on May 18th, and was approved by the Governor on May 30th, and, upon being filed with the secretary of state, was designated as chapter No. 266. Senate Bill No. 744 was passed by the Assembly on May 16th and by the Senate on May 17th, and was also signed by the Governor on May 30th, and upon being filed with the secretary of state was designated chapter 267.

[3] From the history of the two bills, the appellant argues that Senate Bill No. 743, as finally enacted, differed from Senate Bill No. 743 as originally introduced, and from this concludes that the "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" did not go into effect at all. There is no merit in this contention. If the Legislature had intended that the "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" should not be effective until Senate Bill No. 743 had been enacted into a law in the precise form as originally introduced, it would have been a very easy matter for it to have so declared. What the Legislature undoubtedly intended, as plainly expressed in section 17, above set forth, was that the "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" should go into effect on September 30, 1923, only in the event that prior to that date the "California Vehicle Act" had been enacted into a law. It is common knowledge that almost every bill introduced in the Legislature is amended, modified, or changed in some particular before it becomes a law, and it would be unreasonable to assume that the Legislature only intended that the "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" should go into effect on September 30, 1923, in the event that prior thereto Senate Bill No. 743 had been enacted into a law in the precise language as originally introduced. By designating it Senate Bill No. 743, in addition to stating that it was the "California Vehicle Act," was only another means of identification.

[4] Another sufficient answer to this contention of appellant's is that statutes speak from the date of enactment, and not from the date of introduction in the Legislature. Both acts were approved by the Governor on May 30, 1923, so when the Legislature spoke in section 17 of the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act about the passage of the "California Vehicle Act," designated as Senate Bill No. 743, it undoubtedly referred to the "California Vehicle Act," in the form signed by the Governor on May 30, 1923.

[5] It is next contended by appellant that said "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" violates section 24 of article 4 of the state Constitution.

Section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution provides:

"Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title."

In speaking of this constitutional provision, the Supreme Court in Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 P. 251, said:

"The object of the provision is to prevent legislative abuse—to prevent the passage of acts bearing deceitful and misleading titles. It is intended to protect the members of the Legislature, as well as the public, against fraud; to guard against the passage of bills the titles of which give no intimation to the members of the Legislature or to the people of the matters contained therein."

To the same effect, see, also, Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (6th Ed.) 169; Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 228, 24 P. 383; People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 394, 156 P. 451; Moore v. Williams, 19 Cal. App. 600, 127 P. 509; In re Maginnis, 162 Cal. 200, 121 P. 723.

[6, 7] The rule is well established that before courts will declare an act unconstitutional, it must be made clearly apparent that the act is violative of some provision of the Constitution and inconsistent with it. If there is a reasonable doubt as to the validity of the act, its constitutionality must be upheld. Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 P. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73; Moore v. Williams, supra; Black on Constitutional Law, page 329.

[8] It is also well settled that this constitutional provision (section 24 of article 4), requiring the subject of the act to be expressed in the title, must be liberally construed, and that all that is required to be contained therein in order to meet the constitutional requirements is a reasonably intelligent reference to the subject to which the legislation is to be addressed. Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 506, 221 P. 628; McClure v. Riley, 198 Cal. 23, 243 P. 429, and cases there cited; Bassford v. Earl, 172 Cal. 660, 158 P. 124; Estate of Elliott, 165 Cal. 339, 132 P. 439; People v. Jordan, supra; Abeel v. Clark, supra; Ex parte Liddell, supra.

[9, 10] The law is also well established that it is not necessary that the title of an act should embrace an abstract of its contents. It has always been the custom to state the subject of the bill in general terms with the fewest words, and the framers of the Constitution doubtless intended the Legislature to conform to that custom. Numerous provisions having a general object fairly indicated by the title may be united. When the general purpose is declared, the details provided for the accomplishment of that purpose will be regarded as necessary incidents. Abeel v. Clark, supra; Moore v. Williams, supra.

[11] The act is entitled "An act to regulate and license the business of producing, refining or distributing gasoline, distillate and other motor vehicle fuels, providing for the collection and disposition of license taxes, prescribing penalties for violation of the provisions of said act, and repealing all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith." A careful examination of the act itself convinces us that the subject-matter embraced within the body of the legislative act is sufficiently referred to in the title to fully meet all requirements of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution. Appellant lays particular stress upon the fact that the title of the act does not say that the act shall take effect on September 30, 1923. No such requirement is found in the Constitution; it only requires that the title express the subject of the act, etc., and, as we have seen, the purpose of the constitutional provision is to prevent legislators and the public from being entrapped by misleading titles to bills, whereby legislation relating to one subject might be obtained under the title to another. The people are presumed to know when a law goes into effect. When a law goes into effect is no part of the act itself, and it is never the custom of the Legislature to place in the title the date when the act goes into effect. Hundreds of legislative enactments may be examined without the discovery of a single one in which the operative date is expressly mentioned in the title.

[12] Appellant next contends that the provisions of section 17 of said "Motor Vehicle Fuel Act" invalidates the whole act. There is no merit whatever in this contention. If it be conceded, for the sake of argument, that section 17 of said act is invalid, it does not affect the balance of the act, because section 15 of said act provides:

"If any section, subsection, sentence, clause or phrase of this act is for any reason held to be unconstitutional, such decision shall not affect the validity of the remaining portions of this act. The Legislature hereby declares that it would have passed this act and each section, subsection, sentence, clause and phrase thereof irrespective of the fact that any one or more of the sections, subsections, sentences, clauses or phrases be declared unconstitutional."

This section clearly shows that it was the intention of the Legislature that, even if section 17 be adjudged invalid, nevertheless, the balance of the act should become effective 90 days after adjournment of the Legislature, as provided in section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution.

[13] It is a familiar and cardinal rule of statutory construction that if the different parts of a statute are severable and independent of each other, and the provisions that are within the constitutional power of the Legislature are capable of being carried into effect after the void part has been eliminated, and it is clear from the statute itself that it was the intention of the Legislature to enact these provisions irrespective of the others, the unconstitutional provision or provisions will be disregarded, and the statute read as if the void provisions were not there. Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 P. 1049; People v. Capelli, 55 Cal. App. 468, 203 P. 837; Bacon Service Corporation v. Huss, 199 Cal. 21, 248 P. 235.

A reading of the entire statute (Stats. 1923, p. 571) itself convinces us that section 17 is entirely independent of the other provisions of the act, and can be eliminated without impairing or rendering incomplete the other provisions of the act. Section 15 of the act above quoted affords indisputable evidence that the Legislature intended that said statute should become operative, notwithstanding that section 17 thereof be declared void.

The precise language used in section 15 above quoted was used by the Legislature in what is known as the "Motor Transportation License Act" (Stats. 1923, p. 706), and the Supreme Court, in Bacon Service Corporation v. Huss, supra, in passing upon the constitutionality of that act, held that such language as used in section 15 of said Motor Vehicle Fuel Act was indisputable evidence of the intention of the Legislature to pass the act, irrespective of any void provisions thereof.

[14, 15] Appellant contends that the Legislature, by the enactment of section 17, is attempting to transfer to others the responsibility of deciding what legislation is expedient and proper. It is a well-settled rule, of course, that the Legislature cannot transfer to others the responsibility of deciding what legislation is expedient and proper, with reference to either present conditions or future contingencies. In re Wall, 48 Cal. 313, 17 Am. Rep. 425. However, no such situation is created in the enactment of said Motor Vehicle Fuel Act. The Legislature had the power to prescribe that the act would go into effect on September 30, 1923, which was subsequent to the date when legislative enactments ordinarily become effective under section 323 of the Political Code and section 1, article 4, of the state Constitution, and it also had the power to declare that acts should then become effective only if prior thereto a certain statute had been enacted by the same lawmaking body. Section 17 does not refer to an uncertain condition, but to a definite and certain event; namely, the adoption of the "California Vehicle Act" before September 30, 1923. The entire matter remained in the hands of the same lawmaking body; nothing was left to the judgment or discretion of any other person or party, and no question of the expediency of the law was left to the judgment of any other person, and the Legislature exercised its own judgment definitely and finally.

[16] It is next contended by appellant that the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, had no jurisdiction of this action. In support of this contention appellant relies upon section 433 of the Political Code, which provides:

"Duties of Controller. 16. To direct and superintend the collection of all moneys due the state, and institute suits in its name for all official delinquencies in relation to the assessment, collection, and payment of the revenue, and against persons who by any means have become possessed of public money or property and fail to pay over or deliver the same, and against all debtors of the state; of which suits the courts of Sacramento county have jurisdiction without regard to the residence of the defendant."

This section does not purport to give exclusive jurisdiction to the superior court in and for Sacramento county of all suits filed by the state controller to collect money due the state. This section merely makes an exception to the general rule, fixing venue of actions.

[17] Another complete answer to this contention of appellant's is found in the fact that the record fails to show any objection made by appellant to the jurisdiction of the superior court of Los Angeles county, and fails to show any demand for a change of venue.

For this reason alone appellant has waived any right it may have had to complain of the jurisdiction of the superior court of Los Angeles county. Sections 396, 397, Code Civ. Proc.; Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 532, 129 P. 981; Smalley v. George C. Peckham Co., 175 Cal. 146, 165 P. 438; 25 Cal. Jur., pages 889, 890, and cases there cited.

[18] It may also be noted in this connection that section 9 of said Motor Vehicle Fuel Act, which became a law long after section 433 of the Political Code was enacted, provides:

"Upon the request of the state controller, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to commence and prosecute to final determination in any court of competent jurisdiction an action at law to collect any tax herein imposed which is delinquent and all penalties and interest accrued."

There is no conflict between section 433 of the Political Code and section 9 of said Motor Vehicle Fuel Act, and the superior court of Los Angeles county was a court of competent jurisdiction to hear and determine this action.

[19] Appellant next contends that the kerosene contained in the motor vehicle fuel which it manufactured and sold is not subject to the license tax. This contention is based upon the finding above set forth.

Section 1, subd. (b), of said act, is as follows:

"Motor vehicle fuel' shall include all gasoline, distillate, benzine, naphtha, liberty fuel and other volatile and inflammable liquids produced or compounded for the purpose of, or which may be used in, operating or propelling motor vehicles except kerosene and except unfinished products requiring rerun, blending, or compounding and which are not used or sold for use in such form for the purpose of operating or propelling motor vehicles."

If appellant's so-called "gasoline" was, in fact, one-half kerosene, nevertheless such a mixture would certainly constitute "a volatile and inflammable liquid," and, it having been sold by appellant to be used in operating automobiles upon the public highways of California, as found by the trial court, was subject to the license tax. When appellant sold this mixture to the public to operate motor vehicles with, no representation was made that it contained one-half kerosene, but when called upon to pay the license taxes thereon, appellant claims for the first time that it was one-half kerosene. Certainly, no court would lend itself to assist appellant to avoid the payment of the license taxes under such a pretense. Moreover, the answer of appellant admits that during the quarter ending March 31, 1924, it refined, manufactured, produced, and compounded 616,269 gallons of motor vehicle fuel, and made a verified return to the board of equalization as required by section 6 of said act, and there is nothing in the record showing that appellant claimed that 50 per cent. of the 616,269 gallons was exempt from taxation when it made and filed said verified report to the board of equalization, and no such claim was made until this action was commenced. For this reason alone no such claim can now be made. When appellant prepared its report, as provided in section 6, then was the time for it to claim any exemptions that it might have. There is nothing in the law to authorize the board of equalization to make any deduction which is not claimed by the applicant.

We are fully satisfied that there is no merit in the appeal, and for that reason the judgment should be and it is affirmed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

86 Cal. App. 712

WEYSE et al. v. BIEDEBACH et al.*
(Civ. 4596.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 15, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1927.

1. Quieting title $\S$ 37(1)—Answer denying plaintiffs' ownership and right of possession, and admitting defendant claimed interest in property, held sufficient.

Where complaint, in action to quiet title, alleged ownership and right to possession in plaintiffs, and that defendant claimed interest therein, and praying that he set forth nature of his claim, answer denying plaintiffs' ownership and right of possession, and admitting defendants claimed interest in property, held not insufficient because it failed to set forth nature of defendant's claim as demanded.

2. Adverse possession $\S$ 27, 85(5), 95—Evidence held to show defendant and predecessors exercised rights of ownership, and paid assessments, besides claiming under color of title.

In action to quiet title to lots and adjoining property, evidence held to show that defendant and predecessors in title, following tax sales of property in 1914, claiming under color of title, exercised every right and performed every duty incidental to ownership at sales for delinquent taxes, and paid subsequent assessments thereon.

3. Adverse possession $\S$ 44, 46—"Use and occupation" does not always require constant use, and is sufficient if temporary abandonments do not interrupt possession (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 321 et seq.).

"Use and occupation," requisite to adverse possession under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 321 et seq., do not always require constant use, it being enough that property is devoted to ordinary use of occupant and temporary abandonments or periods of vacancy, which evince no intention of abandonment of possession, do not interrupt possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Use and Occupation.]

4. Adverse possession $\S$ 31—Any visible act demonstrating intention to claim ownership and possession putting legal owner on inquiry or conveying actual notice is sufficient.

As regards adverse possession of land, any visible act which clearly demonstrates intention to claim ownership and possession of land, and either puts legal owner on inquiry or conveys actual notice, is sufficient.

5. Adverse possession $\S$ 25—One claiming by adverse possession need not be in personal occupation, since possession by tenants inures to his benefit.

It is not necessary that one claiming by adverse possession be in personal occupation of land, since possession by tenants inures to his benefit.

6. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 63(1)—Failure of purchaser at tax sale of property of defunct corporation to collect all rents from former corporate director in possession did not effect estoppel of director to deny purchaser's, his admitted landlord's, title.

Where directors of defunct corporation brought action to quiet title to corporation's land, which had been sold at tax sale for delinquent taxes against purchaser at sale thereof, who had entered into possession and collected rents from one of plaintiffs, a former director of corporation owner, held, failure of defendant purchaser at tax sale to collect all rent due from director did not show them in joint possession as effecting estoppel of plaintiffs to claim legal title as against admitted landlord.

7. Quieting title $\S$ 51—Judgment requiring defendant to pay rents received, less taxes paid as condition to quieting title to property, held proper (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3898).

In an action to quiet title to lots, where part of lots were adjudged to be property of plaintiffs, judgment requiring defendant who had been in possession of property to pay rents received by him, less taxes paid by him during time of his possession, as condition to quieting title to property adjudged to belong to him, held proper, under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3898.

8. Quieting title $\S$ 50—Judgment requiring defendant to pay rents received, less repairs made on property, held proper.

In action to quiet title to lots, part of which were adjudged to be property of plaintiffs, judgment requiring defendant to pay rents received on properties adjudged to belong to plaintiffs, less amount spent for repairs and commissions in preservation of plaintiffs' properties, held proper, since defendant was not required to institute separate suit for their recovery.

9. Taxation $\S$ 814(1)—That taxes were irregularly assessed was immaterial, where owner was required to refund taxes paid, regardless of irregularities in assessments rendering taxes uncollectible (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3628).

In an action by directors of corporation which forfeited its charter to quiet title to lands owned by corporation, and which defendants claimed by adverse possession under color of tax deeds, that taxes were assessed in name of the original corporation, and not its successor after reorganization, was immaterial, since, under Pol. Code, § 3628, in suit to quiet title, owner is required to refund taxes, penalties, costs, and interests, regardless of fact that irregularities in assessments might render taxes uncollectible.

10. Taxation ⚭814(1)—Plaintiffs held required to refund taxes paid by claimant in possession, regardless of fact that several lots could not be identified.

In action to quiet title as against claimant of lots in possession under color of title by tax deeds, plaintiff was liable to refund taxes paid by claimant, regardless of fact that assessments were levied on special parcels, and lots or parcels could not be identified.

11. Adverse possession ⚭117—Finding defendant and predecessors for more than five years were in open, notorious, and exclusive possession, claiming title, held to show "ownership" (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

In action to quiet title, finding that defendant and predecessors entered property, and for more than five years prior to filing complaint had been in open, notorious, and exclusive possession, claiming to own property under written muniments of title, and had paid taxes for more than five years, held, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, to show defendants' "ownership."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Henry G. Weyse and others against Harvey Biedebach and others, in which named defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendants, and for cross-complainant, and from order denying plaintiffs' motion to set aside decree and to enter another and different decree, plaintiffs appeal. Order and judgment affirmed.

Fred W. Heath, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. It appears that on September 28, 1920, appellants filed the complaint upon which this suit is based, alleging that at all times from July 2, 1903, until March 1, 1913, the Antioak Leather Company was a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and that on said last-mentioned date its charter was forfeited for nonpayment of the state license tax; that appellants were the directors of said corporation, and upon such forfeiture they became trustees of the stockholders and creditors of said corporation, and entitled to the possession, management, and control of its property and assets. As such trustees, appellants instituted this proceeding to quiet title to lots 1 to 39, inclusive, of the Hay Tract addition to Nadeau Park, and adjoining property, in Los Angeles county, of which they alleged said corporation was the owner from December 29, 1904, until the forfeiture of its charter, and that the plaintiffs thereupon succeeded to and had ever since been vested with, legal title to the real properties described in the complaint. They prayed that they as such trustees be adjudged to be the owners in fee and entitled to possession thereof as against the defendants, and that the latter be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim to or lien upon any part of said premises adversely to the plaintiffs.

The defendant Biedebach, respondent herein, filed a separate answer, denying the formal allegations of the complaint for want of knowledge or information, and specifically denying directly that on March 1, 1913, the Antioak Leather Company was, or that the plaintiffs, as trustees or otherwise, had been, the owners or entitled to possession of any of said real property; affirmatively alleging that the answering defendant claimed to own an estate in all of the property described in the complaint, except in nine lots numbered 2, 8, 12, 24, 26, 31, 32, 33, and 34; that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had been dispossessed and disseized of all of said property described in their pleading since on or about March 1, 1913; that their action was barred by section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that all of said property was deeded to the state of California more than five years prior to the institution of said proceeding.

Biedebach also filed and served a cross-complaint, wherein it was alleged that he and his predecessors in interest had, for a period of more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, been in open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession of all of the real property involved therein (except the nine lots above mentioned), and "during all of said time have been occupying said premises and claiming same against the whole world, and has paid all taxes levied and assessed against said premises during said time." By a second and separate cause of action, he alleged that he was the owner and in possession of said property; that his title was based upon certain tax deeds executed by the tax collector of Los Angeles county; that, in pursuit of the title of the state of California, the cross-complainant and his predecessors in interest had paid for taxes, penalties, and costs, including redemptions, for a period of eleven years continuously from 1908 to and including the year 1919, the total sum of $4,506.46. The cross-complainant prayed that his title to the property so claimed be cleared as against the plaintiffs.

The parties waived a jury, and, at the close of the trial before the superior court, substantially all of the allegations of the plaintiffs were found to be true, except that more than five years prior to the commencement of this suit respondent Harvey Biedebach and his predecessors in interest entered upon and took possession of lots 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 22, and 23 of the property described in the pleadings; that he had been in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession thereof; that he claimed to own the same under written muniments of title against the world, and had paid all taxes levied and assessed against said lots for more than five years previously to the filing of the complaint; that the plaintiffs, as trustees, had not during the period of time last mentioned been seized or possessed thereof, but that, with the exception of said eight lots, the plaintiffs, as trustees, were the owners and entitled to possession of all the real property in suit. The court also found that, prior to the tax sales, under which respondent claimed title, all of the property described in the complaint was inclosed by a substantial fence sufficient to turn and inclose livestock; that certain buildings had been erected on parts thereof, without regard to lot line, which said fence and buildings had been maintained by the plaintiffs to the date of trial, except that the respondent "on April 10, 1921, and on several occasions subsequent thereto, made certain repairs upon said fence." It was further found that the ownership of Biedebach to said eight lots was based upon certain tax deeds executed by the tax collector during the years 1914 and 1919, for nonpayment of state and county taxes for the year 1908, and also upon a claim of title by adverse possession under such written muniments; that each of said tax deeds was based upon an assessment roll which had never been authenticated by affidavits of the county auditor; that respondent and his predecessors in interest had from time to time tenanted portions of all of the premises, and had collected rents aggregating the sum of $5,352, $3,859.26 of which he had collected from tenants of the plaintiffs' property; that the assessment of 1908 was void, but that the amounts so assessed were due the county of Los Angeles, except as to an exposition tax of three mills on each $100 valuation. The findings, conclusions of law, and decree respectively determined and required that the net rents collected by respondent upon appellants' portion of the premises exceeded the aggregate taxes, penalties, costs, and interest paid by respondent, which he should pay to appellants, or, that upon the failure of such payment, they have execution therefor.

This appeal is taken from those specific parts of the judgment: (1) excepting the eight lots numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 22, and 23, from the decree in favor of plaintiffs; (2) declaring that, by reason of the adverse possession of said lots, respondent and his predecessors in interest, M. Dawson and A. W. Brode, Biedebach is the owner and entitled to possession thereof, and that his title be quieted as against all claims of appellants; (3) allowing respondent to deduct from the total rents, issues, and profits received by him the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs above mentioned, in the sum of $613.54, and withholding from appellants the rents, issues, and profits collected by respondent for the use of said eight lots; and (4) from an order denying the plaintiffs' motion to set aside the decree and to enter another and different decree "in conformity with the findings of fact and plaintiffs' notice of intention to move for such order."

[1] Before entering into a discussion of the principal grounds upon which a reversal is sought, we pause to observe appellants' attack upon the sufficiency of respondent's answer. The complaint was in usual form, alleging ownership and right to possession of the real property described, that the defendants claimed some interest therein, and praying that the latter be required to set forth the nature of their claims. The answer denied the plaintiffs' ownership and right to possession, and admitted that the defendant Biedebach claimed an interest in the property. It is contended that the answer was insufficient, for the reason that it failed to set forth the nature of the defendant's claim, as demanded by the complaint. This question was squarely passed upon adversely to appellants in Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 344, 41 P. 458, 461, wherein it was said:

"It is not a bill of discovery, and defendants are not required to state the nature of their claim for the benefit of plaintiff, or simply to have it passed upon by the court."

The same rule was announced in United Land Ass'n v. Pacific Improvement Co., 139 Cal. 370, 69 P. 1064, 72 P. 988.

[2] It is insisted by appellants that there was no actual, continuous, uninterrupted adverse possession of any portion of the property, or dispossession of the plaintiffs by respondent or his predecessors in interest, for any five-year period. It apparently is not respondent's contention that appellants were in the first instance ejected from, or dispossessed of, the premises, his assertion being that they abandoned them, and that respondent and his predecessors in interest paid all taxes and penalties levied and assessed thereon, and occupied them either in person or by tenant for a period of more than five years next preceding the institution of these proceedings; that tenants in possession were notified in writing to pay rent to respondent or to vacate, in at least one instance a tenant being one of the plaintiffs, and that such notices were promptly observed without question; that appellants removed machinery and other personal property therefrom; that the premises were inclosed by fences and buildings; and that, as the fences or other structures required, they were repaired by the respondent or his vendors.

It affirmatively appears without contradiction that, prior to the forfeiture of its corporate charter by the Antioak Leather Company, and during the year 1908, all taxes levied and assessed upon the realty described in the complaint were permitted to become delinquent, and that in July, 1914, or more than a year after such forfeiture, the property here involved was sold for taxes and penalties; that one Brode purchased lots numbered 7, 22, and 23, and one Dawson purchased lots numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6 at said sale. Respondent Biedebach was present, and purchased lot 21, but this latter parcel was awarded to appellants by the trial court, and is not in controversy here. It also was testified, and not denied, that immediately following the sale each of the vendees entered the premises, took possession, and posted signs notifying the public in general that he was the owner of the property to which they were attached. Dawson testified that following his purchase he, together with his son, defendant Brode, and Biedebach went upon the lots which he had bought, measured them, and thereafter occasionally repaired the fence, but that he appointed Brode as his agent to collect rents. Brode testified that he collected rents from such persons as were on the premises, or notified those who refused to pay rent that they must vacate, and that the latter complied with his demand in this respect; that he posted signs offering a reward of $50 for the conviction of any person removing or disturbing any of the property, and $25 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of any one trespassing thereon; that he collected rents from appellant J. C. Hentzy, one of the former directors of the Antioak Leather Company and the trustee to whom it appears the others had delegated the management of their interests in whatever remained of the corporate property. It appears by the testimony of witnesses and exhibits in the record that Hentzy was absent much of the time, and that neither he nor any other representative of the defunct corporation pretended to occupy the property except as a place of storage for certain machinery and other personalty until they were ultimately sold and removed. True, he wrote an occasional letter to one J. C. Higgins, who wrecked and sold the machinery, requesting that he collect and forward "another month rent for me as I will be short"; that he sell the boiler, etc., but there is documentary and other evidence strongly tending to show that neither the corporation nor its directors or trustees ever operated the plant, asserted any ownership in the property, other than as above recited, or paid any taxes after the year 1913. In fact, it does appear that they were without funds, and that they had no intention of occupying the premises, and that upon demand Hentzy paid rents to respondent Biedebach as heretofore stated.

Both Dawson and Brode conveyed their lots to the respondent Biedebach. The latter testified that he personally posted the notices already mentioned; that he leased a portion of the property to a Japanese, and other portions to one Coffman, California Vegetable Union, a Mr. Morino, and others respectively; that former tenants who had livestock or other personal property upon the premises were notified to pay specified rentals or to vacate, and that in some instances tenants vacated, while others paid rents to the witness. Checks were introduced in evidence, and respondent testified that they were received by him from Hentzy as rent for the portion of the premises upon which machinery and other effects of the company were permitted to remain until disposed of. Brode, Dawson, Biedebach, and others swore that at no time was any one known to have occupied the premises, or to have offered any claim to or objection to the witnesses occupying, improving, or renting any portion of the property. Biedebach expended considerable amounts of money in reroofing the Vegetable Union building, fumigating a cottage, and repairing doors, windows, fences, plumbing, etc., and swore that none of the taxes remained unpaid at the time of the trial, except those assessed for 1920-1921.

It thus becomes apparent that the plaintiffs not only displayed no intention of occupying or repairing the premises in question, but paid no taxes thereon after 1913, while respondent and his predecessors, following the tax sales, exercised every right and performed every duty incidental to ownership, having purchased at sales for delinquent taxes and paid subsequent assessments, besides claiming under a color of title.

"Where, as in the present case, the tax has been allowed to become delinquent and a sale has taken place, and, so far as appears, a redemption has been made thereof, while the party or his successor in interest was in undisturbed possession and all this is done in good faith, we see no reason why the same should not be held to operate as a payment and we think it is sufficient to bring the occupant within the terms of the statute which requires him to pay the taxes upon the property claimed." Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 405, 104 P. 983, 985. To the same effect is Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 P. 278.

[3-5] It is further objected by appellants that neither actual nor constructive possession by respondent and his predecessors in interest was shown, and that adverse possession was therefore not established, within the intent of sections 321 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Authorities are cited by appellants which hold that adverse possession must be shown to have been actual, open, and not clandestine nor interrupted. It is argued therefrom that neither respondent nor his predecessors appear or claim to have been personally in occupation of the premises in suit, or to have continuously had their representatives or tenants in possession of appreciable portions thereof continuously; that "actual possession means that possession which is accompanied by real and effective enjoyment of the property."—Citing Lacoste v. Eastland, 117 Cal. 673, 49 P. 1046. And that "interruption of adverse user, however slight, prevents acquisition of title by prescription"—Citing Ball v. Kehl, 95 Cal. 613, 30 P. 782. Many other cases are cited to the same effect. As we have heretofore observed, however, besides the fact that the appellants, according to several witnesses, at no time indicated an intention of occupying the premises after the tax sales, and were not known to have displayed even an intention of interrupting the quiet occupation by respondent and his predecessors in interest, the latter made repairs, rented to various tenants, and collected the rents from all who used the property for any purpose, including the appellants themselves.

The rule is well established in California that the use and occupation requisite to adverse possession do not always require "constant" use. Myers v. Berven, 166 Cal. 484, 137 P. 260. It is enough that the property be devoted to the ordinary use of the occupant, and temporary abandonments or periods of vacancy which evince no intention of abandonment do not interrupt the possession. Montgomery & Mullen L. Co. v. Quimby, 164 Cal. 250, 128 P. 402; Botsford v. Eyraud, 148 Cal. 431, 83 P. 1008; Goodrich v. Mortimer, 44 Cal. App. 576, 186 P. 844. Furthermore, any visible act which clearly demonstrates an intention to claim ownership and possession, and either puts the legal owner upon inquiry or conveys actual notice, is sufficient. Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 P. 361. It is not necessary that one claiming by adverse possession be in personal occupation. Possession by tenant inures to his benefit. Lloyd v. Mills, 68 W. Va. 241, 69 S. E. 1094, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 702; Sutton v. Whetstone, 21 S. D. 341, 112 N. W. 850; Ala. State Land Co. v. Hogue, 164 Ala. 657, 51 So. 320; Wright v. Giles, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 550, 129 S. W. 1163.

Many authorities are cited by appellants which hold that a mere claim of ownership, accompanied by intermittent periods of occupancy, does not constitute a possession under color of title, without interruption, contemplated by the statute. It appears, however, that the respondent and his predecessors in interest personally visited the property in question at least once a month, and that, although their tenants were not in possession of all the eight lots all of the time, yet portions of the whole were occupied by lessees from the time of redemption until suit was filed, and at no time did appellants interrupt by actual possession or demand therefor. In fact, as we have observed, they became tenants of respondent, and paid rent to him; and to all intents and purposes vacated as soon as their personal property could be disposed of. It appears by correspondence in the record that Hentzy urged his agents to sell machinery and other personalty of the defunct corporation at as early date as possible.

[6] It is next contended that Brode, one of respondent's vendors, did not retain in good faith the lots which he had purchased at the tax sale; that, when Hentzy stated that the tax deeds were worthless, Brode replied:

"I told him it would take the Supreme Court to decide that, and that until they did decide that we would have to have some rent."

This statement is assigned by appellants as an indication of doubt in Brode's mind as to his legal rights, but appellants fail to quote the entire answer of Brode in this respect:

"And he made arrangements to pay me rent, and paid it to me as long as the tenants were there. * * * I kept some record of money received from Mr. Hentzy as rental for the premises I purchased at the tax sale. I have here all I was able to find. I think there is another check or two I might have found. Sometimes he would indorse the check he got, and sometimes he would give me one of his own. * * * I gave him a receipt for the payments he made. I kept a carbon of the receipts. * * * I collected rents from Mr. Hentzy five or six months."

Appellants argue that, since there is no showing that Hentzy paid to Brode all of the rents which the former collected from tenants, it should be assumed that both were equally in possession, and that payment of rent by Hentzy to Brode should not be permitted to estop appellants from claiming the legal title. We think from the facts already recited that this position is untenable. Brode purchased at the tax sale, and his deeds, whether valid or otherwise, constituted at least a color of title. Tenants were notified to pay rents to him, and notices were prominently posted upon the premises, signed by Brode as owner. The tenants who may have occasionally and in a few instances paid rent to Hentzy could not be said to have altered the rights or status of either party, since Hentzy paid Brode whatever rents Brode demanded, and, if he collected and retained moneys from certain tenants, knowing, as he did, that Brode claimed the property by purchase, he is not justified under equitable principles in charging his admitted landlord with bad faith. Franklin v. Merida, 35 Cal. 558, 575, 95 Am. Dec. 129, cited by appellants, merely holds that one in possession of land who is induced by mistake, fraud, or misrepresentations to accept a lease from another, may, upon discovery of the truth, go back of the lease, and dispute the title of the fictitious landlord, and is not estopped to do so by the apparent relationship of landlord and tenant. Obviously that case is not here in point except in so far as it approves the respondent's right to show that he was not in fact a tenant of appellants. They apparently abandoned the property, paid no taxes, and made no effort to set aside the tax deeds. Brode did not lease from Hentzy, and the former collected rents, but was never requested to pay rent to either of the appellants. Hence there is no pretense in the record that Brode or his successor in interest, Biedebach, was ever considered as appellants' tenant in any sense of the term.

[7] Respondent alleged in his cross-complaint that, in pursuit of the title of the state in and to said premises, he and his predecessors in interest had paid out and expended for taxes, penalties, and costs assessed and levied thereon, including redemptions, for the years 1908 to 1919, the aggregate sum of $4,506.46, not including interest. The trial court found that the tax deeds, owing to errors in procedure at the time of sale, were void, but that the taxes, excepting the exposition tax of one mill on each $100 valuation, were justly due the county, and that respondent and his predecessors in interest had paid them. The eight lots heretofore mentioned, which it was found that respondent and his vendors had acquired by adverse possession, were adjudged to be the property of respondent, and all other properties described in the plaintiffs' complaint were awarded to the latter. As a condition to quieting the respondent's title to said eight lots, the judgment required that Biedebach pay to the plaintiffs or their attorneys, or deposit in court, the amount of rents, issues, and profits received by him from the portions of the property decreed to plaintiffs, to wit, the sum of $4,487.10, less the proportionate share of taxes paid thereon, and $543.40 expended in connection with repairs, expenses, and commissions, or $613.54. Appellants contend that, due to a blending of several taxes, the entire assessment of 1908 was void, and that taxes paid thereafter were not paid by Biedebach in pursuit of the state's title, but, if paid at all, were remitted to his predecessors in interest; that he bought from them the mere naked title, if any there was; and that, having failed to plead it, he acquired no right to compel the appellants to reimburse him for any of the taxes so paid. Section 3898 of the Political Code provides, in part, as follows:

"Whenever in any action at law, it has been or shall be determined by a court that the sale and conveyance provided for in this and the preceding section or in section three thousand seven hundred seventy-one of this Code heretofore or hereafter made are void for any reason, and that the purchaser from the state may not be finally awarded the property so purchased, no decree of the court shall be given declaring a forfeiture of the property until the former owner, or other party in interest, shall have repaid to the purchaser the full amount of taxes, penalties and costs paid out and expended by him, to be determined by the court, in pursuit of the state's title to the property so sold."

Thus it would appear that the appellants or their successors in interest, if there were such, were required by statute to pay to the purchaser (that is, Biedebach's predecessor in interest as to each respective lot) the amount of taxes, penalties, and costs which had been expended in pursuit of the state's title. Appellants contend that such predecessor alone, should be permitted to collect these refunds, and that they should not have been deducted from the rents, issues, and profits collected by Biedebach and his predecessors from the properties of appellants. Said predecessors, however, conveyed to respondent in each instance "all his estate, right, title, interest, property, possession, claim and demand whatever, as well in law as in equity in and to the property." In Squires v. Estey, 33 Cal. App. 287, 165 P. 34, it was held that, regardless of the fact that defects and irregularities exist in an assessment which render a tax deed void and the taxes uncollectible by the state, still the case would fall within the rule announced in Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 P. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492, that:

"Where the owner comes into equity asking equitable relief to remove or cancel a tax deed or sale as a cloud upon his title, or to obtain a judgment which, in effect, will invalidate such sale or deed, the court should refuse any relief except upon the condition that he first repay to the tax purchaser, or his grantee or assignee, the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs justly chargeable upon the land and which the purchaser has paid at the sale, or afterward upon the faith of it, with legal interest from the time of such payment, less rents received, if any, if the purchaser has been in possession."

We think the two cases last mentioned effectively foreclose appellants' right to withhold such taxes, penalties, costs, and interests, by whomsoever actually paid to the state, since the respondent alleged that he had expended the sums specified, and it would surely be inequitable to restore the property to appellants free and clear of all taxes assessed for several years. It is further complained that taxes paid subsequently to the tax sale were not paid "in pursuit of the state's title," and should be excluded, but this question also is answered by the authorities just quoted, which embrace taxes paid by one holding a tax deed "afterward upon the faith of it, with legal interest from the time of such payment."

[8] As to the question of repairs, commissions, etc., expended in preservation of appellants' properties, these moneys also were paid out for the use and benefit of the owners, and we know of no rule requiring one to institute a separate suit for their recovery. Respondent was not a trespasser, but occupied the premises in good faith, under a deed from the state. It would scarcely be questioned that, if compelled to relinquish the property which he repaired, he would have a cause of action for his just expenses in that behalf.

[9] It appears that the corporate owner of the real property taxed was at one time known as the Anti Oak Leather Manufacturing Company, and that thereafter, through reorganization, it was named the Antioak Leather Company, but that all taxes were assessed in the name of the original company. Appellants argue, and cite authorities announcing the rule, that, while under section 3628 of the Political Code a mistake in name will not invalidate an assessment, it is the duty of the assessor to assess personal property in the true name of the owner, else the assessment is void, citing Lake County v. Sulphur Banks Q. S. M. Co., 66 Cal. 17, 20, 4 P. 876. However, appellants' authorities in this regard are not applicable in the instant case. Lake County v. Sulphur Banks Q. S. M. Co., and others of like character, were direct suits for the collection of taxes which were held to be invalid. As we have already observed, in a suit to quiet title the owner will be required in equity to refund taxes, penalties, costs, and interests, regardless of the fact that defects and irregularities in the assessments might render the taxes uncollectible by the state. Squires v. Estey, supra.

[10] Appellants insist that, although assessments were attempted to be levied upon specific parcels of land, the streets had been abandoned, and that there was no means of ingress to or egress from the property, except by way of Slauson avenue, from which it is said that the several lots or parcels could not be identified. It appears, however, that Center street and First street have been in use since 1905, the property was inclosed, and on the easterly side a gate was maintained; that, following the tax sale, the purchasers measured their properties for the purpose of establishing their lines, and a chart of the Hay Tract addition to Nadeau Park is embodied in the record, showing the various lots, with their boundaries. However, from what has been said as to the actual payment of taxes for the use and benefit of appellants, which in equity they must be held liable to refund regardless of the validity of the assessments, this point requires no further discussion.

[11] As to the fourth and last ground urged for reversal, wherein it is contended that the decree should have been set aside, and another and different decree entered in "conformity with the findings of fact," appellants base their entire argument upon the points hereinbefore discussed. Their motion in the trial court stated that "there is a failure to find as a fact that the defendant Biedebach and his predecessors in interest have been in continuous, adverse possession of any of the property described in plaintiffs' amended complaint for more than five years immediately preceding the commencement of this action." The court did find that "the defendant Harvey Biedebach, and his predecessors in interest, entered upon lots 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 22, and 23 of the above-described property, and, for more than five years prior to the filing of the complaint herein, have been, and said defendant has been, in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession, claiming to own the same under written muniments of title, against the whole world, and has paid all taxes levied and assessed against the same for more than five years previous to the bringing of this action. * * *" From what has already been said, it is apparent that such finding comports with section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring that one claiming by adverse possession shall have paid the taxes for at least five years successively, and the decree based thereon recites that respondent "is held to be the owner of and entitled to the exclusive possession of said last-named lots, and that his title thereto be quieted. * * *"

No error prejudicial to appellants appearing, the order denying their motion to set aside said decree, and the judgment, are affirmed.

86 Cal. App. 736

WEYSE et al. v. BIEDEBACH et al. ★
(Civ. 4775.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 15, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1927.

I. Appeal and error $\S$ 173(2)—Objection that corporation could not diminish number of directors, urged for first time on appeal, cannot be considered (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 290, 362).

In action by directors of a defunct corporation to quiet title to its property, defendant's objection that board of directors of the corporation could not, under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 290, 362, be diminished to five directors without vote of majority of stockholders thereof being urged for the first time on appeal, has been waived, and cannot be considered.

2. Abatement and revival ⚡46—Objection that diminution of number of directors of corporation was ineffectual can be raised only by demurrer or answer (Civ. Code, §§ 290, 362; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 433, 434).

In action by directors of a defunct corporation to quiet title to its property, where board of directors, formerly consisting of seven members, voted that the number should be diminished to five, and all five directors were parties plaintiff, defendant's objection that, under Civ. Code, §§ 290, 362, number of directors could not be diminished without vote of majority of stockholders, amounting only to plea in abatement, based on alleged incapacity of plaintiffs to sue, could, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 433, 434, be raised by demurrer, if fact thereof appeared on face of complaint, and, if not, must be raised by answer.

3. Adverse possession ⚡114(1)—Evidence held not to show claimants' actual continued occupation and possession for five years, in addition to payment of taxes levied (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 323, 325).

In action to quiet title to lots, one of which defendant claimed under tax deed, evidence held not to show title therein in defendant by actual continued occupation and possession for five years, in addition to payment of taxes levied and assessed thereon, as required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 323, 325.

4. Adverse possession ⚡71(2)—Defendant claiming lot under apparently valid deed was not barred from claiming by adverse possession because deed was void or voidable.

Where deed under which claimant of lot by adverse possession was apparently valid, fact that it was void or voidable, or had been executed by one having no title, would not constitute bar to his defense to former owner's action to quiet title or to defendant's cause of action to quiet title therein by cross-complaint.

5. Quietening title ⚡43—Question of validity of exceptions or proper description is not before court, where decision thereon did not affect validity of deeds in suit.

Where, in action to quiet title, defendant claimed that plaintiff could not request judgment quieting title because conveyances through which prior owner acquired title did not clearly describe property, and hence legal title did not vest because of exception in description of property in deed to it, question as to validity of exceptions is not before court, where decision thereon would not affect validity of corporation's deeds.

6. Deeds ⚡137—Exception withdraws part of thing described as being granted, and which would pass but for excepting clause.

An exception withdraws some part of the thing described as being granted, and which would pass but for the excepting clause.

7. Deeds ⚡140—Granting part is not invalidated by defect in exception, but exception becomes ineffectual, if not properly described.

The granting part of a deed is not invalidated by a defect in the exception, but the exception itself becomes ineffectual, if not properly described, and the grant remains in force.

8. Taxation ⚡746—Tax deed held not void because executed by sheriff after term (Hittel's Gen. Law, § 6885).

That deed to plaintiff's predecessors was executed by sheriff after his term had expired held not to make deed void, where, under Hittel's Gen. Law, § 6885, in force at time of execution of deed, outgoing sheriff completed execution of writs which he had begun.

9. Appeal and error ⚡877(2)—Defendant, not having established defense to plaintiff's assertion of title as against him, cannot complain of decree quieting title in plaintiffs.

Where, in suit to quiet title, defendant claimed title by adverse possession under tax deeds, and where deeds from the state did not and could not convey title, and defendant did not establish a defense to plaintiff's assertion of title as against him, he could not complain of decree quieting title in plaintiffs.

10. Appeal and error ⚡173(4)—Defendant, not having objected to amount and terms of tender, cannot first urge on appeal that tender was subterfuge (Code Civ. Proc. § 2076).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, requiring specific objection to amount and terms of tender as requisite to subsequent complaint thereon, where defendant made no objection when plaintiffs tendered him $4,000, he cannot first urge on appeal that, since $4,000 was not the exact amount, it was but a subterfuge, and constituted no tender.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by H. G. Weyse and others, as trustees of the creditors and stockholders of the Antioak Leather Company, against Harvey Biedebach and others. From a part of judgment rendered for plaintiffs, named defendant appeals, and plaintiffs appeal from orders relieving named defendant from default and allowing him to file bill of exceptions. Affirmed.

See, also, 261 P. 1086.

Fred W. Heath, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles Lantz, Winslow P. Hyatt, and Frederick C. Huber, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant Biedebach from the same judgment from which the plaintiffs and respondents herein appealed in Weyse v. Biedebach (Civ. 4596), decided by this court on November 15, 1927, and reported in 261 P. 1086. Respondents also appealed from orders relieving Biedebach from default and allowing him to file his bill of exceptions, and settling the same, in this appeal. Weyse v. Biedebach (Cal. App.) 261 P. 1096.

[1] The first point here to be decided is as to whether or not the parties plaintiff were legally empowered to maintain this suit to quiet title. It is contended by appellant, and appears from the record, that on April 21, 1910, the articles of incorporation of the Antioak Leather Company provided for a board of directors consisting of seven members; and that on that date, by a resolution of all of its stockholders, it was voted that this number be diminished to five directors, and on the same date, by unanimous vote, a board of five members was elected, consisting of H. G. Weyse, A. W. Hutton, J. C. Hentzy, W. E. Hutton, and Allan Melrose, the five plaintiffs in this suit. At that time the Civil Code, §§ 290 and 362, provided that a majority of the stockholders of a corporation might diminish the number of directors; that a certificate of such change must be filed with the secretary of state and county clerk; and that no provision of said sections should be construed as authorizing an increase or diminishing of the number of directors without complying with the special provisions of the Civil Code. The statutory certificate mentioned was not filed. One of the original seven directors died, and one resigned. Thereafter, and on March 1, 1913, the corporation forfeited its charter by failure to pay its state license tax. During the fall of 1920 appellants Weyse and the Huttons met in the offices of the latter, and elected to institute a suit to quiet title to lots 1 to 39, inclusive, of the Hay Tract Addition to Nadeau Park, and adjoining property, as a result of which meeting this action was commenced.

[2] It is contended by appellant that, having failed to file the certificate required by the Civil Code, the attempted diminution of the number of directors was ineffectual that the legal board comprised seven members, two of which offices were vacant, and hence that a quorum consisted of at least four. It is argued therefrom that the three directors who instigated the suit—A. W. Hutton, W. E. Hutton, and H. G. Weyse—had not legally any authority to prosecute this action. It appears however, that all five surviving directors were parties plaintiff, and, in any event, appellant's objection to the proceeding amounts to no more than a plea in abatement based upon the alleged incapacity of the plaintiffs to sue. This is an objection which must be presented by demurrer, if the fact appears upon the face of the complaint, and, if it does not so appear, it must be presented by answer. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 433, 434; Labory v. Orphan Asylum, 97 Cal. 270, 32 P. 231; First Nat. Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 307, 35 P. 899; Ward Land & S. Co. v. Mapes, 147 Cal. 747, 82 P. 426; Nicholson v. Auburn Gold Min. Co., 6 Cal. App. 547, 92 P. 651; Reed & Co. v. Harshall, 12 Cal. App. 703, 108 P. 719; Riverdale Min. Co. v. Wicks, 14 Cal. App. 526, 112 P. 896; Crittenden v. Superior Court, 166 Cal. 340, 136 P. 287; Agricultural Club v. Hirsch & Son, 39 Cal. App. 433, 179 P. 430. Appellant having raised this question for the first time on appeal, it has been waived, and cannot now be considered. California Savings & Loan Soc. v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 P. 525.

[3, 4] Upon the merits of the case, as we observed in Weyse v. Biedebach (Civ. 4596), 261 P. 1086, supra, the appellant in this case purchased lot 21, and thereafter acquired from Dawson and others lots 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 22, and 23, but the trial court rendered judgment in his favor as to the last-mentioned eight lots only, decreeing to the plaintiffs all other properties in suit, including lot 21. Appellant contends that his title to this lot should also have been quieted. As heretofore determined by this court, in affirming the judgment in the other appeal, the tax deeds were invalid, but constituted sufficient color of title to support an adverse possession, provided all of the other elements were shown to have existed. Appellant testified that in July, 1914, he and the purchasers of adjoining lots measured their properties, and posted notices bearing their names and addresses, with the word "Owner" thereon; that there was an oil tank on lots 21 and 22; that he visited the property frequently, measured the oil, which he sold, and thereafter removed the tank; that he paid all taxes on lot 21 from 1908 to 1920, and that at no time did any one interfere with, or question, his right to possession; that he leased lot 21 to a Japanese in 1917, for a period of three years. During cross-examination, however, appellant admitted that his tenant paid but $10 on account of rent, planted nothing, and moved away at the end of the first year. Appellant's own witnesses swore that, although they had seen live stock and grading implements of respondents' tenants on the property, they had not seen other use made of it, and one who had known the property for 20 years admitted that he had never seen Biedebach on the lot. We find no evidence tending to show that he did more than sell the oil and tank, and to lease the lot in 1917, for which he received practically no rent. Aside from paying taxes, no evidence is called to our attention which tends to indicate that appellant exercised dominion over, or occupied, personally or otherwise, the lot in question, except for a few months. The trial court had all of the witnesses before it, and was cognizant of the circumstances. It decided adversely to appellant in this instance, and, although a motion was thereafter made for modification of the decree, the motion was denied. We are impelled to remark that the briefs in this case are exceedingly meager and of slight assistance. In many instances quotations from the record do not indicate where therein they may be found, and authorities cited are not applicable. Nevertheless, we have made an exhaustive study of the evidence and a thorough examination of the statutes and decisions of this state, from which we are convinced that, even without the application of the salutary rule in courts of review that all intendments must be resolved in favor of the decrees of tribunals of original jurisdiction, a judgment for appellant as to lot 21 would not have been justified. True, the deed under which he claimed this lot was apparently valid, and in such a case the fact that it was void, or voidable, or had been executed by one having no title, would not constitute a bar to his defense or to a cause of action to quiet title by cross-complaint. Millett v. Lagomarsino, 107 Cal. 102, 40 P. 25; Webb v. Winter, 135 Cal. 455, 67 P. 691. But to sustain a title by adverse possession it is incumbent upon the claimant to show actual, continued occupation and possession for a period of five years, in addition to the payment of state, county, and municipal taxes levied and assessed upon the property. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 323, 325. This requirement appellant did not meet.

[5] Appellant next insists that respondents ought not to recover a judgment quieting title to other property described in the pleadings, because, it is asserted, the conveyances through which the corporation originally attempted to acquire title did not correctly describe the property, and hence that the legal title did not vest in the corporation or in its trustees. Specifically stated, it is contended that both the deed to the Antioak Leather Company and to its vendor described the property conveyed, with the following provision:

"And leaving residue of land in said southwest quarter of said section belonging to or claimed by said Anton Mallachowitz and wife in as nearly a square form as possible in northwest corner of said lands lying east of and fronting said railroad. * * *"

It is also asserted, and appears from copies of conveyances in the record, that the deed to an antecedent owner contained the following language:

"Also all that piece or parcel of land being a portion of the southwest quarter, section 15, township 2 south, range 13 west, San Bernardino Meridian, lying immediately adjoining the Los Angeles and San Pedro Railroad, on the westerly side thereof, containing 12 acres of land more or less." "Also all that piece or parcel of land being a portion of the southwest quarter, section 15, township 2 south, range 13 west, San Bernardino Meridian, lying immediately adjoining the Los Angeles and San Pedro Railroad on the easterly side thereof, and near the south line of said quarter section, the said land being in a square form or piece on the line of said railroad containing eight acres. * * *"

It is contended by appellant that the map of the tract in controversy shows the railroad making an acute angle with the north line, so that a square is impossible; that the property lying on the westerly side of the railroad is not bounded either on the north or the south side; and that, as to the portion last mentioned, "near may mean an inch, a foot, a rod, or a chain distant from the south line," and that in these three instances the descriptions are so indefinite as to render any attempted conveyance containing them ineffectual, and therefore invalid.

[6, 7] With respect to the "square," as well as the 12-acre piece and that of 8 acres "near the south line," our attention is not called to any attempted showing in the record, and we have found none, to the effect that either one was included in the conveyances, or intended to be included. As to the piece first mentioned, the deeds, as already observed, described certain lands, and were limited as "leaving a residue * * * in as nearly a square form as possible." One Reyes originally acquired title to the entire southwest quarter of section 15 by United States patent, and thereafter Mallachowitz acquired the south half of said quarter. Later conveyances excepted the 8 acres, as well as the 12 acres, more or less, here in controversy. We are concerned only with the question as to whether or not the deeds to the Antioak Company were valid. An exception withdraws some part of the thing described as being granted, and which would pass but for the excepting clause. Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 583, 72 P. 171; Pitcairn v. Harkness, 10 Cal. App. 295, 101 P. 809. The granting part of a deed is not invalidated by a defect in the exception, but the exception itself becomes ineffectual if not properly described, and the grant remains in force. Marcone v. Dowell, 178 Cal. 396, 173 P. 465; Tennant v. Tennant M. Home, 167 Cal. 570, 140 P. 242; Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 P. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207. Hence the question as to the validity of the exceptions, or the proper description of them, is not here before the court, for their decision would not affect the validity of the deeds in question.

[8] H. M. Mitchell, as sheriff, executed to A. H. Wilcox, one of the intervening owners, a deed of certain of the property here involved, on April 12, 1880. It is asserted that the sheriff's term had then expired, and that said deed was void because the sheriff had no authority to execute it. It appears, however, that at that time the statutes required that an outgoing sheriff complete the execution of writs which he had "begun to execute, by the collection of money or a levy on property." Such was the common-law rule and the law of this state until 1883. Hittel's Gen. L. § 6885; Wood v. Lowden, 117 Cal. 232, 49 P. 132; Perrin v. McMann, 97 Cal. 52, 31 P. 837; In re Baker, 32 Cal. App. 320, 323, 162 P. 922.

[9] Other points attempted to be advanced are to the effect that certain defective affidavits in the tax office were subsequently corrected, rendering the deeds valid; that, although the assessments were admittedly excessive, this fact would not of itself render valid deeds invalid; and that, upon arrival of other claimants to the property, respondents vacated. It is argued, therefrom, that respondents' judgment quieting title, in the face of valid deeds to other persons, and of evidence of disseizin, is erroneous. As we have already shown, the properties here involved either were never deeded to the state, and deeds from the state did not, and could not, convey title, or, in some instances, title was not acquired by appellant. In either event, neither by his answer, cross-complaint, or proof, has appellant established a defense to the plaintiffs' assertion of title as against him, and, this being true, he is not in a position to complain of the findings and decree of the trial court.

[10] Finally, it is argued that the plaintiffs tendered to appellant the sum of $4,000, merely by "producing" that amount, as a purported offer to reimburse him for whatever moneys he might be entitled to recover for disbursements in their behalf; that, inasmuch as this was not the exact amount, it was but a subterfuge, and constituted no tender at all. However, section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that specific objection to the amount and terms of a tender is requisite to subsequent complaint based thereon, in a legal proceeding. This the appellant does not appear to have made, and the point cannot now be raised for the first time.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEYSE et al. v. BIEDEBACH. (Civ. 4783.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 15, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1927.

1. Appeal and error §985—Trial court's ruling, relieving of default in serving and filing bill of exceptions, must be upheld, where sufficient grounds therefor were stated.

Where there is no showing on what grounds defendant was relieved from default in serving and filing bills of exceptions, but appropriate and sufficient grounds therefor were stated, ruling must be upheld, in view of appellate court's duty to resolve all intendments and presumptions in favor of trial court's rulings.

2. Exceptions, bill of §41(1)—Order relieving of default in serving and filing bill before party seeking extension was in default held void.

Order relieving default in serving and filing bill of exceptions, having been made before party seeking extension was in default, was void for want of jurisdiction of court to make it.

3. Exceptions, bill of §42—Plaintiff's request for extension for preparation of amendments waived objections that bill was not timely served and order relieving default was void.

Request by plaintiffs' attorneys, when accepting defendant's bill of exceptions for 30 days for preparation of amendments, constituted waiver of plaintiffs' right to object on ground that bill was not served in time, and estopped them from asserting default, because order relieving defendant's default in serving and filing bill was void.

4. Exceptions, bill of §43(1)—Six-month limitation, after which no relief from default is obtainable, begins to run only after action by adverse party (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for amendments and relief from judgment order or proceedings that relief thereby authorized may not be granted in any case where application for it is made more than six months after judgment or proceeding is taken, permits application to be made at time application for relief from default is presented, even though it be more than six months after default, and such period of six months does not begin to run until some action is taken by adverse party, based on default, or order of court is made as result of default.

5. Exceptions, bill of §43(2)—Order relieving default in having bill engrossed for excusable neglect held not abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Order of trial judge relieving defendant of default in having bill of exceptions engrossed in time held not abuse of discretion within Code Civ. Proc. § 473, where, because of numerous amendments allowed to bill and volume and character and work thereon, defendant's neglect to have it timely engrossed was excusable.

6. Appeal and error §949—Exceptions, bill of §43(1)—Setting aside default and granting relief is discretionary, and will not be disturbed, unless discretion is abused.

Superior court's action in setting aside default and granting relief therefrom is discretionary, and will not be disturbed, unless abuse of discretion is clearly shown.

7. Exceptions, bill of §43(1)—Notice stating motion to set aside default was based on affidavit held sufficient reference, so that affidavit supplied grounds omitted (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Notice of motion to set aside default, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, stating that it was based in part on affidavit served therewith, was sufficient reference, so that contents of affidavit could supply information as to grounds relied on omitted from notice.

8. Exceptions, bill of §43(1)—Notice of motion to be relieved from default held sufficiently definite to include failure to have bill of exceptions timely engrossed (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Notice of motion, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for relief from default in manner of preparing and presenting proposed bill of exceptions, with amendments as settled, and for other relief, if necessary, held sufficiently definite to include relief for failure to have bill timely engrossed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Harry G. Weyse and others as trustees, etc., against Harvey Biedebach. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appealed. From orders relieving defendant from default and certifying and ordering filed proposed bill of exceptions, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 261 P. 1086.

Charles Lantz, W. P. Hyatt, F. C. Huber, and S. M. Garroway, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred W. Heath, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. In 1920 appellants instituted an action to quiet title to certain lots numbered 1 to 29 in the Hay Tract addition to Nadeau Park, in Los Angeles county, and recovered judgment therein, from which the respondent in this proceeding appealed (and which appeal is numbered 4775), 261 P. 1092. Notice of entry of judgment in that case was served and filed November 8, 1922, and on November 16, 1922, counsel for Biedebach obtained an order from Judge Frank R. Willis of the superior court granting him 30 days in addition to that allowed by law within which to prepare and serve his proposed bill of exceptions, "no additional time having heretofore been granted." Thereafter, and on November 29, 1922, upon stipulation of counsel, a second order extending the time 30 days further was granted by Judge Albert Lee Stephens, before whom the case had been tried, and on January 25, 1923, the last-named judge, upon stipulation therefor, extended such time "30 days from and after January 27, 1923, the date to which said time has heretofore been extended." The defendant's bill of exceptions was not served or filed within the time allowed by this latter order, and on March 2, 1923, his counsel presented before Judge Howard A. Peairs of said superior court a motion to be relieved from his default and for an order extending the time for preparation and service of his bill of exceptions, which motion was argued and submitted. and the same was granted, defendant's time being once more extended "for a period of 30 days from and after February 26, 1923; the time as extended expiring on March 28, 1923." No stipulation or order extending time was thereafter made on behalf of the defendant. To this last-mentioned order the plaintiffs objected upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to relieve the defendant from default, or to so extend his time. On March 28, 1923, the defendant's proposed bill of exceptions was served upon opposing counsel, and on May 17, 1923, it was stipulated that plaintiffs have 30 days from that date within which to prepare and serve their proposed amendments. It appears by affidavit of counsel for appellant herein that "on June 15, 1923, time having been duly extended therefor, without prejudice, and expressly reserving their objection to the settlement of said bill of exceptions as not having been served in time, (plaintiff's) served upon said defendant's attorney said proposed amendments to said proposed bill of exceptions, reserving therein their objections thereto as follows, to wit," and specific reservations and exceptions to the order relieving defendant from default, and to the filing or settlement of a bill of exceptions, are enumerated, following which appear the defendant's proposed amendments.

On August 13, 1923, the proposed bill of exceptions and proposed amendments were presented to the judge who tried the case, and, after argument, and over objection of the plaintiffs, the same was settled, and it was ordered that the same be engrossed and presented for signature within the time provided by law. Counsel for the appealing party thereupon carried the bill and proposed amendments to his office for engrossing, but it appears that nothing further was done in the matter for about 4 months.

On November 21, 1923, the plaintiff's attorney served upon counsel for the defendant a notice in writing that on November 27, 1923, they would move the court for an order that "no proceedings by defendant, Harvey Biedebach, for the settlement of a bill of exceptions on the appeal of defendant, Harvey Biedebach, herein are now pending in this court"; that no proposed bill of exceptions had been served, presented, settled, or engrossed (with or without amendments) within the time permitted by the statutes, and that the defendant was not entitled to have presented, certified, or filed any bill of exceptions upon said appeal. On November 27, 1923, when this motion was presented, the defendant in turn moved the trial court, "under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure," for an order relieving him from "any default in the matter of preparing and presenting proposed bill of exceptions with amendments as settled by the court, and for other relief, if any necessary, to relieve defendant or his attorney from any default or laches in that behalf." Each such motion was accompanied by affidavit of the party's counsel, that for the plaintiffs reciting the facts heretofore detailed, and averring that 100 days had elapsed since the settlement of the bill, but that the same had not been engrossed, signed, certified, or filed. The affidavit of defendant's counsel alleged that he did not receive all of the plaintiffs' proposed amendments until on or before June 25, 1923, at which time the judge who tried the case was absent from the county; that it was impossible to present it for some time thereafter, but that, on or about August 18, 1923, the same was settled, and that no time was indicated or fixed by the court when the bill of exceptions should be completed or presented for signature, it was extremely voluminous, entailed much time and effort; and that "the said transcribed bill as settled is now (November 27, 1923) in the possession of the clerk of this court, and a copy thereof has been prepared and is ready for service upon the plaintiff's counsel." Both of these latter motions were continued, and, when finally argued and submitted, were taken under advisement. On March 4, 1924, the trial court made and filed a written order in the following language:

"Defendant has presented his bill of exceptions for settlement, and plaintiffs by motion object to its settlement on various grounds, among them being that the engrossed bill was not presented to me for signature within the time prescribed by law. In this I sustain the plaintiffs' contention, and hold defendant in default. As to all other portions of plaintiffs' motion, it is denied.

"Defendant seeks to be relieved from his default by appropriate motion, and this motion is granted.

"In considering the above, which includes a question of the legality of an order by Judge Peairs setting aside a previous default and granting further time, I have been in much doubt. I, however, conceive it to be my duty to resolve such doubt in such manner as will preserve the benefit of appeal, should the Court of Appeal sustain the legality of these orders."

On March 6, 1924, there was entered upon the minutes of the trial court an order reciting:

"Bill of exceptions presented by defendant is fully settled and allowed and certified to be correct, and is ordered filed as the engrossed bill of exceptions."

The plaintiffs thereupon appealed from the order of March 4, 1924, granting the defendant's motion to be relieved from default, and from that of March 6, 1924, last quoted, certifying and ordering filed the engrossed bill of exceptions.

[1] We have related in detail the various steps taken by the respective parties, since, while this appeal is taken only from the two orders last mentioned, it is contended by appellants herein that the trial court made them without jurisdiction, for the reason that from February 26, 1923, to March 6, 1924, each and every act of the court and of counsel in case numbered 4775 occurred after the expiration of the right to perfect an appeal in that case, and was therefore invalid, and could furnish no foundation or jurisdiction for the orders herein in controversy.

It appears without contradiction that counsel for respondent herein receipted for appellants' proposed amendments to the bill of exceptions on June 15, 1923; also that, whereas appellants notified opposing counsel 6 days prior to the date of their motion that on November 27, 1923, they would move the court for an order declaring respondent in default, no affidavit or notice of motion for relief from default in the last instance, or offer of engrossed bill of exceptions, was forthcoming until the very day upon which appellants' motion was called for hearing, at which time the respondent represented for the first time that he had his bill of exceptions "ready for service upon the plaintiffs' counsel."

On February 26, 1923, respondent's time for serving and filing his proposed bill of exceptions expired, after which he was admittedly in default. It does not appear upon which grounds relief from default and extension of time were granted on March 2, 1923. Hence, since appropriate and sufficient grounds were stated, resolving, as we must, all intendments and presumptions in favor of the ruling of the trial court, such order appears to be proper and valid. However, it is claimed that the court had no power to make it. No appeal was taken from the order of March 2, 1923. Yet it is important to consider its validity, because, if it had the effect of relieving the default existing when it was rendered, the order made on March 4, 1924, would not be vulnerable to the objection of having been made more than 6 months after the first default, which it might otherwise be construed as attempting to cure. On the other hand, if the first order was void, the default which it assumed to relieve was unaffected, and may have been incurable at the time the second order—that of March 4, 1924—was made, more than 6 months having then elapsed since the default occurring through failure to file the bill of exceptions within the time allowed by law.

[2, 3] A computation of the various periods over which the time was extended to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions shows that the time given without consent of the respondent (appellant here) did not exceed 30 days beyond that allowed by law. However, the order of March 2, 1923, was not made before the party seeking the extension was in default, and hence, for that reason, it was void for want of jurisdiction of the court to make it. Curtis v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 390, 11 P. 652; Connor v. Southern California Motor Road Co., 101 Cal. 429, 35 P. 990. Yet, as in the case of Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 737, 136 P. 523, the attorneys for the respondent "not only accepted the bill but requested of, and secured from, the defendant a stipulation granting to them 36 days in which to prepare and serve their proposed amendments." This constitutes a waiver of any right which the respondent therein (appellant here) might have had to object on the ground that the bill was not served in time, and he is estopped from asserting a default against the other party on the ground that the order in question was void.

[4] It is said that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order of March 4, 1924, granting the motion presented on November 22, 1923, since more than 6 months had then elapsed after the default from which said motion sought to secure relief. This, however, arises from an interpretation of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which might have been worthy of serious consideration but for the fact that it is met with disapproval in a number of decisions of our Supreme Court. It is now settled beyond question that the limitation contained in the Code section just mentioned to the effect that the relief thereby authorized may not be granted in any case where application for it is made at a time exceeding 6 months "after such judgment, order or proceeding is taken" permits the application to be made at the time the application for relief from default is presented to the court, even though this be more than 6 months after the default itself occurs. In other words, the period of 6 months named in section 473 does not begin to run until some proceeding or action is taken by the adverse party based upon the default or some order of the court is made as a result of such default. Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 P. 332; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 P. 935; Pollitz v. Wickershaw, 150 Cal. 238, 88 P. 911. But 6 months did not elapse from 10 days after the bill of exceptions was settled and ordered engrossed until the order granting the relief from default from which order the appeal was taken was made. The period thus involved was only from August 23, 1923, until March 4, 1924.

[5, 6] It is next claimed that the order last mentioned constituted an abuse of discretion of the trial court. In support of this contention many cases are cited holding that ignorance of the law is not excusable under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. While it is true that respondent's motion and affidavit in support of it show some apparent lack of information as to when the bill of exceptions was required by law to be engrossed, other grounds than this are contained within the affidavit upon which the superior court extended relief. These other facts in substance justify the conclusion that, because of the numerous amendments allowed by the superior court to the proposed bill of exceptions and the volume and character of the same, and the large amount of work and time of counsel required in connection therewith, neglect to have the bill of exceptions engrossed within the time required by law was excusable. It is elementary that the action of the superior court in setting aside a default and granting relief therefrom is a matter largely within its discretion, and that its action in that behalf will not be disturbed, unless a clear case of abuse of that discretion is divulged. Such a condition is not here disclosed.

[7] It is next insisted that the notice of motion heard November 27, 1923, was fatally indefinite, in that it did not specify from what default on the part of the moving party relief was sought or upon which of the grounds enumerated in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure the motion was based. The affidavit in support of the motion contains a statement of facts which we think is sufficient to justify the trial court in concluding that there had been neglect upon the part of counsel for appellant herein, and that such neglect was excusable. The notice of motion states that it is based in part upon the affidavit served therewith. This is a sufficient reference so that the contents of the affidavit supply the information as to the grounds upon which relief was sought, and which was omitted from the notice itself. Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353.

[8] There is no merit in the other specification of indefiniteness. The default from which relief was asked is "any default in the manner of preparing and presenting proposed bill of exceptions with amendments as settled by the court, and for other relief, if any necessary, to relieve defendant or his attorney from any default or laches in that behalf." Standing alone, this is probably somewhat broad and uncertain, but, taken in connection with other facts known to the respondent in that proceeding, it cannot be said that he was not fully informed as to the default in question. In the first place, it must be remembered that this notice of motion was served immediately after the notice of motion on the part of the respondent in that proceeding, pointing out that the appellant therein was then in default in the matter of the engrossment of the bill of exceptions; but, in addition to this, the affidavit of the attorney for the appealing party (respondent here) described in detail the default from which relief was sought by reciting the steps taken and the dates thereof.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

PACIFIC STATES CORPORATION v. GRANT. (Civ. 4536.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Motions $\Leftrightarrow$ 42—Statute against making second motion in same court held not to go to jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 182).

Code Civ. Proc. § 182, providing that if application for order is refused no subsequent application for same order shall be made except in higher court, held not to deprive court of jurisdiction to entertain second motion.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit $\Leftrightarrow$ 60(6)—Letters of counsel held not equivalent to written stipulation for extension of time of trial tolling statute respecting dismissal for failure to bring to trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 583).

Letters between counsel held not to definitely extend time for trial beyond 5 years after filing of answer, within Code Civ. Proc. § 583, requiring dismissal of action if it be not brought to trial within that time, except where parties have stipulated in writing that time may be extended.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit $\Leftrightarrow$ 60(3)—Estoppel cannot take place of written stipulation to prevent dismissal for failure to bring action to trial in statutory time (Code Civ. Proc. § 583).

Estoppel by action cannot take the place of written stipulation for extension of time of trial to prevent dismissal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, for not being brought to trial within 5 years after answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by the Pacific States Corporation against U. S. Grant, Jr. From an order vacating the order dismissing the action for want of prosecution, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sprigg & O'Farrell, of San Diego, for appellant.

Lewis, Fleming & Goodwin, of Los Angeles, and Hamilton & Lindley, of San Diego, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order vacating an order dismissing the action for want of prosecution made under the last sentence of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where the case has not been brought to trial within five years from the date of filing the answer.

The following is a chronology of the case, including correspondence between the attorneys:

September 19, 1917, complaint filed.

October 1, 1917, answer filed.

May 4, 1922, letter, Lewis to Wright.

May 5, 1922, letter, Wright to Lewis.

July 8, 1922, letter, Lewis to Wright.

July 15, 1922, letter, Wright to Lewis.

October 1, 1922, expiration of five-year period under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

November 17, 1922, defendant substitutes attorneys.

November 17, 1922, court dismisses action on its own motion, but at the suggestion of attorneys for defendant.

November 17, 1922, letter, Wright to Lewis.

November 22, 1922, letter, Lewis to Sprigg (substituted for Wright).

November 27, 1922, letter, Sprigg to Lewis, notifying plaintiff that the case had been dismissed by the court.

February 23, 1923, notice of motion by plaintiff to vacate judgment of dismissal served.

February 26, 1923, motion heard before Judge C. N. Andrews, and denied, "10 days are granted plaintiff within which to file an amended affidavit herein upon which plaintiff's motion may be reheard." (Note.—The record does not disclose any amended affidavit was ever filed, except as it was attached to the following notice.)

May 1, 1923, notice of motion to vacate order of dismissal of November 17, 1922, filed. (Note.—The notice does not refer to the order of February 26, 1923, denying a vacation of said order of November 17, 1922.)

May 7, 1923, motion heard before Judge W. P. Cary, and granted. Case reinstated.

Defendant appeals from the order of May 7, 1923, and alleges that said order was void for two reasons: (1) That there was no written stipulation extending time under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence it was mandatory upon the court to dismiss the action and the court had no discretion in that matter; (2) that the said superior court had no jurisdiction to rehear said motion to vacate the dismissal after it had been considered on its merits and denied.

Counsel for plaintiff controvert points 1 and 2 and add a third point, as follows: (3) That the defendant was estopped from moving for or obtaining a dismissal of the suit.

[1] We will first discuss point 2, that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order of May 22, 1923. Appellant relies upon section 182 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"If an application for an order, made to a judge of a court in which the action or proceeding is pending, is refused in whole or in part, or is granted conditionally, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made to any court commissioner, or any other judge, except of a higher court; but nothing in this section applies to motions refused for informality in the papers or proceedings necessary to obtain the order, or to motions refused with liberty to renew the same."

The Supreme Court has set the question at rest in Andersen v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 95, 102, 200 P. 963, 966, where the court says:

"As further ground of objection to the issuance of a writ of mandate in this matter, respondents urge that the motion for dismissal was properly denied, for the reason that two previous motions based on the same grounds had been presented by these petitioners and denied by another judge of the same court, and that the motion before us was made in violation of the rule provided in section 182 of the Code of Civil Procedure. * * *

"Section 182 does not apply to the renewal of a motion refused for informality of the moving papers or proceedings, or in cases where leave to renew is given; and, in any event, does not go to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain a second motion. The penalty is provided by section 183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is punishment for contempt, and authority to the court to set aside an order obtained by a violation of the rule.

"In any event, the proper practice in the case of an unauthorized motion is to strike it from the files. (Italics ours.)

True, the Supreme Court does not refer to Hanson v. Hanson, 3 Cal. Unrep. 66, 20 P. 736 (1889), which seems to favor appellant, but the Andersen Case is the last pronouncement of that court, and therefore governs. We therefore determine that the court had jurisdiction to pass upon said motion, in view of the fact that no motion to strike the same has ever been filed.

We now pass to point 1, which we regard as the controlling question in the case. It is to be remembered that the record discloses the fact that this case had never been set for trial at any date whatsoever.

If there was a written stipulation at all, it will be found in the following correspondence between the attorneys. In reading the correspondence it must be borne in mind that Mr. Lewis represented the plaintiff, and Senator Leroy A. Wright, a member of the firm of Wright & McKee, was handling the case in person for the defendant.

On May 4, 1922, Howard S. Lewis, the attorney for the plaintiff in this action, wrote relative to this case to Leroy A. Wright, attorney for defendant, as follows:

"If Mr. Grant does not see fit to settle the matter along the line suggested, I trust you will co-operate with me in stipulating that the case may be set at the convenience of one of your departments. Your reply will be greatly appreciated."

On May 5, 1922, Mr. Wright wrote to Mr. Lewis in answer to the foregoing letter, as follows:

"I should have written you before, but have been so busy that I have neglected to do so. Mr. Grant has declined to further discuss the litigation. He is away again with Mrs. Grant for a trip of a month or more. I could therefore not consent to the trial of the case until he returns. As soon as he does return, I will be glad to notify you and then we will stipulate as to the trial." (Italics ours.)

Later, on July 8, 1922, Mr. Lewis wrote to Mr. Wright:

"I would like very much to bring the U. S. Grant, Jr., matter to a definite conclusion, and wonder what day I can see you after this coming week, if I would come down, and if U. S. Grant, Jr., is at home."

In reply to this, Mr. Wright wrote under date of July 15, 1922, as follows:

"I have before me your favor of July 8, and beg to say that I will be engaged all of next week in the trial of a jury case, and that within a few days after its conclusion I am planning to leave on my summer vacation. Mr. and Mrs. Grant left more than a month ago and are now traveling somewhere in Japan. I understand that Mr. Grant will not return until some time next fall. I will be pleased to advise you when he does return."

Under date of November 17, 1922, in reply to a letter from Mr. Lewis asking that this case either be settled or set down for trial, Mr. Wright wrote as follows:

"Some months ago when you asked me to agree to the setting of the above-entitled case for trial, I wrote you that I could not do so as Mr. Grant was absent, but promised that I would notify you upon his return. Mr. Grant returned about a week ago, and has discharged this firm and employed Mr. Patterson Sprigg. We have already signed the substitution and presume Mr. Sprigg will communicate with you."

On November 22, 1922, Lewis dispatched the following letter to Patterson Sprigg, attorney at law, San Diego, Cal.:

"The above case has been allowed to hang fire pending settlement for a long time. I submitted to Senator Wright letters in the handwriting of Mr. Grant, together with other documentary proof signed by Mr. Grant, which gives the defense interposed a complete contradiction. I am prepared to submit to you, as attorney for Mr. Grant, the same documents, and if you are not satisfied to also advise Mr. Grant to settle this case I will have this matter set down for the earliest possible trial that can be had.

"Your early attention to this matter will be greatly appreciated."

In reply to this letter on November 27, 1922, Mr. Patterson Sprigg wrote a letter as follows:

"I have your favor of the 22d. I assume that Senator Wright must have advised you that I have been substituted as attorney in this case. After I had been employed by Mr. Grant, and the substitution of attorneys was effected, I inspected the record and discovered that the answer had been filed in this case for more than 5 years, and I informed Mr. Grant that under the provision of our Code, the case could be dismissed for want of prosecution. He then advised that the case be dismissed if possible. I called the court's attention to the record of the case, and the court, at its own motion, dismissed the same.

"I regret exceedingly that this action should cause you embarrassment, but I have no other course."

It will be observed that upon the date of the letter of November 17, 1922, Wright to Lewis, above set forth, the court dismissed the action. It will further be observed that the said letter was written after the 5 years had expired.

Since the motion of May 7, 1923, was heard and decided, the Supreme Court, in the case of Miller & Lux v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 333, 219 P. 1006, has laid down a very definite rule regarding the application of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which we deem determinative of this case, and, had it been in the books at the time the motion was heard, we do not doubt the result would have been different. In that case the court says:

"An examination of the cases construing section 583, supra, discloses that no case decided by this court has held that anything short of a written stipulation extending in express terms the time of trial to a date beyond the five-year period, or expressly waiving the right to a dismissal under that section, will suffice to toll the running of the statutory time. On the contrary, the cases uniformly hold that the provisions of section 583 are mandatory and that, in the absence of a written stipulation, any action not brought to trial within the statutory period must be dismissed [citing cases]. * * * The language of the Code section under consideration is simple and direct and expressly provides the means whereby litigants may extend the statutory period. It is argued by plaintiffs that despite the apparently plain import of the language used, specifically providing that an action must be dismissed unless the time for trial be extended by written stipulation of the parties, nevertheless such time may be otherwise extended—that is to say, by words and conduct on the part of the defendants constituting a waiver of their right to dismiss. And in this behalf it is insisted that the request of the attorney for the defendants in the three actions that the Turner Case, in which he represented the plaintiff, be tried prior to the three actions in which he represented the defendants and his insistence that this case precede the others was conduct sufficient to constitute such an estoppel. While there is language in several of the cases construing section 583 which seems to recognize the possibility of a waiver by estoppel, it is to be noted that without exception these cases hold that a written stipulation is required [citing cases].

"The statute provides that the time for trial may be extended by written stipulation. It does not provide that it may be extended by a written stipulation 'or its equivalent.' And in Larkin v. Superior Court [171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670], supra, it was said that whether or not an oral stipulation in open court entered upon the minutes of the court is the same as a written stipulation and would toll the running of the statute is a 'serious question.' Obviously, the primary purpose of this section is to prevent the unlimited postponement of trials. The statute, however, is not altogether arbitrary and inflexible, for it provides that the parties may extend the time by proceeding in a certain definite way.

"The provision that a written stipulation be entered into was intended to preclude all disputes, with their attendant charges and countercharges of overreaching and unethical conduct, by a requirement that clear and uncontrovertible evidence be presented to the court that the statutory time was deliberately intended to be extended by both parties. * * *

"* * * The very harshness of the rule would seem to be intended to put the plaintiff on the qui vive to secure irrefutable evidence of the defendant's consent to an extension of the statutory time." (Italics ours.)

The rule laid down by the foregoing may be succinctly stated as follows: (1) There must be a written stipulation; (2) such stipulation must in definite terms extend the time beyond the statutory period or expressly waive the right to dismissal; (3) the stipulation must show clearly and uncontrovertibly that the statutory time was deliberately intended to be extended by both parties; (4) that there is no equivalent for such written stipulation, by either words or actions.

[2] Tested by this rule, we come to the consideration of the instant case. Certainly there is nothing in the letter of May 4, 1922, Lewis to Wright, and that of May 5, 1922, Wright to Lewis, which in any reading would do more than extend the time of trial for about "a month or more," which was then within the statutory time, and hence did not operate to toll the statute. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670; Rio Vista M. Co. v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 1, 200 P. 616; Miller & Lux v. Superior Court, supra, at page 338 (219 P. 1008).

The letter of Wright to Lewis, under date of July 15, 1922, does not "in definite terms extend the time beyond the statutory period," nor does it in such terms or in any terms "waive the right of dismissal." The time of Mr. Grant's return was extremely indefinite—"some time in the fall," which might be either before or after October 1, 1922. Neither does that letter or any letter show a "deliberate intent" on the part of both parties or either party to extend the statutory time. There is nothing in the case of Donohoe Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 1094, or Rio Vista Mining Co. v. Superior Court, supra, to the contrary, as in each of those cases the correspondence "in definite terms" fixed a trial date beyond the five-year statutory period, as is shown by recitals in the opinion in the Rio Vista Case, and the record itself in the Donohoe Case. In both cases the trial date had been previously set, a fact entirely dissimilar to the case at bar. Also, in the Rio Vista Case the parties actually went to trial on the date agreed upon beyond the five-year period. Here no trial was ever set or had.

Mr. Lewis' only excuse for not pressing the case to trial in view of Mr. Wright's letter of July 15, 1922, was, as stated in Mr. Lewis' affidavit:

"That Senator Wright would have been placed in a very embarrassing position to have had the case set for trial with his client absent in Europe or the Orient, and this affiant would not place Senator Wright in any such position which was fully understood by this affiant and Senator Wright."

This position is answered by the following quotation from Miller & Lux v. Superior Court, supra, at page 342 (219 P. 1009):

"It may be suggested that if counsel had desired to avoid the bar of the statute it would have been a very simple matter, after calling the court's attention to the situation, to have requested that one witness be sworn in the cases and then the hearing of the cases continued until a time which would be convenient for the court and the parties to the action."

[3] Respondents rely somewhat on the actions and alleged statements of Senator Wright taken and made at a conference in Senator Wright's office on April 10, 1922, at which conference Mr. Lewis, his client, Merritt, and Senator Wright were present, but it is to be noted that the conference occurred before any of the letters relied upon by respondents were written.

At most such actions and statements, construed most strongly against the defendants, could only be used by way of estoppel or as the equivalent of a written stipulation, and the Supreme Court in the Miller & Lux Case, supra, has decided that there is no such estoppel.

Again, we have examined the record as to what was said and done at such conference, and can find nothing therein which would amount to an estoppel, even if such were allowed.

This, we think, is fully supported by the letter of Lewis to Wright of date May 4, 1922, and Mr. Wright's reply thereto, which we have quoted. There the plaintiff was definitely informed that all negotiations were off. "Mr. Grant has declined to further discuss the litigation."

Not only did the plaintiff delay for more than five years in setting the case for trial, for as a matter of fact it has never been set, but for almost three months after Mr. Lewis, the plaintiff's attorney, was aware that the case had been dismissed on the court's own motion, no steps were taken to revoke said order, and no excuse is offered for such delay. When, on February 26, 1923, an attempt was made to revoke the order of dismissal, it failed, and nothing was done for over two months thereafter, or until on May 7, 1923, when another motion was made to set aside the order of dismissal of November 17, 1922, and said motion was granted. All of this does not bespeak diligence, but, on the contrary, the procrastination which apparently has ruled the case from its inception.

The order of November 17, 1922, dismissing said case was proper. The order vacating said dismissal was erroneous. Therefore the order dated May 14, 1923, filed May 15, 1923, and entered May 15, 1923, vacating the order of November 17, 1922, and reinstating the case, is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BLUMEN et al. (Cr. 1400.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 2, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 30, 1928.

1. Criminal law §274, 1149—Granting permission to withdraw plea of guilty is within court's discretion, not reviewable, save for abuse.

Granting or denying of permission to withdraw plea of guilty and substitute plea of not guilty is within sound discretion of trial court, and its action must be sustained, unless abuse of discretion clearly appears.

2. Criminal law §274—In prosecution for grand larceny, evidence held to justify court in denial of leave to withdraw plea of guilty.

Evidence held sufficient to justify trial court in believing there was no reasonable doubt of defendants' guilt in prosecution for grand larceny, where defendants did not deny theft of bonds, only defense being one obviously technical, and denial of leave to withdraw plea of guilty was not abuse of discretion.

3. Criminal law §274—Denial of motion for leave to withdraw plea of guilty, interposed for purpose of speculating on chance of gaining probation, held not abuse of discretion.

Denial of defendants' motion for leave to withdraw plea of guilty held not abuse of discretion, where plea was made without any misconception as to nature of charge and for purpose of speculating on chance of gaining probation, notwithstanding claim that defendants were led to believe probation would be granted.

4. Larceny §30(7)—"Ten (10) Norsk 5½% Stats. Loan 1918 bonds of the value of $21,000 * * *" held sufficient description of stolen property in grand larceny indictment (Pen. Code §§ 967, 1131).

In prosecution for grand larceny, count of indictment, describing stolen property as "ten (10) Norsk 5½% Stats. Loan 1918 bonds of the value of $21,000 in gold coin of the United States of America," held not demurrable for failure to describe property with sufficient certainty, since, under Pen. Code §§ 967, 1131, particular number, denomination, or kind of bond need not be alleged.

5. Indictment and information §71—Law merely requires that defendant in criminal case be informed in plain language of act he is alleged to have committed.

Law requires merely that person charged with criminal offense be informed in plain, intelligent language of the specific act he is alleged to have committed.

6. Extradition ⇨ 19—Defendants held not convicted of another charge than on which extradited from England, notwithstanding variance between value of property and alleged value.

In prosecution for larceny, in which defendants were extradited from England for trial on certain count of indictment, that bonds described therein were of less value than amount alleged held insufficient to sustain contention that defendants were extradited on one charge and convicted on another, in violation of treaty between United States and Great Britain.

7. Indictment and information ⇨ 199—Defendants waived variance between value of stolen property and alleged value by pleading guilty.

In prosecution for grand larceny, defendants waived all questions of variance between value of bonds stolen and value, as alleged in indictment, by pleading guilty to charge.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Julius M. Blumen, alias J. M. Busch, and another, were convicted of grand larceny on a plea of guilty. From an order denying a motion for leave to withdraw the plea of guilty, and from the judgment of conviction, they appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn and James S. Howie, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. Appellants pleaded guilty to a charge of grand larceny and applied for probation, but, before their applications were heard, moved the court for leave to withdraw said pleas, and the motion was denied. An appeal was then taken from the order denying said motion and from the judgment of conviction.

[1] The rule is well established that the granting or denying of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty and to substitute a plea of not guilty is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, and that its action must be sustained, unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 206 P. 63, 20 A. L. R. 1441. The circumstances as shown by the record here in support of the trial court's decision denying said motion may be stated as follows: Appellants are brothers. One of them had been employed in the foreign exchange department of a San Francisco bank. In February, 1926, they were indicted for the theft and embezzlement of the bank's securities, consisting of foreign national bonds, approximately in value $100,000. Three separate indictments were returned against them. One contained three counts, charging them jointly with grand larceny, and the other two charged them singly, one with grand larceny and the other with embezzlement. At the time the indictments were found appellants were fugitives, but later were apprehended in London, England, and, pursuant to extradition proceedings, were returned to San Francisco for trial. They appeared in court with counsel for arraignment on August 13, 1926, and were given until August 23d to plead. Demurrers on general and special grounds were thereafter interposed and overruled; and on October 20th pleas of not guilty were entered to each charge. On November 29th the causes came on for trial, at which time appellants, being represented by counsel, asked and were granted permission to withdraw their pleas of not guilty to the charge set forth in the second count of the joint indictment, and thereupon entered pleas of guilty thereto; whereupon and on motion of the district attorney the court dismissed the charges set forth in the first and third counts, and the two remaining indictments. On December 3d, which was the date set for the pronouncement of judgment, appellants applied for probation. The hearing of their applications was continued until January 3, 1927. At that time appellants filed a motion for leave to withdraw their pleas of guilty and their applications for probation, and to vacate the order dismissing the other charges. After a full hearing, during which much oral and documentary proof was received, appellants' motion was on February 5, 1927, denied, and their applications for probation were continued for hearing until March 12th, at which time said applications were also denied. Thereupon the court pronounced judgment, the sentence being imprisonment in the state prison.

At the commencement of the hearing of the motion counsel for appellants conceded in behalf of appellants (neither having testified at said hearing) that they understood the serious nature of the charge when they pleaded guilty thereto, and that they were mentally competent and fully realized the nature and effect of such pleas. At the time the motion was filed, however, appellants also filed a verified petition setting forth certain alleged facts in support of the motion, and it was therein alleged that they were led to believe by statements made to them by one of their attorneys on the morning the trial was to have commenced, and, by statements previously made to them "by various other persons," that irrespective of the question of their guilt they would be granted probation if they would plead guilty to one of the charges against them; that they "did not intend to plead guilty to any charge except for the beliefs induced in their minds that thereby and thereupon * * * they would receive prompt and definite probation and be freed of all further incarceration and difficulty for and in connection with any of the matters involved in any of the counts in said indictments"; but that since the making of said application for probation "it has developed that interested persons are opposing such application contrary to the belief induced in their minds and the assurances given them." Appellants' counsel stated in reply to an inquiry made by the court that the "various other persons" referred to by appellants in their verified petition were Detective Proll of the San Francisco police department and one MacCubbin, a special investigator for the insurance carrier for the bank, both having served as agents for the state of California to bring appellants back from London to San Francisco; afterwards the names of certain officers of the surety company were added to those mentioned.

All of the persons mentioned, however, including appellants' attorney, unqualifiedly denied ever having intimated to appellants or to either of them that they would be granted probation under any conditions. Their attorney declared that the suggestion that they plead guilty originated entirely with appellants and not with him; that when they first mentioned it he was opposed to their doing so, and that they were repeatedly advised by him that, if they did plead guilty, the matter of granting or refusing probation rested wholly with the court. Detective Proll testified that, although in response to the various inquiries made by appellants on the return trip to San Francisco he endeavored to explain the legal procedure necessary to be followed in applying for probation, he had never intimated that it was possible for them to obtain probation; MacCubbin testified substantially to the same effect, stating that he had made no statements whatever to appellants encouraging them to plead guilty, nor did he intimate that they would be released on probation if they did so plead; and the officers of the surety company filed affidavits likewise denying having made any such promises.

Appellants further averred in their verified petition that on the day their trial was to have commenced Leopold Blumen, as a result of jail confinement, "was sick and ill and has been continuously sick and ill and he was nervous and mentally and physically disturbed and unfit to make any determination; * * * that J. M. Blumen was also sick and mentally and physically distressed and particularly worried and concerned over his brother's illness. * * *" But it is evident from the shrewd manner in which the crimes were planned and executed, and the cleverness shown by appellants during their flight across America and through Europe in eluding the arresting officers and disposing of the stolen securities, that they are persons of keen intelligence, and therefore it may be fairly inferred that the condition of mind above described in which they claimed to have found themselves after being arrested and returned to San Francisco for trial was nothing more serious than would be expected to result naturally from a realization of the grave consequences with which they were confronted after having committed a theft involving $100,000 worth of property.

[2] Furthermore, in view of the evidence adduced at the hearing, the trial court was fully justified in believing that there was no reasonable doubt of appellants' guilt. So far as the record shows they did not deny the theft of the bonds, the only defense suggested by their counsel at the hearing being obviously a technical one. The evidence with respect to appellants' guilt shows that soon after Detective Proll arrived in London and after appellants had exhausted their remedies in the British courts to avoid extradition, appellants freely confessed their guilt, stating the details of how and where they had sold or otherwise disposed of the stolen bonds, some being converted in San Francisco, others in eastern states, in Canada, England, and on the continent, and the remainder, or the proceeds derived from the sale of them, being deposited by them in certain banks in Zurich and elsewhere. They also declared their intention to make restitution as far as possible, and in furtherance of such intention wrote letters authorizing the San Francisco bank's representative to take control of certain bank accounts standing in their names. Thereafter, on the return voyage across the Atlantic, appellants reduced their confessions to written form, setting forth in the beginning and at the conclusion thereof that the same were freely and voluntarily made. So far as the record discloses, the truth of the statements made in these various confessions has never been denied.

[3] The foregoing facts prove without dispute that when appellants entered their pleas of guilty they were neither laboring under mistake nor misunderstanding as to the effect of such pleas, nor under any misconception as to the nature of the charge, and they also fairly support the inference that said pleas were interposed for the purpose of speculating upon a chance of gaining probation, and that when the hope or expectation thereof appeared to be futile they sought to escape a term of imprisonment by withdrawing their pleas and standing trial before a jury on a technical defense. Under such circumstances it would seem to require no discussion to demonstrate that there is an entire lack of grounds upon which this court could justify a declaration that the trial court abused its discretion in denying appellants' motion. People v. Manriquez, supra; People v. Breshi, 44 Cal. App. 307, 186 P. 361; People v. Brown, 38 Cal. App. 46, 175

P. 85; People v. Junod (Cal. App.) 259 P. 101. As said in People v. Manriquez, supra:

"The fact that a defendant, knowing his rights and the consequences of his act, hoped or believed, or was led by his counsel, or others, to hope or believe that he would receive a milder punishment by pleading guilty than that which would fall to his lot after trial and conviction by a jury, presents no ground for the exercise of the discretion necessary to permit a plea of guilt to be withdrawn."

It is doubtless true that where, as in the case of People v. Schwarz (Cal. Sup.) 257 P. 71, it appears without conflict that a defendant has been induced to plead guilty by promises of immunity made directly to him by officials who are charged with the enforcement of the law, such as an authorized member of the grand jury and representatives of the district attorney's office, the trial court upon learning of such promises should allow the defendant to withdraw his plea and stand trial when it appears that such promises cannot be fulfilled. But there are no such circumstances here. Appellants admit that the representatives of the district attorney's office made no promises whatever and all of the other persons mentioned by appellants as having indicated the granting of probation have denied having done so. Even though, as appellants claim, the officials of the surety company had intimated that they would not oppose probation, such attitude on their part would not be controlling upon officials charged with the administration of the criminal laws.

[4, 5] Appellants contend in support of their appeal from the judgment that the second count was demurrable upon the ground that the stolen property was not described with sufficient certainty. We find no merit in the point. The property was described as "ten (10) Norsk 5½% Stats. Loan 1918 bonds of the value of $21,000 in gold coin of the United States of America." The Code provides that in an indictment for the larceny of valuable securities it is sufficient, if it be alleged and proved that the subject of the larceny was valuable securities without specifying and proving the particular number, denomination, or kind thereof. Sections 967 and 1131, Pen. Code. Furthermore, the law requires merely that a person charged with a criminal offense be informed in plain, intelligent language of the specific act he is alleged to have committed. Here the appellants apparently understood the identity of the bonds alleged to have been stolen with sufficient clearness to plead guilty to the charge.

[6, 7] Nor are we able to sustain appellants' final contention that they have been extradited on one charge and convicted of another in violation of treaty provisions existing between the governments of the United States and Great Britain. The record shows that the extradition proceedings were grounded upon the charge contained in the second count; and even assuming, as appellants contend, that the bonds therein described were of less value than the amount alleged, such variance as to value was immaterial in view of the fact that the same were otherwise correctly described. Moreover, appellants have doubtless waived all question of variance by pleading guilty to the charge.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NEW YORK INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.★
(Civ. 5737.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 23, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⇨375(2)—Injury to truck driver, driving own car to place of employment, held not to arise "in course of employment."

Injury to truck driver, while driving his own automobile to another city to report for work held not to arise in the course of his employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

2. Master and servant ⇨375(1)—Employee's injury is not compensable unless service rendered at time of injury grows out of and is incidental to employment.

For employee to be entitled to compensation, it is necessary not only that injury grow out of and be incidental to employment, but that service being rendered at time of injury should grow out of and be incidental to employment.

3. Master and servant ⇨375(2)—Accident occurring while employee is going to place of work does not occur "in course of employment."

Where accident causing injury to employee occurs while he is going to place of work and is doing no errand for his employer, it does not occur "in course of employment."

Proceeding to recover workmen's compensation by William E. Geiger, Jr., employee, opposed by the Lang Transportation Company, employer, and the New York Indemnity Company, insurer. To review an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission, the New York Indemnity Company petitions for certiorari. Award annulled.

E. Herbert Herlihy, of Los Angeles, and Howard W. Hamner, of Burbank, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission.

CONREY, P. J. [1] Respondent William E. Geiger, Jr., presented to the Industrial Accident Commission his application for an award of compensation for injuries received by him as an employee of Lang Transportation Company. An award was made against the insurance carrier, New York Indemnity Company, on whose petition the writ of review herein was issued.

Petitioner contends that the evidence did not justify the findings of fact, and that the commission acted in excess of its powers in this, that there is no evidence to sustain the finding that the applicant, Geiger, was injured while in the course of his employment.

The evidence bearing upon the issue thus presented may be summarized in a very few sentences. The Transportation Company as a part of its business owned a number of trucks, and in the use of these trucks employed truck drivers. The principal office was at Los Angeles. Prior to the 24th day of July, 1926, Mr. Geiger, although not in continuous employment of the Transportation Company, was on call there as an extra man to whom work was given, at a stated price per hour, on occasions when his services were needed. In July, 1926, the Transportation Company had several trucks in use under a contract for transportation of materials for the Associated Oil Company, at Oil Center, in Kern county. On July 23d, at Los Angeles, the manager of the Transportation Company, having learned that one of his drivers at Oil Center had given up his job, directed Geiger to report for work at Oil Center in order to take out a truck by 7 o'clock on the morning of July 24th. According to the testimony of Geiger, the manager Mr. Smith, at Los Angeles, on the afternoon of July 23d, gave Geiger a letter to Mr. Faust, superintendent of Associated Oil Company, at Oil Center, saying:

"Referring to your letter of July 19th, stating driver Honas had resigned, we are sending driver W. E. Geiger, who will take this vacancy."

Geiger testified that Mr. Smith did not say anything to him about the method he should employ in going from Los Angeles to Oil Center, other than that it did not matter how Geiger got there just so he was there at 7 o'clock. Acting under these instructions, Geiger left Los Angeles that night in his own automobile, and while driving northward, at a point about a mile from Newhall, his machine was hit by a truck trailer, so that Geiger was thrown out and received certain severe injuries.

[2, 3] We are of the opinion that the injuries received by the applicant in the described accident did not occur in the course of employment of said applicant. The right to an award is not alone founded upon the fact that the injury grew out of and was incidental to the employment, but also upon the fact that the service the employee is rendering at the time of the injury grows out of and is incidental to the employment. "For instance, it is the rule that an employee going to and from his place of employment is not rendering any service, and begins to render such service only when he arrives at the place of his employment, and proceeds to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his task." Cal. Cas. Indem. Exchange v. Indus. Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 433, 435, 213 P. 257, 258. We think that the present proceeding has not been brought within any of the exceptions to the rule last above stated. The employee was not making the trip at his employer's expense, nor on his employer's time. He was not even acting under his employer's direction, except in the sense that one goes to the employer's place of business or place where work is to be done. But until the employee begins or is ready to do something which is in the nature of a rendition of service to the employer, liability for compensation does not arise. The mere act of the employee in transporting himself to the place of work, when such transportation is unaccompanied by the performance of any other errand for the employer, does not establish a condition under which the happening of an accident can be said to occur in the course of the employment. Cal. Highway Com. v. Indus. Acc. Com., 61 Cal. App. 284, 214 P. 658; Eby v. Indus. Acc. Com., 75 Cal. App. 280, 242 P. 901.

The award is annulled.

HOWELL et al. v. SAN JOAQUIN LIGHT & POWER CORPORATION. (Civ. 3354.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Electricity ☞9(1)—Order of railroad commission as to elevation of heavy voltage power lines held to apply to subsisting lines.

Order of railroad commission, requiring power lines carrying heavy voltage to have specified minimum clearance, although having no retroactive effect, held to include all lines then subsisting as well as lines thereafter constructed.

2. Electricity ☞16(3)—Power company's failure to maintain high voltage line at elevation required by railroad commission's order held negligence per se.

Failure of power company to maintain its high voltage line with minimum clearance required by order of railroad commission held to constitute negligence per se.

3. Electricity ☞19(8)—Negligence of power company in maintenance of high voltage, un-insulated wire only 19 feet above ground held question for jury.

Maintenance by power company of high voltage, uninsulated power line over agricultural lands at an elevation of only approximately 19 feet held to make question of its negligence, in death of one electrocuted when portion of pipe line which he was removing came in contact with wire, one for jury.

4. Electricity ☞19(12)—Contributory negligence of one electrocuted when pipe came in contact with uninsulated high voltage wire held for jury.

In action for death of one electrocuted when portion of pipe line which he was removing came in contact with uninsulated high voltage power line, contributory negligence of deceased held for jury.

5. Appeal and error ☞1170(9)—Instruction as to knowledge of power company of custom of standing water pipes on end in community where power line was maintained, though in-applicable, held harmless (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action for death of one electrocuted on contact of portion of water pipe line with uninsulated, high voltage power line running over agricultural land, instruction, as to knowledge of power company of common practice of persons laying pipe lines to stand them upon end for purpose of cleaning, although inapplicable, held harmless, and not to have resulted in miscarriage of justice, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

6. Electricity ☞14(2)—Power company must keep high voltage lines over agricultural land in safe manner by constant oversight and repair.

Power company maintaining high voltage power lines over agricultural land must use due care and caution to keep such power lines in safe, substantial manner by constant oversight and repair.

7. Trial ☞250, 261—Instructions which were inapplicable or incorrectly stated law were properly refused.

Instructions requested by defendant which were either inapplicable or contained incorrect statements of the law were properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Ruth L. Howell and another against the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Conley and Carl E. Lindsay, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This action is prosecuted by Ruth L. Howell as the surviving widow and Eldon B. Howell as the surviving son of J. B. Howell, deceased, whose death is alleged to have been caused through the negligence of the defendant in maintaining an uninsulated highly charged electric wire in too close proximity to the ground on which the deceased was working at the time he met his death.

The record shows that in May, 1920, the defendant erected a power line in the agricultural section of Tulare county over a certain alfalfa field owned by one S. H. Ginder. All the premises involved in this section are agricultural in character and are located about 11 miles southwest of the city of Tulare, in the county of Tulare. The complaint sets forth, and the evidence supports, the following facts: That prior to the 6th day of November, 1922, the appellant had constructed, and on that day was maintaining, a power line, the wires of which were uninsulated and were carrying approximately 13,000 volts of electricity; that the main line of said company ran along the line of a county road; that the line involved in this action was run from the main power line to a pumping plant over an alfalfa field approximately 200 feet from a certain right-angle turn in the line running from the main line; that at the point where said line turned at right angles, it was supported by a pole which at the time of its construction was held in a perpendicular position, and the power line to said pumping plant was held taut and at a fixed distance from the ground by means of a guy wire extending from the top of the pole to the ground, and which said guy wire was held taut by means of a strut extending from the said pole to said guy wire; that prior to the 6th day of November, 1922, the strut had fallen from its place above mentioned, and, in so doing, allowed the pole to be drawn over by the wire, and that the pole on which said wire was suspended, after the falling out of said strut, had leaned over to such an extent that the power line was permitted to sag and come nearer to the ground than originally constructed; that the line in question, at the time of the accident, was only 19 feet and 3 inches from the surface of the ground; that on the 1st day of May, 1922, the railroad commission, by its general order No. 64, had ordered that all construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of overhead electrical supply and signal lines, including power lines, should have a vertical clearance above the ground along streets, roads, highways, and alleys, in rural districts and across areas capable of agricultural development, of at least 25 feet, where such lines carried an electrical energy of 750 volts, up to and including 17,000 volts. It is further alleged in the complaint that the defendant negligently allowed the strut which supported the pole, to which we have herein referred, in an upright position, to remain out of place and the pole unsupported, and also allowed the supply wire to carelessly and negligently drop lower to the ground than it was when originally constructed. The testimony is to the effect that when originally constructed the wire had a clearance of approximately 23 feet. On the 6th day of November, 1922, the deceased, J. B. Howell, who prior to that time had been residing on a dairy ranch about four miles from the premises involved in this action, went to the Ginder place and to the alfalfa field where he met his death for the purpose of taking up and relaying a certain pipe line to be used in conveying water from a water tank on the Ginder place to an adjoining pasture upon which the deceased and Ginder had cattle grazing; that the deceased went to work upon said premises at the hour of about 9 o'clock a. m. in taking up and relaying the pipe line just referred to, and that on the same day, between the hours of 1 and 2 p. m., the deceased took up a section of the pipe line 20 feet and 6 inches in length immediately beneath the power line herein mentioned; that in taking up the different sections of the pipe line referred to, the deceased and the witness Ginder had raised each section perpendicularly, jounced the same up and down upon a board for the purpose of removing all rust or obstruction that might be within the section of the pipe line being taken up and relaid; that in taking up the 20-foot section just referred to the deceased in some manner raised it up perpendicularly for the purpose of removing the rust therefrom, in the manner just indicated, and by some means the pipe line was brought in contact with the uninsulated power wire, and electrocution immediately followed. It further appears from the testimony that on the day that the said J. B. Howell was electrocuted, an employee of the defendant, at the request of Mr. Ginder, had gone to the Ginder ranch to replace a burned-out fuse on the transformer situated on a pole near the pumping plant operated on the Ginder premises.

This witness testified that he saw Mr. Howell at work and called to him to be careful in the handling of the water pipe. The testimony does not show that the deceased heard this warning, although the witness testified that at the time Howell was distant from him only about 75 feet. On this point there is contradictory testimony, however, as the witness Ginder testified that at the time the employee of the defendant was at work replacing a burned-out fuse on the transformer, Howell was distant some 300 or 400 yards. On the part of the defendant it is claimed that the deceased was familiar with the premises. The contrary is maintained by the respondents. The testimony as set forth in the transcript simply shows that the deceased went to the alfalfa field, where he met his death, about 9 o'clock a. m. on November 6, 1922. So far as the record is concerned, there is not a word of testimony showing that the deceased knew anything about the power line, its location, that he had ever seen it, or that he had ever been there preceding the day of his death. The evidence also further shows, without any substantial conflict, that the strut in question which supported the pole where the power line made the right-angle turn had been out of place for a period of at least two weeks preceding the 6th day of November, and was out of place on the day that the employee of the company was there replacing the burned-out fuse. There is no substantial conflict in the testimony that the wire had also been allowed to droop by reason of the leaning of the pole from its original height of about 23 feet to an elevation above the surface of only 19 feet and 3 inches. Among other witnesses placed upon the witness stand by the plaintiff was one Carl H. Holley, a consulting engineer, who testified that he had had 23 years' experience in the construction of electrical power plants and systems; that he had had experience with the Yuba Power Company at Marysville, was construction engineer for the Bay Counties Power Company at Colgate, was superintendent and engineer for the Mount Whitney Power Company, and later superintendent and engineer for the Tulare Power Company. This witness testified that power lines over lands or fields capable of agricultural development carrying 11,000 volts of electricity should be at least 25 feet in elevation above the surface, and that a greater distance was desirable. This witness gave the height of the line in question, at the time of his measurement shortly after the accident, as 19 feet 2½ inches above the ground, and that the line had been allowed to sag at least 4 feet on account of the leaning over of the pole from which the strut or brace had become misplaced. The strut was a piece of timber 4x4 originally fastened to the post at one end and the other against the guy wire holding the pole at the right-angle turn in an upright position in such a way as to hold the guy wire taut. When this strut fell from its position the guy wire consequently hung loose and no longer supported the pole in its original position. Over the objection of the defendant the plaintiffs were allowed to introduce in evidence a duly certified copy of general order No. 64 of the railroad commission of the state of California relative to the construction, reconstruction and maintenance of overhead power lines. The finding and order of the railroad commission, as introduced in evidence, is as follows:

"An investigation having been instituted on the commission's own motion as to the reasonableness of certain proposed uniform standards of overhead line construction, a hearing having been held, and the matter submitted and ready for decision:

"The railroad commission of the state of California hereby finds as a fact that the proposed rules and regulations for overhead line construction as modified and set forth in this commission's general order No. 64, are reasonable and just, and that compliance with the same will result in improved service and greater safety.

"Basing its order on the above finding of fact: It is hereby ordered that:

"(1) All construction, reconstruction and maintenance of overhead electrical supply and signal lines coming within the jurisdiction of this commission, done on and after July 1, 1922, shall conform to the rules of overhead electric line construction prescribed by the railroad commission of the state of California in its general order No. 64.

"(2) General order No. 64 is hereby approved and ordered effective July 1, 1922.

"The foregoing opinion and order are hereby approved and ordered filed as the opinion and order of the railroad commission of the state of California.

"Dated at San Francisco, California, this 1st day of May, 1922.

H. W. Brundige,
"H. D. Loveland,
"Irving Martin,
"Chester H. Rowell,
"H. S. Benedict,
"Commissioners."

In connection with the foregoing there was read in evidence a table referred to in order No. 64, as follows:

"Table 1, case No. 4, Vertical Clearance above the ground of wires along streets, roads, highways or alleys in rural districts or across areas capable of agricultural development, supply lines, 750-17,000 volts, 25 feet."

At the conclusion of plaintiffs' testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the testimony showed no negligence on the part of the defendant, and also on the ground that, assuming negligence on the part of the defendant, the testimony established contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. This motion was denied, as, likewise, the motion for a directed verdict.

[1-3] The jury found in favor of the plaintiffs, and upon this appeal it is insisted that there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and that the order of the railroad commission relative to the construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of power lines carrying an energy of between 750 and 17,000 volts had no application to the line in question, although it carried an energy of 11,000 volts, for the reason that the defendant's line was constructed in 1920, and so antedated the order of the railroad commission for a considerable period of time. It is further urged in this particular that the order of the railroad commission refers only to lines that should be constructed and reconstructed after July 1, 1922, and does not refer to or affect the maintenance of lines which were constructed and in operation prior to the 1st day of July, 1922. The general order in question was dated May 1, 1922; it became effective on July 1, 1922, 60 days after its promulgation. The electrocution of the deceased occurred on the 6th day of November, 1922, a little over six months after the promulgation of the order. There is no contention made upon this appeal that a sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the defendant to comply with the order of the railroad commission relative to the clearance of power wires carrying a voltage equal to that carried by the line under consideration. The contention is simply that the order of the railroad commission did not require any elevation of that line, and that the defendant could, in accordance with the order of the commission, continue to maintain said line at the elevation disclosed by the testimony in this case. It is urged that the order of the railroad commission had no retroactive effect, and a number of cases are cited by the appellant holding that acts of the Legislature are not to be given a retroactive effect unless the plain import of the language used necessitates such holding. We agree with the appellant in this contention, that the order of the railroad commission did not have any retroactive effect and was not intended to have any retroactive effect, but we differ from the construction placed upon the order of the railroad commission by the defendant after July 1, 1922, in that we think the order plainly and directly applies to the maintenance of power lines and supply lines carrying the heavy voltage referred to in the order and that on and after July 1, 1922, the maintenance by the defendant of the power line carrying 11,000 voltage with a clearance of a trifle over 19 feet was in direct disregard of the order of the railroad commission. By the order of the railroad commission the defendant was allowed 60 days within which to elevate its line, and a period of a little over four months additional expired, with nothing having been done by the defendant to comply with the order of the commission relative to the maintenance of its line. The very word "maintenance" applies as directly to line already constructed as to one that was thereafter to be constructed or reconstructed. It certainly cannot be reasoned that the railroad commission, after finding, upon investigation, that safety required such heavily charged power lines to have a clearance of 25 feet, that it would then proceed to promulgate an order which required such a clearance only of lines thereafter to be constructed, and how they should be maintained after construction in order to insure safety, and then provide that lines already constructed, having a clearance of 6 feet below the point of safety, might lawfully be maintained. Such a construction leads to the absurdity that a power company across one field might, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the railroad commission, maintain a highly charged power line several feet below the line of clearance, which would be unlawful if constructed and maintained across an adjoining field on and after July 1, 1922. Ordinary safety and protection of life and property seems to us to demand that the general order of the railroad commission as to the maintenance of power lines so highly charged should apply to all lines maintained so highly charged after the 1st day of July, 1922. The word "maintenance" cannot be eliminated from the order, nor can it be held that the word "maintenance" applies to one line and not to another without convicting the railroad commission of the absurdity of providing that an instrumentality dangerous in its character could not and should not be lawfully maintained over one field of alfalfa less than with a minimum clearance of 25 feet, while at the same time concluding that such an instrumentality, equally dangerous to life and property, might lawfully be maintained over another field with a clearance of only 19 feet. If reasonable safety requires a clearance of 25 feet over one particular agricultural tract of land, it certainly requires the same clearance over the agricultural tracts of land. That the railroad commission had the power to make the order in question appears not to be controverted. We may, however, add that it has such power, and this is clearly shown by the authorities set forth supporting the text in 37 Cyc. p. 1636, where the subject of the change, location, etc., of electric wires, is considered. That the word "maintenance," in relation to the future operation and control of electric power lines, as mentioned in order No. 64 of the railroad commission, applied directly to the line maintained by the defendant as well as to lines that should be subsequently constructed, has, in principle, been directly decided in this court in the case of Morris v. Sierra & San Francisco Power Co., 57 Cal. App. 281, 207 P. 262. The court in that case, considering the powers of the railroad commission as conferred by sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution and the legislation had in pursuance thereof, was dealing with two wires, both of which were constructed prior to the order of the railroad commission, then and there involved. Order No. 26 of the railroad commission, among other things, provided that there should be at least a clearance of two feet between wires; that this order applied to both the plaintiff and the defendant in that case. The order became effective January 1, 1913. Neither one of the parties to that action took any steps to so adjust their lines as to give the clearance required by the order of the commission. This court held, speaking through Justice Hart, that such failure was "obviously a violation of order No. 26 above referred to prescribing the minimum clearance between telegraph and telephone wires where the same cross each other," etc. It was held in that case that, admitting the negligence of the defendant in not changing its wires to conform to the order of the railroad commission, the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence in not so reconstructing and maintaining, after January 1, 1913, the line owned by him so as to give the requisite clearance.

The order referred to, which became effective as herein stated, and known as general order No. 26, so far as applicable here, reads as follows:

"Telegraph, telephone and signal lines at crossings with other telegraph, telephone or signal lines shall have a minimum clearance above or below such lines of two feet, unless suitably supported to prevent contact."

A hearing by the Supreme Court in that case was denied, and we think the reasoning set forth in the opinion of Morris v. Sierra, etc., Power Co., supra, is conclusive here, and definitely decides that an order of the railroad commission, specifying that highly charged power lines, in areas such as that involved here, shall have a minimum clearance of at least 25 feet, and were to be so maintained on and after July 1, 1922, and included all lines then subsisting, as well as lines that should thereafter be constructed in like territory. Likewise, as held in the case of Morris v. Sierra, etc., Co., supra, and as also held in the case of Sickles v. Mt. Whitney Power & Electric Co., 177 Cal. 278, 170 P. 599, the failure of the power company to maintain its line carrying 11,000 voltage with a minimum clearance of 25 feet, as provided by the order of the railroad commission, and its disregard of the order of the railroad commission in this respect, must be held as showing negligence per se on the part of the defendant. Under the constitutional provision to which we have referred, and the acts of the Legislature passed in pursuance thereof, the order of the railroad commission relative to the lawful manner in which certain power lines could be maintained became obligatory upon the defendant, and this duty appears to have been disregarded by the defendant for a number of months, on the theory that it was not a binding order upon the defendant and did not require the defendant to elevate its line so as to give the clearance found necessary for safety by the railroad commission. The evidence shows conclusively that had the line in question been maintained with a clearance equal to that specified in general order No. 64 of the railroad commission, the deceased would not have been electrocuted. The pipe which the deceased had in his hand was 20 feet 4 inches in length. The mark upon the pipe, as testified to by witnesses, where it came in contact with the electric wire, was about 16 or 18 inches from one end thereof, showing clearly that if the wire had been maintained with a clearance of 25 feet, no fatality would have followed. The wire in question was uninsulated. It was maintained, as we have shown, at an elevation of only 19 feet and 3 inches, and irrespective of the order of the railroad commission requiring a clearance of at least 25 feet, the question of maintaining an uninsulated wire so close to the ground over agricultural lands where farmers, workmen, dairymen, and others who might lawfully go there and the agricultural implements which they might use, including water pipe and other instrumentalities which the farmers of that section were accustomed to use and employ and where contact with the unprotected wire might readily be made, presented a question of fact as to the negligence of the defendant, to be submitted to the jury.

[4] The appellant further argues that, even though admitting the negligence as alleged in the complaint, the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence and therefore no recovery can be had. No person witnessed the accident. What occurred can only be gathered from the surrounding circumstances. There is nothing in the testimony to show that the deceased had or did not have knowledge of the current being carried by the wire on the 6th day of November, 1922. So far as the testimony shows, it indicates that the deceased went upon the alfalfa field in question for the first time on the day that he met his death. Again, there is nothing indicating that the iron pipe, when held in the hands of the deceased, was or was not blown against the electric wire without any fault on his part.

As bearing upon the question of the deceased's alleged contributory negligence, we think the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Giraudi v. Electric Improvement Co., 107 Cal. 120, 40 P. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114, applicable. That case involved the question of negligence of the injured person going upon the roof of a building and coming in contact with an electric wire, and the court said:

"Even had he observed the wires during his short visit to the roof it would be a question for the jury to say whether it was the want of ordinary care for him not to have it in mind on that occasion. It is said that, if one was aware of a fact which should have put him upon his guard, he cannot rebut the presumption of contributory negligence by showing that he momentarily forgot it. This is true as a general proposition, but, like all other rules upon this subject, it must have a reasonable construction. To forget is not negligence, unless it shows the want of ordinary care, and it is a question for the jury. Illustrations of this proposition are found in the cases of brakemen who are injured by obstructions over or near the track of the road. They have been allowed to recover, although it is shown that they knew of the obstruction, on the ground that they cannot be expected to retain, at all times, a complete outline of the track, and because, in the hurry of their work, they would not be likely to keep these things in mind. That is, to forget under the circumstances, did not prove absence of ordinary care"—citing Dorsey v. Phillips Co., 42 Wis. 583.

The case of Andrews v. Valley Ice Co., 167 Cal. 12, 138 P. 699, cited by the appellant upon the question which we are considering, differs from the case at bar because the deceased in that case was not in the course of his employment, and had been directly and specifically warned not to go to the place where he was injured. The deceased in the case at bar was where he had a right to be, and where the work that he was performing necessitated his being.

Again, in the case of Shade v. Bay Counties Power Co., 152 Cal. 10, 92 P. 62, relied upon by the appellant, where it is said that "in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been the result of the negligence of the defendant in which the defense of contributory negligence is interposed, if the facts are clear and undisputed, and no other inference than that of contributory negligence can be drawn from them, the court is not required to submit that question to the jury, but may itself make the inference," the facts show that the plaintiff, on a public road, discovered an electric wire hanging down to within a few feet of the ground; that as he approached the wire he was cautioned by a witness in the following language: "Don't touch the wire, Chester, whatever you do"—and the deceased replied: "There's no danger of my doing that; I wouldn't think of doing that." Nevertheless, the deceased took a short cord, threw it over the wire, and in drawing the wire to one side came in contact with it and received a fatal shock. Even in that case there was a very strong dissenting opinion on whether the question of contributory negligence should or should not have been submitted to the jury. Ordinarily, the language of the court in Williams v. Pacific Electric Co., 177 Cal. 235, 170 P. 423, applies. It is there said:

"The question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury to solve under proper instructions, * * * save in those cases in which, judged in the light of common knowledge and experience, there is a standard of prudence to which all persons similarly situated must conform."

And as said in section 141, 19 California Jurisprudence, p. 735:

"Where contributory negligence is set up as a defense, it seldom happens that the question is so clear from doubt that the court can undertake to say, as a matter of law, how the jury shall find upon the issue. As, with the negligence of the defendant, the question of contributory negligence of the plaintiff is ordinarily one of fact for the jury"—citing many authorities.

Under the facts of this case we think the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury and not for the court, and that the finding of the jury thereon, adversely to appellant, as must necessarily be concluded from the verdict, is conclusive upon this appeal.

[5] It is finally urged that the court erred in its instructions given to the jury and in denying certain instructions requested by the appellant. Following the case of Fair- bairn v. American River Electric Co., 179 Cal. 157, 175 P. 637, the trial court, at the request of the plaintiff, gave the following instruction:

"If you find from the evidence that it was a common practice in the community where defendant was maintaining the power line involved in this action of persons laying pipe lines and in laying pipes of standard lengths to stand them upon end for the purpose of cleaning them before laying, then you are instructed that it was the duty of defendant to have ascertained such fact and to have maintained its wires across lands capable of agricultural development and where such pipe lines were likely to be laid, at such height that there was no likelihood that such pipes would come in contact with its power lines, and if you find that defendant failed in this case to maintain the power line in question according to this requirement, defendant is guilty of negligence and you should so find."

This instruction we think inapplicable. The circumstances here disclose no visible objects such as were frequently in evidence in the territory where the American River Electric Company was maintaining its power lines and which was involved in the case just cited. Water pipes, as shown by the testimony, are taken up only at infrequent intervals. They are not objects visible to any one visiting the premises in question, nor were there agricultural implements visible, like hay derricks, which are necessarily moved about from place to place where hay is being raised, baled or stacked. The circumstances are not like maintaining a power line across either a public or a private highway where hay derricks were being moved from field to field. There is no showing in the testimony that water pipes had ever before been laid under electric power lines. The fact that some of the witnesses testified that it was the usual practice, in removing the rust from sections of water pipe, to stand the same on end, does not bring the situation within the principle involved in the Fairbairn Case. The Fairbairn Case involved the transportation of large, visible objects, of which any one may reasonably be said to have knowledge, and to take notice. However, we do not think that the jury was misled by the instruction under consideration, and that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution applies. The wire in question, as we have seen, was not maintained in accordance with general order No. 64 of the railroad commission, and was maintained uninsulated with a clearance of 19 feet 3 inches, which was only a trifle more than the length of an ordinary fence board, so that the jury was given ample ground for concluding that the wire was being maintained in a negligent manner, irrespective of whether the company knew anything about the custom of dairymen, when changing pipe lines, to stand the different sections on end. The wire was so low that contact might be made therewith with many different instrumentalities used on farming lands, so that the instruction objected to, even though inapplicable, was absolutely harmless. Nor did the trial court err in giving plaintiff's requested instruction No. 22, which reads:

"If the defendant failed to comply with the order of the railroad commission of the state of California relative to the maintenance of the power line in question, such fact is prima facie evidence of negligence, and if you believe from the evidence that a failure to comply with said order was the direct and proximate cause of the death of J. B. Howell, and that such death was caused without fault on his part, you are instructed to return a verdict for the plaintiffs."

The authorities which we have cited show that failure to comply with the orders of the railroad commission in the construction and maintenance of the electric power lines is negligence per se, and therefore makes out a prima facie case.

[6] Complaint is likewise made of the giving of plaintiff's requested instruction No. 14, which reads:

"You are instructed that it is the duty of the defendant corporation, after the construction of its power line leading to the pumping-plant on the Ginder premises, to use due care and caution to keep said power line in a safe, substantial manner by constant oversight and repair."

It is sufficient to say that this instruction was approved in Robinson v. Western, etc., Co., 184 Cal. 401, 194 P. 39, and is substantially the same as the instruction approved by this court in the case of Tackett v. Henderson Bros. Co., 12 Cal. App. 658, 108 P. 151.

[7] The instructions, as a whole, given by the court, clearly and fairly presented to the jury all the issues involved in this case. As to the instructions requested by the defendant and refused by the court, an examination shows that they are either inapplicable or contain incorrect statements of the law. Thus, in instruction A, as so designated in appellant's brief, the question of the negligence of the defendant relative to supporting the pole in a perpendicular position, which had leaned over and allowed the wire to sag, is made to rest upon knowledge acquired by the defendant of the leaning posture of the pole, and omits all reference to the duty of the company to properly inspect its wires to ascertain if they are in a safe condition. Instruction B is a modified form of the instruction condemned in the case of Foley v. Northern Power Co., 14 Cal. App. 401, 112 P. 467. Instruction labeled C is based upon the case of Andrews v. Valley Ice Co., 167 Cal. 11, 138 P. 699, where the facts were different, and therefore, even if applicable in that case, is inapplicable here, because of the want of testimony upon which to base such an instruction.

It would serve no useful purpose to summarize the various requested instructions refused by the trial court, and we content ourselves with the statement that those not referred to specifically herein have been examined, and no error in their refusal has been called to our attention. We may say, however, that several of them were requests that the jury should be instructed that no negligence had been shown on the part of the defendant, that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was established, and requests for a directed verdict.

Finding no error justifying a reversal herein, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MELLODY. (Cr. 1405.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 6, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 485(2)—Testimony of professional alienist on hypothetical questions that defendant was sane when committing robbery some two years previous held admissible.

In prosecution for robbery, testimony of professional alienist in response to certain hypothetical questions held admissible to prove fact that at time crime was committed some two years previously defendant was sane, since circumstances under which crime was committed would indicate to a trained mind whether perpetrator was conscious of wrongful nature of act committed.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 740—Legal responsibility of accused at time of committing robbery is question of fact for jury.

Question of whether defendant was legally responsible at time of commission of robbery constitutes a question of fact for the jury to determine.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 938(1), 1156(3)—Motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence is addressed to court's discretion, and ruling will not be disturbed but for abuse.

Motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence as to mental condition of defendant is addressed to sound discretion of trial court, and ruling thereon will not be disturbed, in absence of abuse of such discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. N. Rector, Judge.

William Melody was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Lomasney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. [1-3] Appellant was, with others, charged by indictment with the crime of robbery, alleged to have been committed on or about the 2d day of March, 1925. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to the state prison at San Quentin. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this is an appeal from the order and judgment. Briefly the evidence shows that defendant entered the office of one Dr. Koenigsstein, struck him on the jaw, and, by putting him in fear through the display of a revolver, robbed him of his watch, valued at $250, a diamond ring valued at $1,200, a diamond pin valued at $325, and $45 in cash. After being relieved of his property, the doctor was thrown to the floor, his hands and legs were tied, and he was gagged and left there, being threatened with death if he moved. A short time after the commission of this offense appellant was committed to a detention hospital for the purpose of being examined as to his sanity and later was committed to the state hospital at Stockton, from which institution he escaped. At the trial Dr. Catton, a professional alienist, was called as a witness both on behalf of the defense and the prosecution. He testified he had examined the defendant and that he was sane at the time of his trial. He further testified he had not examined defendant at the time of the commission of the offense, which was almost two years prior thereto. He had, however, made a thorough examination of the case. He had interviewed the defendant and became familiar with the history of his life and his various ailments. Certain hypothetical questions, which included the mode and manner in which the crime was committed, were addressed to this witness, and in response thereto he gave it as his opinion that defendant was sane at the time he committed the offense. It is here claimed that this evidence was inadmissible to prove this fact. We do not think so. The circumstances under which the crime was committed would indicate to a trained mind whether the perpetrator was conscious of the wrongful nature of the act committed. Whether accused was legally responsible at the time he committed the act was a question of fact for the jury to determine as was also the weight of the evidence. People v. Sloper, 198 Cal. 238, 244 P. 362. The further point is urged that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The motion was based upon newly discovered evidence as to the mental condition of defendant at the time of his arrest. Such motions are addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and, in the absence of abuse the determination of the trial court, will not here be disturbed. People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 P. 1100.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Albert E. Hill, administrator, against the Waiting Mining Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward R. Eliassen and Walter H. Eliassen, both of Oakland, for appellant.

R. H. Chamberlain, Jr., of Oakland, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to obtain a decree quieting title to real estate. The defendants appeared and answered. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendants, and from a judgment based thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

On September 5, 1907, Albert J. Caswell and wife, as the owners, and C. M. Jensen and Angus Matheson executed a writing by which the owners granted "the parties of the second part permission to work for minerals" on the land in suit. It was further provided:

"First. If said parties of the second part succeeded in getting minerals in paying quantities, the parties of the first part will give said parties of the second part a one-half interest in 10 acres of above-described property, as an inlet to the vein and all profits shall be divided one-half to parties of the first part and one-half to parties of the second part after all expenses have been paid, one-half by parties of the first part and one-half by parties of the second part. Second. If said parties of the second part do not get the mineral in paying quantities, all expenses shall be paid by said parties of the second part without any cost whatsoever to said parties of the first part, and this agreement shall become null and void."

The record does not disclose that Jensen and Matheson at any time succeeded "in getting mineral in paying quantities." Without any further consideration, on June 21, 1920, A. J. Caswell, C. M. Jensen, and Angus Matheson executed a writing, hereinafter called the second agreement, which recites that it is in lieu of the first agreement.

[1] On July 1, 1920, the parties of the second part assigned the second agreement to the Waiting Mining Company. The shaft hereinafter mentioned was sunk, but no further proceedings were had under said assignment except as will presently be noted. On December 15, 1921, the stockholders of that company, as a body of stockholders, made a purported assignment of the second agreement to the Los Gatos Lime Company. No document of any kind purporting to be the indenture of the Waiting Mining Company was executed. The purported assignment by the stockholders had no legal significance. Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 19, 20, 91 Am. Dec. 607; Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 369, 376, 377, 224 P. 455. Therefore the Los Gatos Lime Company took nothing, and no judgment should have been rendered in its favor.

[2] Jensen and Matheson had assigned to the Waiting Mining Company and had parted with all of their rights and were no longer interested parties in this litigation. Therefore no judgment should have been rendered in their favor. The Waiting Mining Company received its assignment July 1, 1920, but it has never agreed to be bound by the burdens of it.

By the terms of the second agreement the parties agreed to form a corporation having a capital of $50,000 divided into 50,000 shares of $1 each; the owner agrees (1) to sell for 5,000 of those shares all minerals of every kind contained in the owner's land; (2) to grant conveyances of rights of way for roads of ingress and egress to said minerals; (3) to grant all timber for domestic and mining purposes; (4) to grant all water so required; and (5) to grant the surface use of 5 acres centered around each shaft so long as mining thereat continues or so long as the operators may desire and require the same for mining operations; and the second parties agree to begin the mining operations as soon as practicable.

There is some evidence that the stock was issued, but a conveyance was not executed because there was some work to be done by the grantees which had not been done. There is no evidence that such work was done before this action was commenced. Finally, if that company wants a conveyance there are no facts in the record from which the terms of that conveyance can be ascertained. The decedent owned a quarter section. It is clear that the entire tract was not mineral land in the technical meaning of that term. There is absolutely no evidence as to what portion was mineral land. There is evidence that an 80-foot shaft has been sunk, but no evidence as to where it is. There is no evidence where the rights of way were to commence, where they were to end, or what lands they were to pass over. There is no evidence at what place water was to be taken or in what manner or quantity. There is no evidence as to the shape, or boundaries, or of the location of the 5-acre tract, or tracts, or how many of those tracts there were to be. The evidence shows that the grantees or assigns were to prospect. If successful, they were to mine and they were to continue the mining as long as minerals could be mined at a profit. But, if minerals could not be mined at a profit, the evidence is without conflict that the "agreement shall become null and void." The grantees were to commence operations "as soon as practicable," but the record is wholly silent as to the term of years within which they should perform the contract.

[3] Among the points made by the plaintiff he asserts that the terms of the alleged agreement held by the defendants are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable. That the rule contended for obtains in this state is settled beyond dispute. Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6; Morrison v. Rossignol, 5 Cal. 64; Minturn v. Baylis, 33 Cal. 129, 133; Co-operative Assn. v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539, 546; Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 21 P. 179; Talmadge v. Arrowhead Reservoir Co., 101 Cal. 367, 35 P. 1000; Beal v. United Properties Co., 46 Cal. App. 287, 293, 189 P. 346. When all the evidence tending to establish such contract leaves the terms thereof in doubt, it cannot be specifically enforced, and where, on appeal, giving full credit and weight to all evidence affirmatively tending to establish such agreement, disregarding all conflicting evidence, it appears that the terms of such agreement are not clearly ascertainable, then the action of the trial court enforcing such uncertain agreement may be reversed. De

Kahn v. Chase, 177 Cal. 281, 283, 170 P. 608. Applying the foregoing rules to the facts which we have recited, it is patent that plaintiff's decedent agreed to execute a conveyance of some kind, but not a deed. Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara, 155 Cal. 140, 144, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. But the terms of the conveyance and the general nature of the conveyance were such that the most the court can do is to say they rest in conjecture.

[4] The plaintiff also makes the point that the agreement was an agreement to prospect and in that behalf to render personal service. Thereupon the plaintiff contends that such an agreement will not be specifically enforced. He cites and relies on Civil Code, § 3390, subd. 2; Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Occidental Oil Co., 144 Cal. 528, 78 P. 25; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 403; Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 28, 43 Am. Rep. 239; Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93. The authorities clearly support the contention.

The judgment is reversed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. BARTH INV. CORPORATION et al. (L. A. 8925.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1928.

1. Mechanics' liens $\S$ 290(5)—Finding that building was completed before June 1, held in conflict with finding that electrical work required to obtain inspector's certificate was finished on June 17 following (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 1183-1199).

In action by materialman to foreclose mechanic's lien, in which no notice of completion of building was filed by owner under Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 1183-1199, finding that building was completed prior to June 1, 1922, and that electrical work in building was finished on June

SEAWELL, J. The court below gave a default judgment for the plaintiff, Hammond Lumber Company, a corporation, against defendants Barth Investment Corporation, Isaac Barth, and A. Barth for $3,041.59, the contract price of building materials furnished and labor performed by plaintiff in connection with the construction of a building on premises situate in the city of Los Angeles and owned by defendant Claus Due, but denied the prayer of plaintiff's complaint that it be adjudged to have a lien upon the said building for said contract price, by virtue of having furnished said materials and labor, and that the court direct the foreclosure of said lien as by law provided. From that portion of the judgment decreeing that plaintiff was without a right of lien, it appeals on the judgment roll alone. The sole question involved is whether plaintiff has lost its right to assert a lien by reason of a failure to file its claim of lien within the 90-day period following the completion of the building, which is allowed in cases where the owner fails to file a notice of completion as required by the law relating to mechanics' and materialmen's liens. Sections 1183-1199, Code Civ. Proc.

[1] All of the facts involved in the case, both ultimate and probative, are set forth in the findings, which are in irreconcilable conflict. By finding VI the court found:

"That it is true that said building or structure was completed prior to June 1, 1922; that prior to said June 1, 1922, said defendant Claus Due took possession of said building or structure and of said premises, and occupied the same, and ever since has continued to occupy the same; that no notice of completion of said building or structure has been filed of record."

By finding VIIa the court found:

That the electrical work, which was included in the building contract and described by the plans and specifications, was done or performed in May and June, and "was finished on the 17th day of June, 1922."

The probative facts found therein, as to the necessity of the completion of the electrical work in order to conform with the building plans and specifications and to meet the requirements of the ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, are fully set forth. It is apparent that these facts do not support the ultimate findings that the building was finished or completed prior to June 1, or that the incompleting work may be classified as a trivial imperfection. Finding VIIa follows:

"That* the electrical work in said building was originally subcontracted to one Roscoe A. Coffman, but the said subcontractor Coffman installed said work improperly and some time in May, 1922, ceased labor upon said electrical work, and left the same in a partially unfinished condition, and thereafter the contractors, acting by and through Isaac Barth, employed one Everett Ingraham, an electrical contractor, to complete said work in a proper manner. The said Ingraham, while said owner was in the use, occupation, and possession of said structure, did 95 hours' work upon said Due building, to correct and complete said electrical work in accord with the plans and specifications and the requirements of the city ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, at a reasonable cost of $193.50; that said work was all done in May and June, 1922, and was necessary to correct and complete the work in accord with the plans and specifications; that said work consisted generally of putting in more and heavier wires, and drawing out wires not heavy enough to carry the load, and putting in necessary materials to correct and complete said work; that said work done by the said Ingraham was finished on the 17th day of June, 1922; that, without the work done by said Ingraham, the city electrician's office of the city of Los Angeles refused to accept said work and furnish a final inspector's certificate; that said acceptance by the city and final certificate of acceptance was not issued by the city until after the 17th day of August, 1922. The original contract for the construction of said building contained the following: 'All work to be installed in accordance with city ordinances, furnishing electrical inspector's certificate before work will be accepted.' The city permit granted to said subcontractor Ingraham to do this work was dated and issued on the 5th day of June, 1922. The court finds that the above work constituted a trivial imperfection; that the contract cost of construction of said flat was $13,500, and the original contract cost for the installation of the electrical work was approximately $357."

[2, 3] The findings above set forth dispose of all the facts to be found in the case. Therefore, if the probative facts upon which the ultimate fact must rest lead to a conclusion repugnant to the ultimate fact found, the latter must be held to be invalidated by the former. 24 Cal. Jur. 972. If the electrical work was completed, as found by the court, on June 17th, and was not a trivial imperfection, the appellant's lien was filed within time, and it is valid. The "trivial imperfection" provision of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, was added to the Code in 1897 for the benefit of the lien claimants, and not as a hindrance to the enforcement of materialmen's liens. Liens of mechanics and materialmen are protected by section 15, article 20, of the state Constitution, and, being remedial in character, are to be liberally construed with a view to effect the object of the Constitution and promote justice. Continental Building & Loan Association v. Hutton, 144 Cal. 609, 78 P. 21; McClung v. Paradise, etc., 164 Cal. 517, 129 P. 774; Martin v. Becker, 169 Cal. 301, 146 P. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171.

[4] Neither does the amount, value, and character of the materials required to be furnished and labor performed to place the building in a completed state appear to us to be of that trivial character as to impel a holding that the claimant has thereby lost his lien. A test that has been applied in this class of cases and which has the sanction of judicial approval was thus stated in Hammond Lumber Co. v. Yeager, 185 Cal. 355, 197 P. 111:

"Are the imperfections in the performance of the work so trivial in character as to permit the contractor to recover for substantial performance?"

We think that the findings set out in VIIa impel a negative answer.

The judgment is reversed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. BARTH INV. CORPORATION et al. (L. A. 8926.)★

Supreme Court of California. December 13, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1928.

1. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(4)—Time for filing mechanic's lien runs from completion of building, where owner neglects to file notice of completion (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Where owner of building neglects to file for record notice of completion of improvement contract or cessation of labor on building, question whether materialman's lien is filed within statutory time, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, depends on time when building was completed.

2. Trial ⇨395(5)—Finding of ultimate fact is invalidated, where probative facts on which it is based, disposing of all facts involved in pleadings, are repugnant.

Findings of ultimate facts are not generally impeached by findings of probative facts, but will be invalidated when ultimate fact is based on probative facts, and is entirely overcome thereby, provided findings of probative facts dispose of all facts involved in pleadings.

3. Trial ⇨404(4)—Specific findings control over general findings in event of inconsistency.

Where court, in addition to general findings, makes specific findings as to averments of pleadings, specific findings control, in event of inconsistency.

4. Trial ⇨404(2)—General finding, amounting to mere conclusion of law, is insufficient.

A general finding, which is in effect but a conclusion of law, is insufficient.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(8)—Electric work costing $260.61, required as condition to obtaining inspector's certificate, held to mark completion of building as to materialmen filing lien and not mere "trivial imperfection" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Remaining electric work by way of putting more and heavier wires into $13,500 flat building, required to be done as condition of issuance of final inspector's certificate by city electrician's office, where of reasonable value of $260.61, was not mere "trivial imperfection," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, such that materialman's lien filed within 90 days after finishing such work could not be considered as filed within 90 days after completion of improvement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trivial Imperfection.]

6. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(7)—Requirement that trivial imperfection in work should not prevent filing lien must be liberally construed in favor of lien claimant (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187; Const. art. 20, § 15).

Code of Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that trivial imperfections in work shall not be deemed lack of completion of building, so as to prevent filing of lien, is intended for benefit of lien claimant, and should be given reasonably liberal construction to effect its purpose, in view of Const. art. 20, § 15.

7. Mechanics' liens ⇨5—Constitutional provision giving right to assert mechanic's lien should be liberally construed, and right cannot be defeated without showing grave reasons therefor (Const. art. 20, § 15).

Under Const. art. 20, § 15, right to assert mechanic's lien is remedial in its character, and should be liberally construed in its entirety, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice, and right cannot be destroyed or defeated, either by Legislature or courts, unless grave reasons are shown.

8. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(7)—"Trivial imperfections," as respects time for filing lien, are those of nature not preventing contractor's recovery for substantial performance (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Test of trivial imperfection in work of constructing building, as respects time for filing of mechanic's lien under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, is whether imperfections in performance of work are so trivial in character as to prevent contractor from recovering for substantial performance.

9. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(7)—Owner's secret acceptance of uncompleted building from contractor does not constitute completion as to materialman claiming lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Mere fact that owner of uncompleted building notifies contractors that he accepts the building does not amount to such completion of building as to defeat lien claimant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, for failure to file lien within 90 days thereafter, where it does not appear that acceptance was communicated to materialman, or that he had any knowledge thereof.

10. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(7)—Where construction work is suspended and later resumed, materialman has 90 days from final completion for filing lien, where owner fails to file notice of completion (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

If work in constructing building is suspended for a time, and later resumed in execution of original contract, and no notice of completion is filed, materialman is entitled to 90 days after work is finally completed in which to file his lien, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187.

11. Mechanics' liens ⇨290(4)—Finding that owners accepted building from contractors did not amount to finding of building's completion as respects materialman claiming lien, where findings showed building was subsequently completed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

In materialman's action to foreclose mechanic's lien, court's finding that owners notified contractors that they accepted building did not amount to finding that building under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, was actually completed on date of acceptance, so as to bar lien claim 90 days later, where it appeared from findings that building was actually completed thereafter.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Holzer, Judge.

Action by the Hammond Lumber Company against the Barth Investment Corporation and others. From a portion of the judgment adverse to it, plaintiff appeals. Portion of judgment appealed from reversed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Constan Jensen, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal, which is from the judgment roll, involves some questions of law similar to those decided in Hammond Lumber Company, a Corporation, v. Barth Investment Corporation, a Corporation (L. A. 8925) 262 P. 29, this day filed, and as to such questions that case is decisive. Carl Hellman and Anna Hellman were owners of a lot situated in the city of Los Angeles. C. A. Barth and Barth Investment Corporation contracted with said owners to erect upon said lot a flat at the cost of $13,500 to said owners. The action was commenced to foreclose a materialman's lien and for a personal judgment against said contractors in the sum of $3,000.17. Judgment went by default against said contractors, but in favor of respondents Hellman for costs of suit. This appeal is taken from that portion of the judgment entered in favor of said respondents.

[1] The questions presented are whether or not the asserted lien of appellant, the materialman, was filed within the statutory time prescribed by section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, and also as to the conclusiveness of certain ultimate findings which are in conflict with certain findings of probative facts. That question is dependent upon the time the building was completed, inasmuch as the owner neglected to file for record notice of the completion of said improvement contract or a cessation of labor thereon as provided by said section 1187, supra. The building contract provided for certain electrical construction or equipment as a part of the building. The electrical work was subcontracted, but the subcontractor, soon after entering upon the performance of his contract, abandoned work thereunder and left it, as found by the court, in "a partially incomplete and unfinished condition." Thereafter the original contractors employed an electrical contractor, one Ingraham, to complete said work. The court further found, as set forth in finding VIIa, that:

"The said Ingraham, while said owners were in the use, occupation and possession of said structure, did 95 hours' work upon said Hellman flats to correct and complete said electrical work in accord with the plans and specifications and the requirements of the city ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, at a reasonable cost of $260.61; that said work was done partially in July, 1922, and was necessary to correct and complete the work in accordance with the plans and specifications; that said work consisted generally of putting in more and heavier wires, and drawing out wires not heavy enough to carry the load, and putting in necessary materials to correct and complete said work; that said work done by the said Ingraham was finished on the 11th day of July, 1922, except six hours' work that was done on August 16, 1922, and five hours' work on August 17, 1922; that, without the work done by said Ingraham, the city electrician's office of the city of Los Angeles refused to accept said work and furnish a final inspector's certificate; that said acceptance by the city and the final certificate of acceptance was not issued by the city until after the 7th day of August, 1922. The original contract for the construction of said building contained the following: 'All work to be installed in accordance with city ordinances furnishing electrical inspector's certificates before work will be accepted.' The court finds that the above work constituted a trivial imperfection, that the contract cost of construction of said flat was $13,500 and that the original contract cost for the installation of the electrical work was $357. The city permit granted to said Ingraham to do his work was dated and issued June 5, 1922."

[2-4] By preceding ultimate findings the court found that said owners did not file for record a notice of the completion of said building, and that said building contract was completed on June 8, 1922. If the ultimate finding as to the completion should not be permitted to prevail over the conclusion which must be drawn from the probative facts specifically found by the court, and which lead in a contrary direction, the lien of appellant must be held to be a valid and subsisting lien and a reversal of the case must be ordered. The question, therefore, is whether the electrical work performed within the period of 90 days immediately preceding the day on which appellant's lien was filed, to wit, September 15, 1922, constituted the correction of trivial imperfections merely, as found by the court (section 1187, Code Civ. Proc.), or whether, as contended by appellant, said work was a material part of the contract, which must be performed before it may be claimed that the contract was completed, in the sense that the lien claimant is deprived of its lien. "As a general rule findings of ultimate facts may not be impeached, controlled, limited, or modified by findings of probative facts, but will control in case of any conflict between them. Findings of probative facts invalidate a finding of an ultimate fact only when the latter is based on the former and is entirely overcome thereby and when the findings of probative facts dispose of all the facts involved in the pleadings." 24 Cal. Jur. 972; Lee v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 177 Cal. 656, 171 P. 677; Steele v. Scott, 192 Cal. 521, 221 P. 342. So, too, it is the rule that "where the court, in addition to general findings, makes specific findings as to particular averments of the pleadings the latter control in the case of inconsistency." 24 Cal. Jur. 974. A general finding which is in effect but a conclusion of law is insufficient. See footnote 16, 24 Cal. Jur. 974.

[5] The findings in the instant case present and dispose of all the facts in the case and the ultimate fact is uncontrovertibly based upon the probative facts as specifically set out by the court. If, then, the probative facts, as found by the court, are repugnant to the ultimate fact, that said building was completed prior to the months of July or August, 1922, the latter is invalidated by the former. The question squarely presented is whether, as a matter of law, the greater part of labor done and materials furnished for the completion of the electrical work according to the plans and specifications of the contract, and performed in July and August, was of the kind and character and of sufficient contractual importance to warrant a finding that the building contract, so far as the materialman's lien was affected thereby, was not completed without the additional labor and material which it was necessary to employ and furnish at a cost of $260 in order to comply with the plans and specifications of the original contract. We are of the view that the work necessary to be done to complete the electrical construction was in no sense a "trivial imperfection." The portion of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, which the trial court held to be determinative of appellant's rights, provides:

"Any trivial imperfection in the said work, or in the completion of any contract by any lien claimant, or in the construction of any building, improvement or structure, * * * shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien. * * *"

[6, 7] This provision of the act was added to the earlier act for the benefit of the lien claimant, as its language plainly implies, and was enacted in the interest of and for the better protection of the lien claimant against inconsequential imperfections that could be conveniently urged as sufficient reasons to defeat the claimant's lien. So far as the provision affects the lien claimant it must be given a reasonably liberal construction with a view to effect its purpose. In fact, liens of mechanics and materialmen are protected by section 15, article 20, of the state Constitution. The right to assert such a lien is remedial in its character and should be liberally construed in its entirety, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. Continental Building & Loan Association v. Hutton, 144 Cal. 609, 78 P. 21; McClung v. Paradise, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 514, 129 P. 774; Martin v. Becker, 169 Cal. 301, 146 P. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171. The function of the Legislature is to provide a system through which the right of mechanics and materialmen may be carried into effect, and this right cannot be destroyed or defeated either by the Legislature or courts, unless grave reasons be shown therefor. Martin

v. Becker, supra; Hughes Bros. v. Hoover, 3 Cal. App. 145, 84 P. 681.

The original contract cost of the electrical work was $357. The cost of labor and material necessary to complete it and put it in condition to conform with the plans and specifications was $260.61, a sum $96.39 short of the original cost for the whole work. The court found that the work was done partially in July and was "necessary to correct and complete the work in accordance with the plans and specifications," and further found the work was completed July 11, except 6 hours' work was done on August 16 and 5 hours' was done on August 17. It is reasonably certain from the language of the findings that the greater part of the 95 hours work, equaling 11½ days of 8 hours each, was performed subsequent to June 17, which would bring the appellant within the 90-days statutory requirement. The permit from the city, which was necessary to be obtained before the work was commenced, was not issued to Ingraham until June 5, and the certificate of acceptance of the work by the city was not issued until August 17. Any work performed or materials furnished between June 17 and September 16, the day on which the lien was filed, must be considered as being within section 1187; the only other question is whether it was performed in correcting a trivial imperfection. The work as described in the findings was as necessary and essential to a completion of the contract as any other inside work that was to be done in or upon the building.

[8] The test in such cases is thus stated in Hammond Lumber Co. v. Yeager, 185 Cal. 355, 197 P. 111:

"Are the imperfections in the performance of the work so trivial in character as to permit the contractor to recover for substantial performance?"

Applying this test to the completion of the contract as it stood on the 8th day of June, it cannot be doubted that a negative answer must be made to the interrogatory. The work done and the materials furnished in the months of July and August were not to correct imperfections, but were necessary to complete the work as called for by the plans and specifications.

[9-11] It is true that the court found that the owners on June 8 "notified said contractors that they accepted said building." No finding is made that this acceptance was in any wise communicated to the materialman, or that it had any knowledge of said acceptance, or that the building was accepted as completed. Of course a secret acceptance by the owner from the contractor of an uncompleted building could not defeat the lien claimant. If in cases where no notice of completion is filed work should be suspended for a time and later be resumed in execution of the original contract, as in the instant case, the materialman would be entitled to ninety days after the work was finally finished in which to file his lien. But the question of "acceptance" of the building cannot be regarded as a finding that the building was actually completed on June 8 for the reason that the contractors, as shown by the findings, did in fact thereafter complete said building by performing the work and furnishing the materials necessary "to correct and complete the work in accord with the plans and specifications." Therefore, from the findings themselves, the building could not have been accepted as completed on June 8.

That portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

In re FINCH'S ESTATE.

FINCH et al. v. FINCH.

(L. A. 9276.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1927.

1. Executors and administrators §510(3)—Legatees who had assigned their rights in bequests prior to decree approving account of executrix could not appeal; "aggrieved parties."

Persons who assigned all their right, title, and interest in bequests to them prior to decree settling and approving second current account of administratrix are not "aggrieved parties" so as to be entitled to appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Aggrieved Party.]

2. Executors and administrators §504(2)—Trusts §366(1)—Beneficiary under testamentary trust may contest account of executrix or participate in any proceeding affecting property which might impair his beneficial interest (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 369, 378).

A beneficiary under trust created by will has right, as party beneficially interested, to appear and contest second current account of administratrix, or to participate in any other proceeding affecting property of estate which might impair his beneficial interest in trust, for, while trustee may, under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, appear without joining beneficiary, this does not prevent beneficiary from becoming party under section 378.

3. Executors and administrators §510(8)—Error in current account of executrix in not covering full period held not prejudicial, where omitted period was covered by petition for sale of property (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1537 and 1636).

Error in second current account of executrix, in that it did not cover full period intervening between settlement of first account and filing of second, held not prejudicial, where omitted period was covered by schedules and exhibits of petition for sale of property filed by executrix, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1537 and 1636.

4. Executors and administrators §349(1), 513(9)—Matters included in approved account, or passed on in making decree of sale, cannot again be contested in probate proceeding.

Any claim against estate or other expenditure made by executor or administrator, and included in account, which account, after due and legal notice of hearing, has been allowed and approved, cannot be contested, and same rule applies to matters passed on on making decree of sale.

5. Executors and administrators §349(1)—Order on hearing, after due and legal notice of petition by executrix for sale of property, is binding, even on those not appearing or not parties.

Where petition of executrix for sale of real and personal property was regularly set for hearing, and due and legal notice given, order made on such hearing was binding on all persons interested in estate, even though they may not have personally appeared in such proceeding and made themselves actual parties thereto.

6. Executors and administrators §349(1)—One who, as legatee, contested petition of executrix for sale of property, is bound by order granting petition both individually and as trustee.

Where party filed objections to petition of executrix for sale of property, as legatee under will, order granting petition of sale was binding on him, not only in individual capacity, but also in representative capacity as trustee of others.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Allen Finch, deceased. From a decree approving a second current account of Mary L. Finch, executrix, Jay A. Finch and others appeal. Affirmed.

Dwight V. Maurice, formerly Guy E. Maurice, and B. A. Finch, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ray Howard and Chas. M. Easton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1, 2] This appeal is from a decree approving the second current account of Mary L. Finch, executrix of the last will and testament of Allen Finch, deceased. Allen Finch died on the 31st day of December, 1914, leaving a last will and testament, by the terms of which Mary L. Finch, the wife of said deceased, was devised and bequeathed one-half of the entire estate of the testator, and was also appointed executrix of his will. The appellants, J. A. Finch, Essie Sherewood, Jay A. Finch, and D. W. Finch, were each bequeathed the sum of $100. Said appellant W. G. Finch was given $1,000, "through B. A. Finch as trustee." The appellant B. A. Finch was given $3,000, with the express directions to pay to said J. A. Finch, who was testator's father, the sum of $25 per month during the lifetime of the latter, and B. A. Finch was devised and bequeathed the rest and residue of said estate. After the filing by said executrix of said second current account, and before the final hearing thereon, the appellants Essie Sherewood, Jay A. Finch, and D. W. Finch, in consideration of the sum of $100 paid to each of them by the said Mary L. Finch, assigned and transferred to said Mary L. Finch all their right, title, and interest in the bequests of $100 each, to which they were respectively entitled under the will of said deceased. The point is now made that these three parties to this proceeding, having conveyed to the respondent all their interest in the estate, are not in a position to further participate in this litigation, and are not proper parties appellant on this appeal. We think this point is well taken. Having conveyed all their right, title, and interest in the estate prior to the decree of the court settling and approving said account, they are not aggrieved parties within the provisions of the code section specifying those entitled to appeal from an order or judgment of the court, and have no standing in any proceeding instituted to reverse or modify said decree. As to appellant J. A. Finch, it will be noticed that he is bequeathed by the terms of the will, not only the sum of $100, but is also made a beneficiary under the trust of $3,000 created under said will. While B. A. Finch, as trustee for J. A. Finch, might have appeared in said proceeding, and have contested said account without joining his beneficiary (Code Civ. Proc. § 369), yet this right of the trustee does not prevent his beneficiary from becoming a party to said proceeding, either by joining with his trustee, or independent of said trustee. Code Civ. Proc. § 378; Stackpole v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 181 Cal. 700, 186 P. 354; Horseshoe Pier, etc., Co. v. Sibley, 157 Cal. 442, 108 P. 308. Respondent testified that she had paid to said J. A. Finch the sum of $100 in full payment of the devise in that amount in his favor and had his receipt therefor. He may not, therefore, as a direct legatee under said will, be a proper party to these proceedings, for the reason that his bequest has been fully paid. As a beneficiary under the trust created under said will in his favor, he has the right, as a party beneficially interested, to appear and contest said account, or to participate in any other proceeding affecting the property of said estate, and which might tend to impair his beneficial interest in the trust created in his favor.

With these preliminary matters disposed of, we will now pass to the consideration of the main questions arising upon this appeal. Some two years or more after her appointment as executrix of the last will of said deceased, said Mary L. Finch, as such executrix, filed and presented to said probate court her first current account. This account covered the period of time beginning with her appointment as such executrix, and extending to, and including, the 20th day of October, 1917. After proceedings duly had in the matter of said estate, said account was duly approved and allowed by said court. The correctness of this account is in no way questioned in this proceeding. The account showed a balance of cash on hand chargeable to said executrix of $13,336.17 at the time of the rendition thereof. The second current account, the validity of which is the subject of the present controversy, was filed on the 10th day of February, 1925, and purports to cover a period of time from the 1st day of October, 1918, to and including the 30th day of December, 1924. This account showed the amount of cash on hand at the commencement of said period of time as $5,946.06. The account further showed that, subsequent to the first account, said executrix had filed and presented to said court her petition for the sale of real and personal property, and, in connection therewith, and as a part thereof, there was set forth claims and expenses of administration amounting to the sum of $7,468.85, and that, upon a hearing of said petition for the sale of real and personal property, the court passed upon and approved said claims and expenses, and further that the court found the amount of money then in the hands of said executrix and belonging to said estate to be the sum of $5,946.06. This petition bore date, and was filed on, December 3, 1918. It was further set forth in said petition that the family allowance theretofore ordered to be paid to the surviving wife of said deceased amounted on October 1, 1918, to the sum of $2,475, and the court on said hearing found that all the allegations of said petition were true. The second current account contains an allegation to the effect that the family allowance on October 1, 1918, amounted to said sum of $2,475, "so that said executrix begins this account as of October 1, 1918, and charges herself with said gross amount of $5,946.06," although the actual date of the order of the court granting said petition to sell said real and personal property was not entered until July 30, 1919. It appears from the record before us that, upon the filing of said petition for the sale of said real and personal property, the appellant B. A. Finch, as a legatee under the will of said deceased, interposed and filed in court his written objections to the granting of said order. At about the same time said B. A. Finch, in his capacity as a legatee under said will, filed in said probate court a petition for the removal of the said executrix. To this petition the executrix filed her answer, and the two proceedings—one for leave to sell real and personal property, and the other for the removal of said executrix—were heard by said court, and resulted in two orders of court, one an order granting said petition to sell said real and personal property, and the other an order denying the petition of the said B. A. Finch for the removal of the said executrix. In each of these two proceedings the said B. A. Finch claimed, among other things, that the payment by said executrix of a certain claim of $6,500 in settlement of a judgment rendered against said estate in favor of C. M. and Mary E. Easton was illegal, and was not a proper charge against said estate, and, in his opposition to the petition of the executrix for leave to sell real and personal property, the said B. A. Finch denied that the sum of $2,475, or any sum whatever, was due, owing, or unpaid on the family allowance. The court expressly found in each of said proceedings "that the particular claim of $6,500, the payment of which was objected to in said objections and by said beneficiaries, was a valid claim against the estate of said deceased at the time of the payment thereof." It further found in the matter of the petition to sell said real and personal property that all of the allegations of said petition were true, one of which was that the amount due on family allowance up to October 1, 1918, was the sum of $2,475. In their objections to the settlement and allowance of the second current account of said executrix the appellants herein again sought by proper allegations contained in their amended objections to the said second current account to attack the validity of the payment by said executrix of said claim of $6,500 in settlement of said judgment against the estate in favor of C. M. and Mary E. Easton, and also the amount of the family allowance, claiming that the only allowance ever made by the court in said estate for the support of the family of the deceased was for $75 per month for the period of one year only, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $900. The probate court, upon the hearing of said second current account, and of said objections thereto of appellants, made its decree approving said account. From this decree this appeal has been taken by appellants.

[3] Appellants first contend that said decree is erroneous, for the reason that the second current account fails to cover the full period of time intervening between the settlement of the first account and the filing of said second account, and for that reason it contains no statement of the receipts and expenditures of the said executrix during said period of time omitted from said account. As already stated, the first account covers the period of time from the appointment and qualification of said executrix up to and including the 20th day of October, 1917. The second account covers the time commencing on the 1st day of October, 1918, up to and including the 30th day of December, 1924. It is apparent, therefore, that there is no account rendered covering the time commencing on October 20, 1917, and ending on the 1st day of October, 1918. Respondent contends that this omitted period, that is, the period of time from October 20, 1917, to October 1, 1918, is covered by schedules and exhibits contained in, and made a part of, the petition for the sale of real and personal property filed by said executrix on the 3d day of December, 1918. In other words, the respondent claims that the two accounts, together with the petition for the sale of real and personal property, cover the entire period of her administration of said estate from the date of her appointment up to the 30th day of December, 1924. No authority is presented by respondent in support of her contention that a petition for the sale of property may also serve as an account of the administration of the executrix for the period of time covered by said petition. The general practice of the profession, we think, is unquestionably against such a procedure. Accounts current and annual are, as a rule, intended to cover the entire period of administration of an estate by an executor or administrator. We think, therefore, that the procedure adopted by the executrix in this estate was an innovation that finds sanction neither in the general practice nor in any of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure governing the administration of estates of deceased persons. We are not prepared to say, however, that this departure from the general procedure prescribed by the Code was such an error as resulted in any prejudice to the rights of appellants. Section 1636 of the Code of Civil Procedure designates the matters in an account filed by an executor or administrator which may be contested by the heirs. This section provides that:

"All matters, including allowed claims not passed upon on the settlement of any former account, or on rendering an exhibit, or on making a decree of sale, may be contested by the heirs. * * *

[4] The obvious intent of this section is to permit the heirs to contest certain matters included in an account, but to withhold such permission in matters already passed upon on the settlement of a former account or on rendering an exhibit, or on making a decree of sale. It is well settled that any claim against the estate or other expenditure made by an executor or administrator and included in an account, which account, after due and legal notice of the hearing, has been allowed and approved by the court, cannot again be contested by an heir, or any person interested in the estate. From the terms of section 1636 the same rule applies to any claim, item, or expenditure or other matter passed upon by the probate court "on making a decree of sale." In the petition for the sale of real and personal property filed herein, as we have already seen, there was set forth therein as the law then required (section 1537, Code

Civ. Proc.), under the head of "the debts outstanding against the said decedent," the judgment of C. M. Easton et al. v. Finch, together with the statement that, under order of said court, made on the 11th day of July, 1918, it had been paid and settled in full by the payment by said executrix of the sum of $6,500. There was also set out in said petition of sale, as then required by said section 1537, "the amount due on the family allowance," which amount was stated in said petition to be the sum of $2,475. This petition, after due notice, came on regularly for hearing, and was approved by the court, and an order was made authorizing the executrix to sell the real and personal property then in her hands. The validity of the Easton judgment and the payment of said sum of $6,500 in satisfaction and settlement thereof were therefore directly passed upon by the court at the hearing of said petition of sale, and could not again be questioned or contested, even if the same were again included in an account filed by said executrix. The same must be said regarding the family allowance. We are therefore of the opinion that appellants were not prejudiced by the omission of these items from said second current account, if we assume they should by law have been included therein. They had been once passed upon and approved by the court, and we find no authority for any further consideration of their validity as legal claims against said estate.

[5, 6] Appellants contend, however, that they were not bound by the order of court granting the petition of said executrix to sell said real and personal property. The petition was regularly set for hearing, and due and legal notice of said hearing was given, as required by law. The order of court, therefore, made upon said hearing, was binding upon all persons interested in said estate, even though they may not have personally appeared in said proceeding and made themselves actual parties thereto. Miller v. Pitman, 180 Cal. 540, 182 P. 50. But in this case the record shows that the appellant B. A. Finch, as legatee under the will of said deceased, filed written objections to said petition for the sale of real and personal property, in which he objected specifically to the item of $6,500 paid out by said executrix in payment and settlement of the Easton judgment, and also to the amount alleged to be due on said family allowance, claiming that the order of court decreeing said family allowance provided that the same should be for one year only, and said B. A. Finch, in his said written objections, claimed that there was only $900 due on said family allowance. Said petition, together with the written objections thereto filed by said B. A. Finch, came on for hearing, and, after the same had been duly considered by the court, together with the evidence produced by the respective parties, the court granted said petition, and ordered the sale of said property. In said order of sale the court expressly found, as we have before stated, "that the particular claim of $6,500, the payment of which was objected to in said objections and by said beneficiaries, was a valid claim against the estate of said deceased at the time of the payment thereof, and that all of the allegations of said petition are true." This order of the court granting said petition of sale, and finding all of the allegations of said petition to be true, which included the item of $2,475, as due on the family allowance, was unquestionably binding upon said B. A. Finch, who had expressly made himself a party to said proceedings by filing said written objections, and thereby contesting said petition. It was binding upon him, not only in his individual capacity, but also in his representative capacity as trustee of J. A. Finch and W. G. Finch. He appeared "as legatee under said will." As such legatee he took certain of the property of said estate as his own individual and personal property, and he took other portions of said property as trustee for his father, J. A. Finch, and brother, W. G. Finch. When, therefore, he appeared "as a legatee under said will," he represented, not only himself, but also the beneficiaries under the trust created by said will of which he was made trustee. He is therefore bound both in his individual and representative capacities by all lawful orders made by the court in all proceedings in which he appeared as a party therein. "If one sues as trustee, and afterwards in his individual capacity in respect of the same subject-matter, he is bound by the decree in the former suit. For if, at that time, he owned the subject of the trust he was representing himself. * * *" 2 Black on Judgments (2d Ed.), § 536. As was said in Williams v. Southern Pac. Co., 54 Cal. App. 571, 578, 202 P. 356, 359:

"Without multiplying authorities, it may be stated as a general rule that, where one appears in a representative capacity in one action and in his individual capacity in another action, involving the same subject-matter, without any change in his relation to that subject-matter, a judgment in the one case is conclusive of his rights in the other."

If, therefore, he was bound by said decree in his representative capacity as trustee of J. A. Finch and W. G. Finch, the beneficiaries of said trust were also bound by said decree.

It is hardly necessary to refer also to the proceedings instituted by B. A. Finch as "legatee under the will of Allen Finch, deceased," to remove said Mary L. Finch as executrix of said will. Among the acts of said executrix complained of by said B. A. Finch, and which were the basis of his claim for her removal, was that she had illegally paid said sum of $6,500 in settlement of the Easton judgment.

After a spirited contest in which the validity of said judgment was thoroughly gone into and considered, the court denied the petition to have said executrix removed, and in the order denying the same found and directed "that the particular claim of $6,500, the payment of which was objected to in said objection and by said beneficiaries, was a valid claim against the estate of said deceased at the time of the payment thereof." This adjudication of the validity of said claim was in a proceeding in which all of the appellants, properly appearing herein, were represented as parties thereto, and accordingly conclusively established its legality as against said parties. Thus it appears that the matters which the appellants sought to litigate by their objections to said second current account had as to one of said matters—the validity of the Easton judgment—been twice before the court, and its legality established by orders of said court duly and regularly made and entered, and, as to the other matter, the amount of the family allowance, the court had duly and regularly held in a proper proceeding in which all of said appellants, properly appearing herein, were represented, that it was not limited to one year, but that the amount due at the time of the filing of said petition for the sale of real and personal property was the sum of $2,475. These matters were therefore, as far as said appellants were concerned, res adjudicata, and could not again be contested on the hearing of said second current account.

The decree therefore approving said account is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. PICTURES, Inc., v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5945.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 13, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1928.

Master and servant ⇐387—Awarding compensation for injury by willful and serious misconduct of employer's foreman held proper (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, § 6[b], as amended).

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, § 6(b), as amended by St. 1919, p. 912, § 2, and St. 1923, p. 376, awarding employee compensation for injury from willful and serious misconduct of employer's foreman, was proper.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by John Beckler, claimant, opposed by the First National Pictures, Inc., employer, and the Employer's Liability As-urance Corporation, Limited, of London. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission of California awarding the claimant compensation, the employer applies for certiorari. Writ denied.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

CONREY, P. J. It appearing that the petition as filed is erroneously entitled, the title of this proceeding is hereby amended to read as above stated, and the clerk is directed to amend the register and index accordingly.

From the evidence as indicated by the petition and answer, it appears that the accident and the injury to the employee, John Beckler, resulted from the willful and serious misconduct of one Doble, foreman of the carpenter department of the employer. Under the provisions of section 6 (b) of the Workmen's Compensation, etc., Act of 1917 (as amended by St. 1919, p. 912, § 2, and St. 1923, p. 376), the employer is responsible for this misconduct if Doble was "an executive or managing officer or general superintendent thereof." According to the rule established by the decision of the Supreme Court in Gordon v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 420, 249 P. 849, it seems necessary to hold that Doble was a "managing officer" of the employer, within the meaning of the language used in said section 6 (b).

For this reason the petition for a writ of review is denied.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5736.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 5, 1927.

I. Master and servant ⇐367—Whether a person was "employee" or "independent contractor" is usually determined by power of control as to result of work, means, and method (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subs. a and b).

In determining whether person was "employee" within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), particularly section 8, subs. (a) and (b), or "independent contractor," determinative factor is usually who had power of control, not only as to result of work, but as to means and method by which it was accomplished.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Independent Contractor.]

2. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 417(7)—Court must uphold finding of Industrial Accident Commission, unless there is entire absence of evidence (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subds. [a] and [b]).

It is duty of court to uphold finding of Industrial Accident Commission that decedent was employee within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), particularly section 8, subds. (a) and (b), rather than independent contractor, unless there is entire absence of evidence to support finding.

3. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 405(2)—Evidence held to sustain finding of Industrial Accident Commission that one collecting dues of society was "employee," not "independent contractor" (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subds. [a] and [b]).

Evidence held to sustain finding of Industrial Accident Commission that decedent who was engaged by society to make collections of monthly dues from its members for a commission of 10 per cent. on all dues received by society was an employee within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), particularly section 8, subds. (a) and (b), rather than an independent contractor.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 by Anna M. C. Florcken, claimant, for the death of her husband, the employee, opposed by the Turn Verein Germania, employer, and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, insurer. To review an award of compensation, the insurer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

HOUSER, J. As a brief outline, the facts appear to be that one Florcken was employed by a society known as the Turn Verein Germania to make collections of monthly dues from its members, for which service Florcken was to be paid a commission of 10 per cent. on the total amount received by the society from such source, whether or not personally collected by him. While acting in the course of and arising out of his employment, Florcken sustained injuries which subsequently resulted in his death. On application by his widow to the respondent commission to adjudge compensation alleged to be due to her under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831), an award was made, and it is by way of writ of review that petitioner herein seeks to have such award annulled.

It is the contention of petitioner herein that the relationship which existed between Florcken and the society was such that in a legal sense Florcken was not an employee of the society, but that he was an independent contractor, and as such neither he nor his dependent was entitled to any benefits arising from the provisions of the so-called Workmen's Compensation Act.

By the terms of section 8(a) of the act in question, an employee includes every person in the service of an employer under any appointment or contract of hire, and the presumption (section 8[b]) is that "any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor," is an employee.

In order to determine the contractual relationship which existed between the parties, in addition to adjudicated cases in which the relationship of master and servant and that of owner and independent contractor have been discussed and decided, it becomes necessary to consider further details regarding the situation of the parties herein one toward the other. At the hearing before the respondent commission, it was shown in evidence that, following the resignation of a former collector of dues for the society, on resolution of the board of directors thereof, Florcken had been elected to the position, to hold same during the pleasure of the board; that in connection with his work he was bonded as a collector and was furnished by the society with stationery, books, receipts, and, with the exception of postage, with all other supplies necessary in the proper discharge of his duties; that during the two years of his engagement with the society, although he had no other employment, no restrictions, as such, were placed upon him as to the time when, or the manner in which, his work should be performed, and that as a matter of fact he kept his books at his home, worked such hours in the daytime as he chose, and generally operated from his home. However, although not particularly specified as a part of his duty, he was expected to attend meetings of the members of the society and thereat make such collections as were possible. His work was performed in the name of the society, and all collections were retained by him until his monthly accounting was made, at which time he delivered to the society the full amount collected by him, and thereafter 10 per cent. of such sum was returned to him in compensation for his services. The account between the society and Florcken was kept on the books of the society under the heading "Commission and Dues." Another account kept by the society was entitled "Labor and Compensation," under which head appeared the moneys paid to salaried officers and general help. The evidence showed that the trustees of the society supervised Florcken's work, and that at any time they might dismiss him by action of the board of trustees in the event that his work was unsatisfactory.

One of the witnesses, in response to questions propounded to him at the hearing, testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Haeckel, is it your understanding that the board of directors might have at any time given Mr. Florcken directions as to how he should change his method of doing business, or that he should do it in a different manner, and that he would be obliged to do so? A. Yes; it was my understanding that by bringing it up at a board of directors' meeting they could ask him about collections that year; it had to come on the meeting nights or the class nights, and only on the days while the members were there. Q. Did you ever know of that actually being done to any collector? A. Yes; I have heard it suggested that, upon the collector's complaint that the members were not mailing in the dues, it was suggested that he come on those meeting nights when the members were there and then he could approach them. Q. What I mean is, in the event the collector was not satisfactorily getting the dues in, was there ever anything said to him about it? Was he called on the carpet, in other words, about it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know of any such instance? A. Yes, sir; I have heard the trustees do it. Q. Mr. Haeckel, is it not true that as a matter of fact, at the request of the trustees of the board, Mr. Florcken attended meetings about four nights every week, in order that those collections might be gone after to their satisfaction? A. It was suggested, yes. * * * Q. Then he actually attended on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays? A. Yes; I have seen him there the four nights out of the week. * * * Q. Mr. Haeckel, these meetings that you have just referred to, that the deceased attended, they were attended practically so that he could make his collections? A. That was his only purpose, except probably on Wednesday night, to which class he personally belonged; he was class leader and would take part in the exercises. Q. As a matter of when he should attend and how often attend, that was left pretty much to his own judgment, was it not? A. It was. He could miss a night and catch up the next time."

[1] In the case of Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 404, 407, 216 P. 578, 579 (43 A. L. R. 1304), where the authorities are cited, it is said:

"In determining in any given case whether a person was an employee or an independent contractor, there are usually present various circumstances which are persuasive to one conclusion, and other circumstances persuasive to the opposite conclusion. But an analysis of the cases makes it plain that the determinative factor is usually found in the solution of the question, Who has the power of control, not as to the result of the work only, but as to the means and method by which such result is accomplished? * * *"

[2] In the case of Hillen v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570, a man had been engaged to lay shingles at a fixed price per thousand. At times he employed other men to help in the work. The evidence showed that the general contractor had instructed his superintendent to "let it (the shingling) out on a contract." In the course of the opinion, it is said:

"* * * Whether or not the relation of employer and employee existed in this case, under the oral contract entered into, is a question of mixed law and fact, to be proved like any other question. The finding of the commission, in effect, that the relation existed between Hillen and Downing is binding on this court. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 180 Cal. 497, 499 [181 P. 788]. Unless there is such an entire absence of evidence in the record as to render the finding unreasonable, or in excess of the powers of the commission, the court is not empowered to set it aside. Eastman v. Industrial Accident Com., 186 Cal. 587, 598 [200 P. 17]. The award of the commission may be annulled only if there is no substantial evidence in support of its findings. Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 190 Cal. 114, 124 [210 P. 820]."

See, also, New York Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Com. (Cal. App.) 252 P. 775; Montezuma Mountain Ranch School v. Industrial Accident Com. (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 84.

The rule is announced in the case of Archbishop v. Industrial Accident Commission, 194 Cal. 660, 667, 230 P. 1, 4, as follows:

"Whether a workman is an employee within the Workmen's Compensation Act or an independent contractor is a question of fact upon which the judgment of the Industrial Commission is conclusive where the facts are in dispute, and becomes a question of law only when but one inference can reasonably be drawn from the facts.' Federal Mining & Smelting Co. v. Thomas [99 Okl. 24] 225 P. 967. It was said in Western Pacific R. R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754: 'It is the rule that, where from the evidence two opposing inferences may be drawn, that inference which is accepted by the commission must be sustained if there is evidence in the record to support it and if it is a reasonable inference to be drawn from that evidence. Eastman v. Industrial Acc. Com., 186 Cal. 587, 589, 200 P. 17; Polar Ice, etc., Co. v. Mulray, 67 Ind. App. 270, 119 N. E. 149.' See, also, Tartar v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 703, 218 P. 39; Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 182 Cal. 612, 187 P. 42."

[3] Considering that the record in the instant case contains substantial evidence tending to establish the ultimate facts that Florcken might have been discharged from his position at any time, and that the manner in which he operated was subject to the direction of the board of trustees of the society, it is clear that, as between Florcken and the society, the "determinative factor" of power of control lay with the latter, not only as to the result proposed to be obtained, but as well to the means and method by which such result was to be accomplished. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 404, 407, 216 P. 578, 43 A. L. R. 1304. Under the general rule as announced in the Hillen Case, 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570, and particularly in the Archbishop Case, 194 Cal. 660, 667, 230 P. 1, in effect that, unless there is an entire absence of evidence the finding by the Commission must be upheld, we are constrained to rule that the award herein should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

HAUGHY-RED BLUFF SAW & MACHINE WORKS v. WALLER. (Civ. 3205.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 9, 1927.

1. Bills and notes $\S$ 179—Note payable to order of, and indorsed by, maker, is good against him in any hands.

Note payable to order of maker, and indorsed by him, is good as against maker in any hands into which it falls.

2. Bills and notes $\S$ 524—Plaintiff producing note, payable to order of, and indorsed by, maker, is presumed to be owner thereof.

Plaintiff producing note, payable to order of, and indorsed by, maker, at trial of suit thereon, is presumed to be owner thereof.

3. Patents $\S$ 196—Note for patent interests held not void for failure of consideration because of failure to establish factory to manufacture patented articles.

Note for balance of subscription for interests in patents, not shown to be worthless, held not void for failure of consideration because of failure to establish factory for manufacture of patented articles where maker transferred such interests, fund, or property created by subscription, and all rights of action against patentee to one agreeing to deliver and tendering stock in new factory for such note and cash payment.

4. Bills and notes $\S$ 527(1)—Maker's testimony as to transferring patent interests, for which note was given, on promise of stock in corporation to be organized, negated claim that corporation agreed to cancel note.

Maker's testimony as to transferring patent interests, for which note was given, on transferee's promise of stock in corporation to be organized, held to negative claim that such corporation agreed to cancel note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the Haughy-Red Bluff Saw & Machine Works against A. P. Waller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

J. M. Lee and W. P. Johnson, both of Red Bluff, and J. B. Zimdars, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. On January 13, 1921, the appellant, Waller, made and executed his promissory note for $375, payable six months after date, with interest. This note was payable to the order of the maker, and was by Waller immediately indorsed and delivered to one G. D. Martin, whose connection with the matters in controversy will be presently explained.

With the above note defendant, Waller, also executed a writing worded as follows:

"Jan. 13, 1921. To Any Bank or Banker: You are at liberty to purchase my note of this date for $375.00 or to loan money against it, given to Red Bluff National Bank, if you desire. There are no offsets or conditions against the note. [Signed] A. P. Waller. Address Red Bluff, Calif."

This writing was likewise delivered to said Martin.

Appellant affirmatively alleges that both Martin and Waller signed a document in the following terms, to wit:

"No. ———. Jan. 13, 1921.

"I hereby subscribe and contract for six thirtyieths of one equity of the two thousand (2000) parts of undivided equities in Bessolo patent pipe and nut wrenches filed in the United States Patent Office as follows: [here follows a description of the alleged patents] as per bill of conveyance bearing my signature to subscription on back of same of even date, and for myself, my heirs, administrators, executors and assigns, I agree to all conditions of the bill of sale.

"[Signed] A. P. Waller.

"Address Red Bluff, Cal.

"Received $125.00.

"Due $375.00 6 months from date.

"[Signed] G. D. Martin, Conveyor."

The evidence taken in the case discloses that one William Louis Bessolo claimed to own some valuable patents on a new and useful wrench, and it appears that said Bessolo had, prior to the date of the note, transferred a certain interest in these patents to the "name" of said G. D. Martin, which individual was to act as "conveyor" thereof to the several purchasers who might subscribe for interests therein. Martin was acting with Bessolo and a committee of citizens of Red Bluff in the promotion of a factory proposed to be erected at Red Bluff, Cal., for the manufacture of wrenches under the Bessolo patents. This committee was composed of H. P. Stice, R. L. Douglas, A. L. Conard, and H. P. Jerrett.

Waller's total subscription was $500, of which $125 was paid in cash, and the balance thereof was covered by the above note.

The cash obtained by Martin from Waller, together with the note and the other writing executed by Waller, were all delivered by Martin to the above-described committee, and were by said committee in turn placed in the Red Bluff National Bank; the money being deposited in the name of the committee, and the note being, on or about March, 1921, used by said committee as collateral.

Many citizens of Red Bluff and vicinity bought like interests in the Bessolo patents, all for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of the wrench factory. Some subscribers paid their subscriptions in cash, and some paid partly in cash, but in a larger proportion of cash than was paid by Waller. Their several subscriptions were dealt with by this committee in the same manner as Waller's money and note were dealt with. The fund obtained, either from cash payments by subscribers, or from a deposit of the notes of the subscribers, was used by this committee in the purchase of a factory site, and in the erection thereon of a building for factory purposes.

The committee of citizens had a disagreement with Bessolo over matters in connection with the establishment of the wrench factory, some time prior to April, 1922, and the scheme to establish the proposed wrench factory wholly failed. Thereupon the said committee endeavored to establish another factory, of a similar nature, on the site purchased, and with a salvage of the assets of the proposed wrench factory.

In April, 1922, while defendant's note was outstanding, in the hands of the committee, or in the bank above named, Waller, by an instrument in writing, transferred his interest in the Bessolo patents, which he received from Martin on January 13, 1921, to one J. C. Haugby, this paper being worded as follows:

"For value received, each of the undersigned hereby assigns, transfers and conveys to J. C. Haugby, of Red Bluff, California, the rights, interest and properties, to wit:

"All those certain interest and rights in and to those certain letters patent issued to William Louis Bessola, and which were heretofore sold by said Bessolo to the undersigned respectively, and which are particularly described as follows, to wit;

"That certain number set opposite our respective names of equities of the 2000 parts of undivided equities in United States patents covering pipe and nut wrenches as follows: [Here follows description of the Bessolo patents.] Also all of the interest of the undersigned respectively in any and all of the funds or property paid or transferred by the undersigned respectively for the said rights and interest hereinabove described and hereby transferred to said J. C. Haugby and the property into which the same may have been converted; and all rights of action and claims of every kind and character which the undersigned respectively have or may have against said William Louis Bessolo growing out of said transaction.

"In witness whereof we have hereunto signed our respective names this — day of April, 1922.

"Name, A. P. Waller. Number of units of equities transferred, 6. Number of units or equities transferred in dollars—Paid."

It will be here noted that Waller assigned to Haugby any and all funds that he had theretofore paid and any claim or right of action against Bessolo, on account of the transaction. Haugby then gave to Waller a document, from which we will, on account of its great length, take but sufficient of the contents to show its bearing on the present situation. This document is dated February 5, 1922, and first recites the fact of original ownership by Bessolo of the patents, describing them, the sale of interests therein, to Red Bluff citizens, the different steps taken in the attempt to establish the wrench factory, the failure of this attempt to establish such factory, and the fact of disagreements with Bessolo, and said writing then contains a proposal by said Haugby to establish another factory with the assets of the previous factory venture.

Haugby agrees to organize a new corporation with a capital stock of $100,000 shares of the par value of $1 per share, and to issue stock to the subscribers to the Bessolo factory, in the proportion of their subscription, to the wrench factory, in exchange for said subscribers' interests in the funds and property created by their former subscription to the Bessolo venture; Haugby to have 51 per cent. of the stock, the subscribers to have a share for each dollar they had subscribed, and the balance of the stock, if any, to be sold as treasury stock for the benefit of the new corporation. The Bessolo factory subscribers, who had given notes for their former subscriptions, which notes were yet unpaid, and who chose to make an assignment to Haugby, were to pay their notes at the Red Bluff National Bank, and receive their shares of stock in the new concern. There was in this agreement a provision worded as follows:

"That he (the said James C. Haugby) will thereupon cause to be issued out of the remaining 49 per cent. of said stock to each of said equity holders making such transfer, shares of stock of said corporation to the number of the dollars each equity holder has paid or agreed to pay for the equity so by him transferred to James C. Haugby; such shares of stock when issued shall be delivered by the corporation for each of such equity holders to the Red Bluff National Bank, and in those cases where such equity holders' subscription for such equity has not been fully paid, or is still partly represented by a promissory note, the shares to be so issued to such equity holder shall remain in escrow with said bank until such balance or such promissory note has been paid, and, in the event the same be not paid on or before July 1, 1922, such shares of stock shall revert to said corporation."

While allegations of fraud were made by appellant in his answer and in his briefs herein, yet on the trial there was no showing that there was any fraud in these transactions, and, upon oral argument before this court, appellant conceded there was no fraud proven.

Appellant never paid the note, and hence this suit was brought for the collection thereof.

Appellant answered and denied ownership of the note in plaintiff. He further alleged a total failure of consideration. By a second affirmative answer he alleged fraud in the obtaining of the note. By a third affirmative defense Waller averred that, in consideration of his assignment of the Bessolo patents to "plaintiff," the "plaintiff" agreed to cancel this note.

On the conclusion of the evidence plaintiff moved for an instructed verdict, which motion was granted, judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant, Waller, appeals to this court.

[1-4] While the statement of facts is lengthy, yet we regard the matter as quite simple. We will take up the contentions of appellant in their order: (1) As to ownership of this note, it being payable to the order of the maker, and being by the maker indorsed, we are of the opinion the note was good, as against the maker in any hands it fell. Plaintiff actually produced it at the trial, and there was no proof that it was not the owner. Plaintiff was presumed to be such owner. (2) Upon the defense of failure of consideration, there was no proof in the record that the Bessolo patents were worthless. For aught that appears, they were of a value commensurate with the price paid by Waller. Waller, however, by his own act, parted with his title to the interests in the patents by transferring them to J. C. Haughey. It appears in the testimony that Haughey retransferred them to Bessolo. Waller, in addition to making transfer of the interest in the patents to Haughey, also assigned to Haughey the fund or property his subscription had created, and also any right of action he might have had against Bessolo on account of the transactions. Still, in addition to all this, Haughey, by his agreement of February 5, 1922, was to deliver to Waller stock in the new factory, for his note and cash payment, which stock the plaintiff tendered to defendant, Waller, and which Waller refused to accept. The testimony of Waller, as we think, clearly shows his acceptance of this agreement. There is no proof that the new stock was worthless. (3) The defense of fraud is entirely waived by the defendant. (4) Coming, then, to the claim that "plaintiff," in consideration of an assignment to it of the patent interests, agreed to cancel the note in suit, we find that defendant by direct testimony shows that, when he signed this transfer to Haughey (not to plaintiff), he did so on the promise by Haughey of stock in the new company, and that he would be entitled to such stock when it was organized. As stated above, this stock was issued by plaintiff and tendered to Waller. A still further answer to the claim as made by the third affirmative answer is this: Waller claims that "plaintiff" made these promises in consideration of the cancellation of the note. In the nature of things, this was not possible. The plaintiff company was not in existence at the time of the Haughey assignment, nor for months thereafter.

We can see no reason for the citation of authority in support of these conclusions.

While there may have been errors committed in the rejection of testimony offered by appellant, there was no ruling that affected any substantial right of defendant, to his prejudice.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

OLSCHEWSKI v. HUDSON. (Civ. 6064.) *

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1928.

1. Master and servant $\S$ 60—Agent in charge of laundry route is bound to exercise utmost good faith toward employer (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 1983-1988).

Agent of laundry company in charge of laundry route, as such confidential agent, is bound to exercise utmost good faith in behalf of employer, and not to take advantage of trade knowledge and information secured in course of employment to use it for his personal benefit, under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 1983-1988.

2. Injunction $\S$ 56—List of laundry customers is "intangible property right," which may be appropriately protected.

List of laundry customers is property right, which may be appropriately protected, even by injunction in court of equity, but it is not tangible right which may be handled and transferred, being more akin to good will of business, in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 655.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Intangible Property.]

3. Trover and conversion $\S$ 2—Action of "trover" or "conversion" will not lie for unlawful interference with laundry route by agent's sale thereof.

Action in trover or conversion will not lie for unlawful interference with laundry route by agent who had charge of it, and who attempted to sell it, since only objectionable acts of agent were violation of trust as confidential agent; "conversion" being wrongful appropriation of goods of another, and "trover" being action for damages where goods are retained against plaintiff's claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conversion; Trover.]

4. Trover and conversion $\S$ 2—"Trover" lies only for wrongful appropriation of personal property specific enough to be identified.

Action of trover or conversion lies only for wrongful appropriation of goods, chattels, or

[4] And in 26 R. C. L. 1105, it is said:

"An action in trover is not maintainable for the conversion of a bill or note unless the plaintiff can show that he was entitled to the possession of the specific property in question."

From the foregoing authorities it appears that the action of trover or conversion lies only for the wrongful appropriation of goods, chattels, or personal property which is specific enough to be identified, and not to such indefinite, intangible, and uncertain property rights as the mere good will of a business, or trade secrets (Roystone v. Woodbury, 67 Misc. Rep. 265, 122 N. Y. S. 444), or a newspaper route (Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 239, 191 P. 5), or a licensed market stall for transacting trade (Meier v. Wilkens, 15 App. Div. 97, 44 N. Y. S. 274).

Appellant relies upon the case of Payne v. Elliot, 54 Cal. 339, 35 Am. Rep. 80, as authority for the contention that conversion lies for the wrongful appropriation of every character of property contained within the classification of personal property. That case in fact does say:

"The fiction on which the action of trover was founded, namely, that a defendant had found the property of another, which was lost, has become, in the progress of law, an unmeaning thing, which has been by most courts discarded; so that the action no longer exists as it did at common law, but has been developed into a remedy for the conversion of every species of personal property."

This language is also quoted in 24 Cal. Jur. 1030, § 7, which text is supported only by the one authority above mentioned. But this is too broad a statement as to the application of the doctrine of conversion or trover, and it was unnecessary to the determination of the issue in that case. All that was involved in the Payne case, supra, was the question as to whether conversion would lie for the unlawful appropriation of shares of stock in a mining company. Shares of stock are represented by certificates which are evidence of a definite interest in the assets of a company. Shares of stock are tangible, and may be identified. It is the uniform rule of law that shares of stock in a company are subject to an action in conversion. 26 R. C. L. 1105; 7 R. C. L. 197, § 166; Ralston v. Bank of California, 112 Cal. 208, 213, 44 P. 476; Jacks v. Bacon, 63 Cal. App. 463, 468, 218 P. 1027; People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 2, 44 Am. Rep. 52.

[5] It is true as contended by appellant, that personal property consists of "every kind of property that is not real. * * *" Civ. Code, § 663. And section 3336 of the Civil Code provides that:

"The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: (1) The value of the property at the time of the conversion. * * *"

But this section does not declare that an action in trover will lie for the conversion of personal property of every character. It merely purports to fix the measure of damages for the wrongful appropriation of such personal property as is subject to the action of conversion. No statute of California purports to state just what character of personal property is subject to this action.

In the case of Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 239, 191 P. 5, it is held that a contract between a newspaper publisher and a carrier, for the exclusive control of a newspaper route, created a mere agency, and conveyed no interest in property. The characteristics of this newspaper route were similar to those of the laundry route in the instant case. The deceased, as the agent of the laundry company, acquired no title to the property, and, having none, his attempt to transfer the route to an alleged purchaser would convey no title. The title of the Eagle Laundry Company was therefore in no wise affected by this alleged sale. Its former customers of this route were privileged to continue to patronize appellant's business, regardless of the attempted sale. The only acts of the deceased of which appellant may complain were the violation of his trust as confidential agent, and the consequent damage to their business on account of a possible loss of customers. Under such circumstances the remedy is not found in an action for conversion, and the demurrer was therefore properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 12, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1928.

Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 1010(1)—Findings of trial court, sufficiently supported by evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a judgment entered against defendant P. M. Reidy in an action for money had and received. The appeal is presented on the judgment roll with a bill of exceptions.

It is contended by appellant that the findings are unsupported, and that certain rulings of the court made in the course of the trial were prejudicially erroneous.

According to the testimony of witnesses for the plaintiff corporation, the F. B. Stearns Company had stored in a warehouse 25 automobiles, which, under a contract with the plaintiff, were consigned to the latter. Defendant Reidy desired to purchase the automobiles from the Stearns Company at a price less than the invoice price to the plaintiff, and, in order to complete the purchase, the consent of the latter was necessary. The plaintiff had obligated itself to sell and deliver five of the automobiles to various purchasers, and it was agreed by the parties that, in consideration of the consent of plaintiff to cancel its contract with the Stearns Company, said defendant would deliver the five automobiles contracted to be sold and pay to plaintiff all sums received therefor above the cost of the automobiles to him. The automobiles were delivered by defendant, and, according to this testimony, the total amount received therefor over and above the cost thereof to defendant exceeded the amount found by the trial court. Defendant denied that a profit was derived from the transaction, but the evidence, although conflicting, sufficiently supports the findings of the court, which cannot therefore be disturbed (Southern California Iron & Steel Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, 186 Cal. 604, 200 P. 1), and a review of the rulings on objections by defendant discloses no prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 7, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1928.

Landlord and tenant §291(1) — Lessor giving 30-day notice of forfeiture, making month to month tenancy, without subsequent 3-day notice, could not maintain unlawful detainer (Civ. Code, §§ 789-791).

Under lease for term of years, providing that lessor might declare lease forfeited for violation of covenants, in which event holding should be construed as month to month tenancy, lessor, who merely gave 30-day notice of termination without 3-day notice required by Civ. Code, § 791, at end of 30-day period, was not entitled to maintain unlawful detainer proceedings, notwithstanding sections 789, 790.

Action by George Wagner against A. Havard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. M. Hoeffer and Finlay Cook, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer. The points raised by appellant relate to the giving of the statutory notice.

The defendant occupied the premises under the terms of a written lease for a term of years. The lease contained a clause providing that, if the lessee violated any of its covenants, the lessor might by notice in writing declare the lease forfeited, and in that event the holding thereafter should be construed to be a tenancy from month to month only and for the same monthly rental as stated in the lease. The lessors, on account of certain claimed specified breaches of covenants, on May 27, 1926, served written notice upon defendant declaring the said lease forfeited; "said forfeiture to take effect June 1, 1926, on and after which date your further holding of such premises will be a tenancy from month to month only. * * *" This was the only notice served on defendant. The action was thereafter commenced on July 12, 1926.

The complaint alleged:

"That on the 1st day of June, 1926, defendant was in possession of the premises at 2791 Sixteenth street, San Francisco, Cal., under a month to month tenancy from plaintiff as landlord. That on the 27th day of May, 1926, plaintiff served notice on defendant that the said month to month tenancy would be terminated to take effect June 30, 1926."

The answer denied holding under a month to month tenancy, denied any termination of such tenancy, set up the lease, and alleged faithful performance by defendant.

The court found that the lease had been violated by defendant, and gave plaintiff judgment in unlawful detainer and $500 damages.

Appellant claims that the 30-day notice of termination of the month to month tenancy commencing June 1st was prematurely given, because it was given May 27th, several days before the month to month tenancy began, as was said in Stoppelkamp v. Mangeot, 42 Cal. 316. He furthermore claims that, before this special proceeding of unlawful detainer could be commenced, it was necessary personal property which is 'specific enough to be identified.

5. Trover and conversion — 2—Character of property which is subject to trover action is not stipulated by statute (Civ. Code, §§ 663, 3336).

No statute of California purports to state just what character of personal property is subject to action for trover, notwithstanding Civ. Code, §§ 663 and 3336.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action for damages for conversion of a laundry route brought by Frederick Olschewski, trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of the Eagle Laundry Company, bankrupt, against W. G. Hudson, executor of the estate of James W. Murphy, deceased. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph E. Bien, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cullinan & Hickey, of San Francisco (William T. Sweigert, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered against plaintiff for failure to amend after the sustaining of a demurrer on the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The effect of the challenged ruling upon the demurrer was to hold that an action for conversion does not lie for the alleged appropriation and sale by an agent of a laundry route.

Plaintiff is trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of the Eagle Laundry Company, a bankrupt corporation. Defendant is the executor of the estate of James T. Murphy, deceased. Prior to his death the deceased had been the agent of said laundry company in charge of route A in San Francisco, working for a compensation of $35 per week. The complaint alleges that on September 17, 1924, the Eagle Laundry Company was adjudged a bankrupt, and plaintiff was duly appointed and qualified as trustee thereof; that, for a period long prior to August 2, 1924, the deceased was employed and acted for said company in charge of route A in San Francisco, and as such agent "was given charge and control of numerous customers * * * to collect for and deliver * * * laundry * * * for the purpose of washing, ironing, etc., and * * * to collect the money due for such service * * *"; that about July 28, 1924, the assignee in bankruptcy of said laundry company negotiated a sale of said laundry route, together with seven other routes alleged to have belonged to said Eagle Laundry Company, and thereupon demanded of said agent that he deliver to said purchaser of said route A all "memoranda and the list of customers, * * * and all laundry and washing collected * * *"; that said agent refused to comply with said demand, but, upon the contrary, on August 4, 1924, purported to sell said route A to the Crystal Laundry Company of San Francisco, a competitive laundry company, and agreed to "turn over all work and laundry collected upon said route A to said alleged purchaser, the Crystal Laundry Company," in consideration of a certain percentage of the gross business thus arising from said route; that thereafter said agent acted as the "outside driver" for said Crystal Laundry Company; that said acts of appropriation and purported sale of said route A on the part of said agent constituted a conversion of said property rights of said bankrupt estate, to its damage in the sum of $2,500. Subsequently James T. Murphy died, and, upon proceedings duly had, the defendant was appointed and qualified as executor of the estate of said deceased, and this action for damages for conversion was thereupon instituted against the estate of said deceased.

[1] Apparently said laundry route consisted of a number of customers of said bankrupt estate who resided in a certain district of San Francisco designated as route A. It must be assumed that, as an agent and employee in charge of this route for said company, the deceased was possessed of knowledge of the list of individuals residing in said district who were accustomed to patronize his employer, although it is not affirmatively alleged that he had a list or memorandum of the names of customers, either written or otherwise, or that he had access to any such list. However, as such confidential agent, he was bound to exercise utmost good faith in behalf of his employer, and not take advantage of his trade knowledge and information secured in the course of his employment, to use it for his personal benefit. Civ. Code, §§ 1983-1988. In the case of Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 99, 102, 130 P. 1180, 1182 (44 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1159, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 628), it is said:

"There can be no question, * * * but that defendant's agency was one of trust and confidence. * * * The names of the customers of a business concern whose trade and patronage have been secured by years of business effort and advertising, and the expenditure of time and money, constituting a part of the good will of a business which enterprise and foresight have built up, should be deemed just as sacred and entitled to the same protection as a secret of compounding some article of manufacture and commerce."

Manifestly a laundry route does not consist solely of a specific district or territory, nor does it consist of a vested right to, or monopoly of, the patronage of all the residents of said district. Competing laundry companies may possess independent lists of customers residing in the same house, block, or district. Obviously, a customer of one laundry company to-day, for good and valid reasons, or for no reason whatever, may become the customer of a competing company tomorrow. For friendship, whim, better service, or cheaper prices, a customer may change his laundry at will. No laundry company may have a vested property right to claim, as customers, particular individuals, nor all the residents of a specific district. The field is open for fair competition on the part of any and all who desire to solicit patronage. In New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, 174 Cal. 26, 161 P. 990, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1022, it is said:

"To restrain a person lawfully engaged in a laundry business from receiving unlaundered goods from certain former patrons is to sanction, to that extent, the establishment of a trade blacklist, thereby depriving such patrons, without any fault on their part, of the right to have their laundry work done where they will. The constitutional guaranties of liberty include the privilege of every citizen to freely select those tradesmen to whom he may desire to extend his patronage, and equity cannot invade or take away this right, either directly or indirectly."

[2] It is, however, the duty of a laundry route agent to extend uniform courtesy and fair treatment, and take no undue advantage of his trade knowledge, so that he may retain the good will and patronage of the individual customers for the benefit of his employer. A list of laundry customers is a property right which may be appropriately protected, but it is not a tangible right which may be handled and transferred like stocks, bonds, personal effects, household goods, or animals. The property right of a laundry route is akin to the good will of a business. Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, supra. The good will of a business is susceptible of ownership. Civ. Code, § 655. Unlawful interference with property rights in the good will of a business, or the benefits of trade and patronage of a specific list of customers in a definite route, may be protected by injunctive relief in a court of equity. 14 Cal. Jur. 189, § 17; New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, supra; Cornish v. Dickey, 172 Cal. 120, 155 P. 629; Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, supra; Mackechnie Bread Co. v. Huber, 60 Cal. App. 539, 213 P. 285. But there is nothing definite or tangible in the character of the ordinary list of laundry customers which makes an effort to transfer the district in which they live subject to an action of conversion.

[3] No authority has been furnished which sustains the maintenance of an action in trover or conversion for the unlawful interference with a laundry route, or any similar property right. Clearly the proceeding in conversion was not intended to reach so in-tangible, uncertain, and indefinite a property right. The very meaning of the word "conversion," as it is used in this sense, is to "change into another form, substance or state; to transform, or change, as in law, the wrongful appropriation to one's own use of the goods of another." Standard Dictionary. The very definition of the word presupposes the existence of tangible goods or chattels in a form capable of being changed or transformed, turned over, delivered, or appropriated for the use and benefit of the wrongdoer. In 38 Cyc. 2011, it is said that conversion lies for "every species of tangible personal property which is the subject of private ownership." In this case conversion is used as a term synonymous with trover. Black's Law Dict. 1174. Trover comes from a French word meaning to find, and is defined as "a form of action which lies to recover damages against one who has, without right converted to his own use goods or personal chattels, in which the plaintiff has a general or special property. * * * It was originally an action of trespass on the case where goods were found by the defendant and retained against the plaintiff's rightful claim. The manner of retaining possession soon came to be disregarded, as the substantial part of the action is the conversion to the defendant's use; so that the action lies whether the goods came into the defendant's possession by finding or otherwise, if he fails to deliver them upon the rightful claim of the plaintiff. It differs from detinue and replevin in this, that it is brought for damages and not for the specific articles; and from trespass in this, that the injury is not necessarily a forcible one, as trover may be brought in any case where trespass for injury to personal property will lie." 3 Bouv. Law Dict. (3d Rev.) 3326. Various authorities confine the application of the proceeding of trover or conversion to the wrongful interference with specific tangible goods or chattels. "In substance it (trover) is a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use." 1 Chit. on Pl. (14th Am. Ed.) 146. It is "a generic name applied to those torts arising from" the wrongful conversion of "any particular piece of personal property * * * owned by another." Spellman v. R. Co., 35 S. C. 475, 14 S. E. 947, 28 Am. St. Rep. 858. "In form it is a fiction, in substance a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use." 1 Burr. 31. "Trover lies for specific chattels wrongfully converted, and not for money had and received for payment of debts. It does not operate on chattels generally, but specifically, such as money in coin or bills, animals or other property capable of identification as being the actual property or thing wrongfully taken and converted." Kerwin v. Balhatchett, 147 Ill. App. 561, 566.

for plaintiff to follow the 30-day notice of termination with a 3-day notice of re-entry, under Civil Code, § 791, citing Martin v. Splivalo, 56 Cal. 128; King v. Connolly, 51 Cal. 181; Smith v. Hill, 63 Cal. 51; Diggs v. Porteus, 5 Cal. Unrep. 753, 33 P. 447.

Respondent's answer to this second point is substantially that the last-cited decisions should be overruled. The apparent inconsistency of permitting an unlawful detainer proceeding without the 3-day notice where the tenancy terminates by expiration of the term provided in the lease, and, on the other hand, requiring the 3-day notice where an estate at will is terminated by a 30-day notice under Civil Code, § 789, is pointed out (15 Cal. Jur. 806, § 221), but these decisions have never been overruled, and they are binding authority. The distinction is said to rest upon the meaning of the word "re-entry" as used in Civil Code, §§ 790 and 791. Earl Orchard Co. v. Fava, 138 Cal. 76, 79, 70 P. 1073.

During June, 1926, defendant held as a tenant at will from month to month and not for a fixed term, as contended by respondent. It would be reasoning in a circle to state that a month to month tenancy was converted into a tenancy for a fixed definite term by the notice of termination and then hold for that reason that the 3-day notice is not required. That could just as well have been done in the cases above cited. The plaintiff's complaint here definitely alleged a month to month tenancy. The peculiar provision of the lease here did not give the right of re-entry upon breach of covenant, but only the right to convert the leasehold estate into a month to month tenancy, and the complaint was not based upon right of re-entry for breach of covenants or conditions under subdivision 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1161.

Under the authorities cited, the plaintiff could not maintain unlawful detainer proceedings without following the 30-day notice of termination with a 3-day notice to surrender, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

PENNELL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND
FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 5896.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 8, 1927.

I. Judgment §243—Judgment for payment of fees directly to attorney of party is void.

A judgment or order for payment of fees directly to an attorney for one of the parties, being in favor of person not party to the suit, is irregular, and void.

2. Contempt §21—Court cannot punish for contempt for failure to obey void judgment.

Judgment and order for payment of fees to the attorney of a party being void, the court is without jurisdiction to punish for contempt on account of failure to obey the same.

3. Contempt §54(4)—Affidavit for contempt not stating sufficient facts, court does not have jurisdiction of the person.

If affidavit, filed as basis for contempt proceeding, does not state facts sufficient to charge a contempt, the court does not have jurisdiction of the person therein sought to be charged with contempt.

4. Prohibition §10(2)—Further proceedings in contempt without jurisdiction will be stayed by prohibition, where it is manifest that otherwise court will proceed.

Further proceedings for contempt will be stayed by writ of prohibition, where, notwithstanding lack of jurisdiction, it is manifest from the court's finding petitioner guilty of contempt, and continuing sentence to a subsequent day, that otherwise it will proceed.

5. Judgment §485—Judgment void on face may be attacked collaterally, notwithstanding motion to vacate, denial, and no appeal.

Judgment for payment of fees to attorney of party, being void on its face, may be attacked collaterally in contempt proceeding, notwithstanding there was a motion to vacate it on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and this was denied, and no appeal was taken.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the respondents from conducting any further proceedings on account of an order to show cause why the petitioner should not be punished for contempt of court for failure to pay attorney's fees in a divorce action, as ordered and adjudged by the respondent court.

It appears from the pleadings that an interlocutory judgment of divorce was granted by respondent court on December 28, 1925, wherein it was ordered as follows:

"It is further ordered that W. C. Pennell pay to Duke Stone, Esquire, attorney for plaintiff, Alice Pennell, the sum of $200, attorney's fees, payable forthwith."

Immediately thereafter the defendant in said action gave notice of motion to vacate the said judgment, including that portion thereof providing for the payment of attorney's fees, on the ground that such provision was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and void. This motion was denied, and the defendant was ordered to pay Duke Stone, attorney for plaintiff, the sum of $50 additional fees for appearance on the hearing of said motion. No appeal was taken. On August 29, 1927, an order to show cause, based upon the affidavit of plaintiff, alleging the issuance of the said order and judgment to pay the sums of $200 and $50 to plaintiff's attorney, Duke Stone, was issued by the respondent court ordering the defendant to appear in said court and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court for failure to abide by said order and judgment for the payment of attorney's fees. At the hearing of the order to show cause defendant objected to the jurisdiction of the court to issue said order to show cause or to conduct a hearing thereon, upon the ground that the said order contained in said interlocutory judgment for payment of attorney's fees and said supplemental order for the payment of attorney's fees were in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and were wholly void on their face. The objections were overruled, and, on September 23d, defendant was found guilty of contempt, and sentence continued until October 3d. On October 1st this application for writ of prohibition was filed, and an alternative writ was issued by this court on said date.

[1-4] The rule is well settled that a judgment or order for the payment of fees directly to an attorney for one of the parties is a judgment in favor of persons not parties to the suit, and for that reason irregular and void. Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 39, 16 P. 345; In re Levinson, 108 Cal. 450, 458, 41 P. 483, 42 P. 479; Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 770, 79 P. 537; Chavez v. Scully, 62 Cal. App. 6, 216 P. 46. In the latter case it is said (page 8 [216 P. 47]):

"Statutes similar to the section of the Code now under consideration have frequently been before the Supreme Court of this state, and that court has invariably held that, where the court is given authority to allow attorneys' fees in certain actions or proceedings, such allowance must be made to the party to the action and it has annulled and declared void in every instance, as far as our information goes, orders and decrees made directly in favor of the attorneys. In a divorce action under the authority of section 137 of the Civil Code, the court ordered attorneys' fees paid to the plaintiff's attorneys. The Supreme Court set aside the order and in doing so used the following language: 'Section 137 regulates the matter in this state, and that section contemplates an order to pay to the wife. * * * When awarded, either by statute or upon general principles, "suit money" is awarded to her; and by section 137 counsel fees, if ordered to be paid, are ordered as part of her necessary expenses for prosecuting or defending the action for di-voice. * * * The order here was a direct judgment for money in favor of persons not parties to the suit, and to that extent was irregular and void.' Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1 (16 P. 345)."

In the instant case, the judgment and order for the payment of fees to the plaintiff's attorney being wholly void, the respondent court was without jurisdiction to punish the petitioner herein for contempt of court on account of his failure to obey such void order and judgment. If the affidavit filed with the trial court does not state facts sufficient to charge a contempt of court, that court would not have jurisdiction of the person therein sought to be charged with contempt. Commercial Bank of Spanish America v. Superior Court of California in and for City and County of San Francisco, 192 Cal. 395, 396, 220 P. 422, and cases cited. The remedy for such an excess of jurisdiction ordinarily is by writ of certiorari or by habeas corpus, where the person is committed to imprisonment by an order void because of excess of jurisdiction. Commercial Bank of Spanish America v. Superior Court of California in and for City and County of San Francisco, supra; 4 Cal. Jur. 1030, § 10. The trial of contempt proceedings has been stayed by writ of prohibition, where it is manifest from previous orders or decisions of the court that it will proceed, notwithstanding the lack of jurisdiction. Commercial Bank of Spanish America v. Superior Court of California in and for City and County of San Francisco, supra. In the present case it was manifest that the court would proceed notwithstanding lack of jurisdiction, since the petitioner was found guilty of contempt, and sentence continued to a subsequent date.

[5] Respondent contends that, since the judgment was attacked directly by the motion to vacate on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, which motion was denied, and no appeal taken from the judgment, the question of jurisdiction was thereby finally adjudicated, and therefore cannot be raised collaterally. The rule is well recognized that judgments void on their face may always be attacked either directly or collaterally. In Estate of Pusey, 180 Cal. 368, 374, 181 P. 648, 650, it is said, quoting from Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342, 348:

"A judgment absolutely void may be attacked anywhere, directly or collaterally whenever it presents itself, either by parties or strangers. It is simply a nullity, and can be neither a basis nor evidence of any right whatever." See, also, Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 638, 42 P. 295, 50 Am. St. Rep. 67, and Adams v. Adams, 154 Mass. 290, 28 N. E. 260, 13 L. R. A. 275."

Moreover, the affirmance of a void judgment on appeal does not make it valid. Ball v. Tolman, 135 Cal. 375, 67 P. 339, 87 Am. St.

Rep. 110; Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 633, 42 P. 295, 50 Am. St. Rep. 67. In the present case there was no appeal, but the judgment was void as to payment of attorney's fees to an attorney who was not a party to the action.

A peremptory writ of prohibition will issue prohibiting respondent from conducting further proceedings against the petitioner for contempt.

PEOPLE v. HALL. (Cr. 1000.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 16, 1927.

1. Criminal law §539(1)—Exclusion of transcript of testimony at preliminary examination held not error, in absence of claim that it would impeach witnesses at hearing to determine degree of offense.

Where witnesses, testifying at preliminary examination, testified at hearing to determine degree of robbery after plea of guilty, and were cross-examined by defendant's counsel, exclusion of transcript of testimony taken at preliminary hearing held not error, in view of lack of claim that it would impeach such witnesses.

2. Robbery §24(1)—Evidence that defendant's weapon was loaded held to support conviction for first degree robbery (Pen. Code, § 211a).

Evidence that defendant's weapon with which he committed robbery was loaded held to support conviction for first degree robbery, under Pen. Code, § 211a.

3. Robbery §24(1)—Defendant's acts and language held to constitute implied assertion that weapon was loaded, making offense first degree robbery (Pen. Code, § 211a).

In prosecution for robbery, defendant's acts and language held to constitute admission by conduct and implied assertion that weapon was loaded, making offense first degree robbery within Pen. Code, § 211a.

4. Criminal law §273—Plea of guilty to charge of robbery held conclusive admission that taking was accomplished by means of force or fear (Pen. Code, § 211).

Under Pen. Code, § 211, plea of guilty to charge of robbery held to preclude inquiry as to whether victim was put in fear, since plea was conclusive admission that taking was by means of force or fear.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

George Hall was convicted of first degree robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. McCray, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant entered a plea of guilty to a charge of robbery, and the court thereupon took evidence to determine the degree of the crime, and adjudged the defendant guilty of robbery of the first degree. The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

"All robbery which is perpetrated by torture or by a person being armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon is robbery in the first degree. All other kinds of robbery are of the second degree." Pen. Code, § 211a.

[1] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the transcript of the testimony taken at the preliminary examination of the defendant. The witnesses who testified at the preliminary examination also testified at the hearing in the superior court to determine the degree of the crime, and were there cross-examined by counsel for defendant. In offering such transcript in evidence, counsel for defendant said: "I don't say that it will impeach them (the witnesses) in any respect." No foundation was laid for impeachment of any of the witnesses. The ruling was not error.

[2, 3] It is also contended that the evidence does not show that the gun used by defendant in committing the crime was loaded. The men who were robbed testified that the defendant drew a gun on them, ordered them to hold up their hands, and lined them up with their faces to the wall, and then took their money from their persons. These men did not know whether the gun was loaded. It was stipulated that the sheriff of Tuolumne county, if called as a witness, would testify that "he took a 38 caliber magazine from a 38 automatic revolver from Blackie Kennedy * * * on the night of the 19th of April, 1927," and kept the magazine, but left the revolver in Kennedy's possession. The robbery charged in this case was committed April 26, 1927. The defendant testified that the revolver used in the robbery was given to him by Kennedy a few days before the robbery; that it did not have a magazine at that time; that Kennedy said "that I could find one for it"; and that it had no magazine at the time of the robbery. It also appears that the defendant had possession of the revolver when he was arrested, about six weeks or two months after the robbery, and that it had no magazine at that time. It is not difficult to procure a magazine for such a weapon, and the defendant may have procured one after the revolver was given to him, if it was so given to him. The only evidence in support of the defendant's contention that the revolver was not loaded is his own testimony to that effect. Few criminals would ever be convicted if their explanations were always accepted as gospel truth. They do not usually arm themselves with unloaded guns when they go out to commit robberies, and in this case the court was not bound to accept the defendant's statement that the gun was unloaded when the circumstances indicated the contrary. The defendant's acts and the language used by him in the commission of the robbery constituted an admission by conduct, an implied assertion that the gun was loaded. People v. Montgomery, 15 Cal. App. 315, 114 P. 792; People v. Seawright, 72 Cal. App. 414, 237 P. 796. It has been held that an unloaded revolver is a dangerous weapon within the meaning of section 211a of the Penal Code. People v. Egan, 77 Cal. App. 279, 246 P. 337; People v. Shaffer (Cal. App.) 254 P. 666.

[4] Appellant contends that the evidence shows that the particular man he is charged with having robbed "was not afraid." Whether or not the victim of the robbery was put in fear was not a subject of inquiry at the hearing before the court. The defendant's plea of guilty precluded any such inquiry, because such plea was a conclusive admission that the taking was "accomplished by means of force or fear." Pen. Code, § 211.

The judgment is affirmed.

TOON v. MACK INTERNATIONAL MOTOR TRUCK CORPORATION. (Civ. 4499.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 25, 1927.

1. Appeal and error 931(1)—It is presumed that court's findings are warranted by evidence.

It is presumed on appeal that trial judge has sufficient facts before him to warrant findings.

2. Infants 58(2)—Minor over 18 who disaffirms sales contract and restores property, must pay seller amount of depreciation (Civ. Code, § 35).

Minor, who purchased personal property when he was over 18, and restores such property to seller, must pay seller amount in money found by court to be equivalent to the loss sustained by the seller by reason of depreciation while in minor's possession, as condition precedent to an effectual disaffirmance under Civ. Code, § 35.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Edward E. Toon, a minor, by R. Toon, his guardian ad litem, against the Mack International Motor Truck Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Seth B. Smith and Vinton A. Holbrook, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and George W. Prince, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone. The facts material to a consideration of this appeal, so far as shown by the pleadings and findings, are as follows: That the appellant (plaintiff below), at all times hereafter so mentioned was a minor, over the age of 18 years. That on the 12th day of January, 1921, the appellant, as purchaser entered into a contract with the respondent (defendant below), as seller, for the purchase of a five-ton A. C. Mack truck for the purchase price of $7,540.75, payable $1,500 in cash, which payment was made by the appellant to the respondent, and the balance was payable in eighteen payments represented by a series of notes bearing 8 per cent. interest, the first of which matured on March 1, 1921, and the other seventeen maturing one each month thereafter. That subsequently the appellant paid the sum of $225 on the purchase price of said truck; $216.90 being towards the principal of the first maturing note and the balance, or $8.10, being on account of interest. That no other or further payments were made by appellant. Thus altogether the appellant paid the sum of $1,725 to respondent. That at the time the contract was entered into, possession of the truck was delivered to the appellant, who continued to hold the same until the 14th day of June, 1921, when it was repossessed from him by the respondent for his failure to make the payments required by the contract, which contract provided that title should remain in the respondent until the truck was fully paid for, and that for failure to make such payments the respondent could repossess itself of the truck, whereupon all of the rights of the appellant should terminate. That at the time said truck was repossessed it was in a worn and dilapidated condition and had depreciated in the sum of $2,000 in value, and the reasonable value thereof at that time was $5,500. That subsequent to such repossession, and on the 21st day of September, 1921, the appellant in writing notified the respondent that he disaffirmed the contract and demanded back all moneys paid by him under the contract. That the appellant has delivered back to respondent the identical truck received by him and all that he received under the contract for the purchase of said truck other than the depreciated value thereof.

The appellant claims that, this being an appeal on the judgment roll alone, the only question presented for review is whether or not the findings support the judgment, and counsel agree that—

"The issue involved in this appeal is whether or not a minor over the age of 18 years, who disaffirms a contract for the purchase of personal property and restores said property to the seller, must pay to the latter the amount in money found by the lower court to be equivalent to the loss sustained by the seller by reason of the depreciation in value of the article purchased, during its possession by the minor, as a condition precedent to an effectual disaffirmance."

Section 35 of the Civil Code is as follows:

"In all cases other than those specified in sections thirty-six and thirty-seven, the contract of a minor, if made whilst he is under the age of eighteen, may be disaffirmed by the minor himself, either before his majority or within a reasonable time afterwards; or, in case of his death within that period, by his heirs or personal representatives; and if the contract be made by the minor whilst he is over the age of eighteen, it may be disaffirmed in like manner upon restoring the consideration to the party from whom it was received, or paying its equivalent."

This court has very carefully considered the arguments and citations of counsel but finds that the law invoked in this class of cases is so completely set out in the case of Murdock v. Fisher Finance Corporation (Cal. App.) 251 P. 319, including practically all cases in this state and some Oregon and New York cases, which have material bearing, that we feel that no considerable discussion is necessary, other than to quote certain portions of that opinion. In the case of Rice v. Butler, 160 N. Y. 578, 55 N. E. 275, 47 L. R. A. 303, 73 Am. St. Rep. 703, we find this language:

"It will thus be seen that the cases to which we have alluded recognize the principle which we think ought to be applied to this case, and that is, that the plaintiff, having had the use of the bicycle during the time intervening between her purchase and its return, ought, in justice and in fairness, to account for its reasonable use or deterioration in value. Otherwise she would be making use of the privilege of infancy as a sword, and not as a shield. In the absence of wanton injury to the property, the value of the use would be deemed to include the deterioration in value, and, under the evidence in this case, and, as found by the trial court, the use equaled the sum paid."

We call particular attention to the words, "to account for its reasonable use or deterioration in value," and to the words, "the value of the use would be deemed to include the deterioration in value," also to that portion of the Murdock opinion, supra, which reads as follows:

"It is the settled rule of law that, as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action in rescission, the plaintiff must have restored the consideration or must have offered to do so. 4 Cal. Jur. pp. 764, 765; Crouch v. Wilson, 183 Cal. 576, 584, 191 P. 916. This rule has become so well established that it has been held that the plaintiff, seeking rescission, must allege and prove that he has either restored or offered to restore the consideration. Crouch v. Wilson, supra. There are no California cases directly on the point, but the reasoning of the cases arising under section 1691 is equally applicable to those arising under section 35, and cases from other jurisdictions arising under similar statutes support the conclusion that, when a minor over 18 years of age seeks to disaffirm his contract, he must, as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action, either restore the consideration he has received or pay its equivalent, or he must offer to do so."

We call attention also to this quotation in the Murdock Case, wherein the court says, referring to the case of Petit v. Liston, 97 Or. 464, 191 P. 660, 11 A. L. R. 487:

"Petit v. Liston, supra, involved the purchase of a motorcycle by a minor, and the opinion contains some language which is particularly appropriate here: 'We think, where the minor has not been overreached in any way, and there has been no undue influence, and the contract is a fair and reasonable one, and the minor has actually paid money on the purchase price, and taken and used the article, that he ought not to be permitted to recover the amount actually paid, without allowing the vendor of the goods the reasonable compensation for the use and depreciation of the article while in his hands. * * * We think this rule will fully and fairly protect the minor against injustice or imposition, and at the same time it will be fair to the business man who has dealt with such minor in good faith. This rule is best adapted to modern conditions, and especially to the conditions in our far Western states.'"

[1, 2] It seems to be plain, from the statements of counsel in their briefs and from the findings of the court in this case, that the plaintiff did not pay or offer to pay the consideration received by him, further than to return the truck. The court found that the truck had depreciated during the time of the possession of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000, and that the plaintiff had only paid to the defendants $1,725. The quotation by our appellate court from the New York case which uses the words, "reasonable use or deterioration in value," and later says that the value of the use would be deemed to include the deterioration in value, would seem to indicate the opinion that the deterioration which may be well considered a synonym for depreciation, is at least one of the measures of the consideration received by the plaintiff. Further it is to be presumed that the judge of the superior court, in trying this case, had sufficient facts before him to warrant his findings, and that the use of the word depreciation may rightfully include the value of the use of the truck during the five months' period that it was in the possession of the plaintiff.

The fact that the plaintiff had paid $1,725 might preclude the necessity for an offer of or payment of a consideration for the use of the truck during the five months' period, but the court, having found a depreciation in value during the possession by the plaintiff of the sum of $2,000, and there being no showing that any one other than plaintiff had had the use, care, or control of the truck during the period above mentioned, or that there was any other reason for depreciation, and its judgment being for the defendant, together with its costs of suit, has thus made an allowance to the defendant of the sum of $275, the difference between $2,000 and $1,725 paid, which was a decision which the court was authorized to and did make. Therefore the judgment will not be disturbed.

As to the attitude of the court upon the law, and interpretation of the sections of our Code and decisions which may have more or less bearing upon the issues of this case, we believe that they have been sufficiently discussed in the case of Murdock v. Fisher Finance Corporation, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

McLAUGHLIN v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5902.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 10, 1927.

Master and servant §417(3)—Certiorari did not lie to review award, which, if erroneous in not discharging one party, was within Industrial Accident Commission's jurisdiction.

Where compensation was awarded against petitioner, and, on rehearing on petitioner's claim that applicant for compensation was not at time of injury his employee, but was employed by corporation, award was made against corporation, but petitioner was not released, certiorari did not lie to review award, even if erroneous, since certiorari may be granted only where there is an excess of jurisdiction by tribunal exercising judicial functions, and here commission had jurisdiction of proceedings and subject-matter.

Petition for certiorari by James L. McLaughlin against the State Industrial Accident Commission and George Heine to review an order and award of the Industrial Accident Commission adjusting claim of George Heine, employee, against petitioner, as employer, and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, insurer. Writ discharged, and proceedings dismissed.

Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Thacher & Wright, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Certiorari to review certain proceedings had before the Industrial Accident Commission.

On December 7, 1926, George Heine filed an application with the commission for the adjustment of a claim against James L. McLaughlin, the petitioner herein, and New Amsterdam Casualty Company as insurer, and, after a hearing, an award was made against the parties last named. Subsequently a petition for rehearing was filed by James L. McLaughlin alleging that the applicant for compensation was not, at the time the injury occurred, in the employ of McLaughlin, but was employed by James L. McLaughlin Company, a corporation. The petition for rehearing was granted, and, the corporation having been joined as a party, upon a further hearing it was found that, at the time the injury occurred, the applicant was in the employ of the corporation named above. An award was accordingly made against the corporation, but contained no order discharging James L. McLaughlin, the petitioner herein, from liability, and it is claimed that, by reason of the omission, petition is entitled to relief in the present proceeding.

In order that relief by certiorari may be granted, there must have been an excess of jurisdiction by a tribunal exercising judicial functions; and an excess of jurisdiction is to be distinguished from errors of either law or fact committed by a judicial tribunal within the limits of its jurisdiction. In the Matter of Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 363, 113 P. 684; Karry v. Sup. Ct., 162 Cal. 281, 122 P. 475, 123 P. 760. In the present case the commission had jurisdiction of the parties to the proceeding and of the subject-matter; and its failure to order the discharge of the petitioner from liability, if erroneous, was an error committed in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and is not subject to review in this proceeding.

The writ of review is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

OCEAN SHORE R. CO. v. SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. et al. (Civ. 5450.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

Rehearing Denied with Modification Dec. 29, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Easements §24—At common law, right of way, being servitude in gross, was not assignable.

At common law, a right of way, being a servitude in gross as distinguished from an easement, could not be assigned.

2. Railroads §81—Rights of way granted to railroads may be assigned.

A railroad company may assign a right of way received by it.

3. Easements Ⓒ30(1)—Nonuser of right of way does not necessarily show abandonment thereof.

While a right of way may be lost by abandonment, nonuser of it does not necessarily show abandonment.

4. Railroads Ⓒ82(2)—Intention of railroad determines whether it has abandoned right of way.

The intention of a railroad is the real matter to determine the question whether it has abandoned a right of way, and such intention is not to be inferred from the outward and public acts of the owner only, but also from its dealings with relation to its title.

5. Railroads Ⓒ82(6)—Evidence held not to sustain finding that railroad had abandoned right of way.

In railroad's suit to quiet title wherein the defense was that the company had abandoned its right of way, evidence held not to show such abandonment.

6. Estoppel Ⓒ110—In suit to quiet title, that defendant was innocent purchaser without notice, being estoppel defense, should have been specially pleaded.

In a suit by a railroad company to quiet title to land formerly used by it for a right of way, the defense of one defendant that it was an innocent purchaser for value without notice of the plaintiff's rights, being a defense on the ground of estoppel, should have been pleaded specially.

7. Vendor and purchaser Ⓒ235—In suit to quiet title, contention that defendant was innocent purchaser without notice could not be availed of in absence of showing consideration had been paid.

In suit by railroad to quiet title to land formerly used as a right of way, a defendant's contention that it was an innocent purchaser for value without notice could not be availed of in the absence of a showing that the consideration had been paid.

8. Principal and agent Ⓒ178(3)—Notice to state highway commission of railroad's claim to land over which state highway right of way was purchased was notice to state.

Notice to the state highway commission that a railroad claimed land over which the state highway had purchased a right of way from another was notice to the state of such claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by the Ocean Shore Railroad Company against the Spring Valley Water Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco (A. E. Shaw, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Young & Hudson and Edward Fitzpatrick, all of San Francisco, for respondent Spring Valley Water Co.

Paul F. Fratessa, of San Francisco, for respondent California State Highway Commission.

Louis E. Goodman, of San Francisco (B. F. Rabinowitz, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Lake Merced Golf and Country Club.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This is an action by plaintiff to quiet title to a right of way claimed by it through land of the defendant Spring Valley Water Company situated in the counties of San Francisco and San Mateo. The defendants answered jointly, setting up abandonment of the right of way by plaintiff and its reversion to the Spring Valley Water Company, ownership by defendant state of California of a right of way for a public highway established over the lands, and a contract right of the defendant Lake Merced Golf and Country Club to purchase part of the land, and that the right of way claimed by the plaintiff intersects both of the latter. Judgment went for defendants, from which plaintiff appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

The principal issue raised by the pleadings and considered at the trial was whether or not there was such an abandonment of plaintiff's right of way that the title thereto merged again into the title of the defendant water company.

Plaintiff introduced in evidence a deed by defendant water company conveying the right of way described in the complaint, for an expressed consideration of $10, to plaintiff's predecessor in title, "its successors and assigns forever." There was some argument as to whether or not the right of way was for railroad purposes only, but it clearly appears from the deed that no other use was contemplated by the parties, and that use more than ordinarily restricted, evidently for the purpose of protecting from pollution the grantor's water supply. While a nominal consideration was expressed in the deed, it is shown by oral testimony that the actual consideration was at the rate of not less than $1,200 an acre for the land covered by the right of way. The railroad was constructed in 1907 and operated until about the end of 1920, when, upon the application of plaintiff the Railroad Commission having granted permission to discontinue its operation, plaintiff took up the rails and disposed of them and of its rolling stock. Officials of the plaintiff corporation testified that it was expected to liquidate its affairs when the right of way and other lands owned by it were disposed of. After the removal of the rails part of the land was farmed by tenants of the water company, including the land claimed by the golf club. A highway was constructed over a right of way granted by the water company to the state, crossing plaintiff's right of way. The golf club entered into its contract of purchase and into possession of the premises on March 1, 1922, and has been continuously in possession ever since. The deed to plaintiff's predecessor in interest was not recorded until March 29, 1922, in San Mateo county, in which the golf club's land is situate, and no actual notice to the golf club of plaintiff's rights was shown. At the time this action was brought the consideration for the purchase by the club had not been paid. If the conclusion of the trial court is correct that the rights of plaintiff were terminated by its acts as recited, that disposes of the case as to all of the defendants.

[1-4] Taking into consideration the price paid, and the agreement that no trains should stop on the land, no stations or other buildings be constructed, no debris of any kind be allowed to escape upon the land, it is evident that the right of way was not conveyed by the water company in any degree as a subsidy, or for any consideration of its usefulness to the land. The provisions of the deed rather suggest that the railroad was admitted as an unavoidable nuisance to be hedged about by conditions designed to make it as unobjectionable as possible. There was no agreement that the right of way should be used by the grantee or its successors for any specified time or at all. The right of way under consideration is as much property within its limitations as an estate in fee. It may be conveyed in writing as any other interest in real property. Rights of way granted to common carriers and other public utilities are servitudes in gross as distinguished from easements. At common law, a servitude in gross attached to a person and not to a dominant tenement. Such servitudes were not assignable and died with the owner. There seems to be a dearth of authority as to the nature of the tenure secured by public service corporations under modern conditions. Of necessity, the common-law attribute of non-assignability does not inhere in them. That is not claimed by respondents here. This plaintiff in fact acquired its title by assignment, and its original title is conceded by respondents.

The position of respondents is that the acts of the plaintiff constituted such an abandonment of the right of way as to terminate the servitude. The decisions are uniform to the effect that, while a right may be lost by abandonment, the nonuser is only one of the elements of proof from which such an abandonment may be inferred. The real question to be determined is the intention of the owner of the right. The evidence in this case clearly shows that the railroad company always considered the right of way as an asset. An option was granted by it, and was outstanding some time before the suit was begun, and was still outstanding at the time of the trial, for the sale of the right of way. Negotiations were had with the highway commission for granting a crossing over the said right of way on condition of the state providing a local clearance over the railroad. The liquidation of the plaintiff had been held up pending disposition of this right of way. It is very doubtful whether a right of way acquired as this one was by grant in perpetuity upon payment of full value of the land to be occupied, and for no consideration of its value to the servient tenement, can be forfeited in any other manner than by prescription. But if it may be forfeited by abandonment, the intent to abandon must clearly appear.

The intention to abandon is not to be inferred from the outward and public acts of the owner only, but also from its dealings with relation to its title. "In the absence of a statute, mere nonuser for any length of time will not work an abandonment." 33 Cyc. 222; see, also, 1 Corpus Juris, 8. * * * The rule above stated is fully supported by the decisions in this state and elsewhere [citing cases]. * * * In Moon v. Rollins [36 Cal. 333, 95 Am. Dec. 181], in defining abandonment, the court said: 'It is a question of intention and has so held over and over again, and not a question of time; except so far as the jury are entitled to consider lapse of time in connection with other circumstances of claim, or nonclaim and acts of ownership and dominion, or a want of such acts, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention.' People v. Southern Pacific Co., 172 Cal. 692, 158 P. 177.

[5] Here the whole course of dealing by appellant with the right of way as shown by its uncontroverted evidence negatives the inference that might be drawn from its public acts, and is not inconsistent with those acts. The finding of the trial court that appellant had abandoned the right of way is not sustained by the evidence.

[6, 7] Besides the arguments in which all of the respondents join in support of the judgment, it is urged on behalf of the golf and country club that it is an innocent purchaser for value without notice of appellant's right. This is a defense by way of estoppel and should have been specially pleaded. There was no evidence or stipulation that the club had paid all or any part of the consideration for the land, or had done anything more than enter into possession of it. One who claims as an innocent purchaser without notice must also show that he has paid the consideration. Lindley v. Blumberg, 7 Cal. App. 140, 93 P. 894.

[8] The same considerations are presented on behalf of the state of California and the state highway commission as are stated for the other respondents. They are not in the same position, however, as the club. The commission had notice of the claims of appellant through its dealings in regard to the highway crossing. The commission is the agency of the state in highway matters, and notice to the former was notice to the latter.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

PEOPLE v. GRACE. (Cr. 1558.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 16, 1927.

1. Courts $\S$ 50—Affidavit asserting belief defendant could not secure fair trial in department where case was set did not justify transfer (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1033, 1034).

Affidavit by counsel for defendant on trial for robbery stating that there had been difficulty on previous trial in drawing jury because of local prejudice and that affiant was informed and believed that fair and impartial trial could not be secured in department where case was set held insufficient, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1033, 1034, to justify court in finding defendant could not have fair and impartial trial, and refusal to transfer case was not error.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(3)—Jury's conviction for robbery on conflicting evidence held conclusive.

Where evidence on trial for robbery was in sharp conflict, jury's verdict of conviction held conclusive.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1153(6)—Court's determination in admitting testimony on preliminary examination, that state used due diligence to procure witness held conclusive, in absence of abuse of discretion.

Trial court's determination, on trial for robbery, in admitting testimony given by witness on preliminary examination, that state had used due diligence to procure the witness at the trial held conclusive, in absence of showing that trial court abused its discretion.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 543(2)—On robbery trial, admitting witness' testimony on preliminary examination held no error, where witness was outside state and service was not attempted while witness was in state because of her sickness.

Admitting testimony of witness given on preliminary examination held not abuse of discretion on robbery trial, where witness was outside state and service had not been attempted while she was in the state because of her sickness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James H. Pope, Judge.

Vernon Young Grace was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Stoddard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The defendant and appellant was found guilty of robbery upon each of three counts contained in an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county.

From the judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he makes this appeal and urges three grounds for a reversal.

First. That the court erred in refusing his request that the trial of his case be transferred from department 28 of the superior court, sitting at Long Beach, to some department of a superior court sitting in Los Angeles city.

Second. That the evidence in the case is insufficient to support the verdict of guilty.

Third. That the court erred in permitting the district attorney to read the testimony of one Mrs. McClure, given at the preliminary examination.

[1] Upon the first point counsel for appellant contents himself with a brief statement that:

"The facts presented upon the motion for a transfer of said cause raised an issue of fact which should have resulted in the granting of the motion for defendant."

The only facts presented on this point, according to the record, is a short affidavit of defendant's counsel that he was attorney for the defendant in a previous trial of the case, and at that time "there was great difficulty experienced in drawing a jury to try the said issue, by reason of local prejudice against the said defendant; that affiant is informed and believes, and upon such belief alleges, that it would be impossible to draw a jury from any panel drawn from the city of Long Beach, before whom this defendant could secure a fair and impartial trial."

Conceding, for the moment only, that section 1033 of the Penal Code is susceptible of the interpretation which appellant places on it, so as to entitle one about to be tried in one department of the superior court of a county that may be sitting in one portion of the county to have his case transferred for trial to another department of the same superior court sitting in another part of the county, there is lacking that showing of conditions which would prevent him from having a fair and impartial trial in the department where his case is set for trial. Section 1034 of the Penal Code requires such a showing of matters, which, if true, would justify the court in finding that the defendant could not have a fair and impartial trial. Manifestly, the affidavit presented as a basis for the motion does not begin to meet the requirements of the statute.

[2] As to the second point urged—the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict—appellant's argument consists in the main of an attack upon the evidence of certain witnesses for the state, claiming that little weight should be given to their testimony because of some conflict in their statements as to the occurrences at the time of the holdup, and further because of the fact that both men who committed the robbery were masked. An examination of the transcript discloses that the sole defense of the defendant was that of an alibi, and he contends that there was an insufficient identification of him as the one who committed the robbery to give support to the verdict of conviction. No good purpose would be served by a detailed consideration of the testimony and other evidence offered on this issue. It suffices to say that the evidence was in sharp conflict, and the jury evidently believed the witnesses who were present at the time of the robbery and who identified the defendant as one of the two who committed the crime, and disbelieved the defendant's own testimony with regard to his being in San Diego at the time of the robbery. Neither dissertation nor citations are necessary to support the proposition that under these circumstances this court will not set aside the finding of the jury.

[3, 4] The third point urged raises the question as to whether a sufficient foundation was laid in order to permit the reading of the testimony of a witness, Mrs. George A. McClure, for the state. Mrs. McClure was one of the persons in the room at the time the robbery was committed, and was a witness for the state at the preliminary examination. At the time of the trial the district attorney stated that Mrs. McClure was out of the state and by reason of her absence he offered her testimony given at the preliminary examination. In support of his offer the district attorney put on the stand one J. D. Hunter, who testified that he was employed by the district attorney's office as a process server; that about two weeks before the trial he received the subpoenas for service upon the witnesses for the state, among them being a subpoena for George A. McClure and one for his wife, Mrs. George A. McClure; that he called upon Mr. McClure at his office and was told by Mr. McClure that Mrs. McClure was then sick in bed; that he did not attempt to serve her at that time. On a second occasion, it does not appear how long after the first, he again interviewed Mr. McClure at his office concerning his wife's condition, and was again informed by Mr. McClure that his wife was still sick in bed. On a third occasion, again the exact time not appearing, but apparently a week or longer before the trial, the process server again undertook to serve a subpoena upon Mrs. McClure and was then informed by Mr. McClure that his wife, Mrs. McClure, was out of the state, and would continue out of the state for some days. In addition, the district attorney put upon the stand George McClure, the husband of the desired witness, who testified that his wife at that time was in Denver, Colo.; that she had left the state of California more than a week prior to the date of the trial. The return of the subpoena issued for Mrs. McClure showed that on August 23, a week prior to the commencement of the trial, when he attempted to serve her, she was out of the state of California. The court overruled the objection of the defendant to the reading of the testimony of Mrs. McClure, and this ruling appellant assigned as error.

It conclusively appears that at the time of the trial, and for at least a week prior thereto, Mrs. McClure was out of the state of California and in Colorado, and hence not amenable to legal process that would compel her to attend as a witness in the case. People v. Caballero, 41 Cal. App. 146, 182 P. 321.

Appellant urges that Hunter, the process server, did not show due diligence in subpoenaing Mrs. McClure, in that he accepted the statement of Mr. McClure, her husband, two weeks before the trial, that Mrs. McClure was home sick in bed, when as a matter of diligence Hunter should have gone to the residence of Mrs. McClure and in some way served her with process before she left the state. It is well settled that the question of the exercise of due diligence in securing the attendance of a witness at a trial is one addressed to the discretion of the trial court and to be determined on the evidence introduced before the court. Unless the evidence is such as to satisfy this court that the trial court abused its discretion, its determination of the matter will not be disturbed. People v. Frank Padilla (Cal. App.) 254 P. 585; People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 P. 467.

We are of the opinion that no error was committed by the trial court in its ruling that permitted the reading of the testimony given by Mrs. McClure in the preliminary examination.

No error appearing, it is ordered that the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial be and they hereby are affirmed.

MESSNER v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3343.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

1. Evidence $\S$ 568(1)—Statement as to what witness thought is entitled to no greater weight than facts in testimony on which it was based.

Witness' statement, in proceeding to review order of board of dental examiners, that "I thought he was the manager," being mere opinion, is entitled to no greater weight than facts to which witness testified on which opinion was based.

2. Evidence $\S$ 317(2)—Hearsay testimony as to what certain person said held of no greater value than facts to which such person testified as witness.

In proceeding to review order of board of dental examiners, hearsay testimony to effect that cashier said certain person was manager of dental firm is of no greater value than facts to which such cashier testified as witness.

3. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 6(2)—Whether one not licensed to practice dentistry was manager of office depends on duties (St. 1915, p. 705, $\S$ 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 236, $\S$ 3).

Whether one not licensed to practice dentistry was manager of dental office so as to be practicing dentistry within St. 1915, p. 705, $\S$ 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 236, $\S$ 3, must be determined by duties he performed or was authorized to perform and not by what his position was called.

4. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 6(2)—One not licensed to practice dentistry, having charge of business end of dental office, held not "manager" within statute relative to practice of dentistry; "manage" (St. 1915, p. 705, $\S$ 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 236, $\S$ 3).

One who had charge of purely business end of dental office, who attended to advertising and books and saw to it that laboratory work was promptly delivered, but did not control or direct professional work performed, is not "manager" so as to be practicing dentistry within St. 1915, p. 705, $\S$ 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 236, $\S$ 3, since to "manage" place of business is to exercise to some extent control or direction thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manage; Manager.]

5. Principal and agent $\S$ 131—Power to hire, discharge, and fix compensation of employee implies power to control work.

Power to hire and discharge and to fix compensation of employee usually implies power to control his work.

6. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 2—Purpose of Dental Act is to insure skill and proficiency in practice of profession (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233).

Purpose of Dental Act (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233), is to bring about and insure skill and proficiency in practice of profession within state.

7. Evidence $\S$ 60—There is presumption that act regulating practice of dentistry has been obeyed (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233).

In absence of evidence, there is presumption that Dental Act (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233), regulating practice of dentistry, has been obeyed.

8. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 11(3)—In proceeding to revoke dentist's license to practice, all intendments are in favor of such dentist (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233).

Dental Act (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233), regulating practice of dentistry, is highly penal, and proceeding thereunder for revocation of license to practice dentistry is in nature of criminal trial, in which all intendments are in favor of accused.

9. Physicians and surgeons $\S$ 11(2)—Dentist's license cannot be suspended for aiding and abetting unlicensed person, where evidence showed such person was not "practicing dentistry" (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233).

Where evidence was insufficient to show that one not licensed to practice dentistry, who was in charge of business end of dental office, was practicing dentistry within Dental Act (St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233), license of another cannot be suspended for aiding and abetting such unlicensed person.

Application by Karl W. Messner for certiorari to review an order of the Board of Dental Examiners of California. Order annulled.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of review, by which petitioner seeks to have annulled an order of respondent board, hereinafter referred to as respondent, suspending his license to practice dentistry for a period of ten years.

The accusation upon which he was tried alleges:

"That on or about March 25, 1927, he 'did willfully and unlawfully aid and abet an unlicensed person, to wit, W. M. Cohn, to practice dentistry, * * * in that the said Karl W. Messner did then and there practice dentistry in an office managed and conducted by the said W. M. Cohn; that the said Karl W. Messner at this said time well knew that the said office was a place where dental operations were performed, and * * * that the said W. M. Cohn was the manager thereof, and that the said W. M. Cohn was participating in the profits with Ralph Mitchell and others as the proprietor thereof."

One of respondent's inspectors testified that on March 26, 1927, he visited the office "conducted by Dr. Ralph Mitchell, and known as 'Dr. Mitchell and Associated Dentists,' at 706 South Broadway in the city of Los Angeles"; that a woman at the information desk informed him that Cohn was manager, but that both Mitchell and Cohn were then absent, and referred him to a woman at another desk, Miss Olson; that Miss Olson also informed him that Cohn was manager, and made out and gave the witness a written list of the employees, in which she inserted "Mr. W. M. Cohn, manager," and "Dr. Ralph Mitchell, employer"; that he did not suggest to Miss Olson that she enter Cohn's name as manager, but "told her to put it exactly as the record showed, the time card." The witness was cross-examined by the accused, who was not represented by counsel, as follows:

"Q. Do you remember when I called you up about the paper? A. I don't remember who it was; somebody called me up * * * and said it was Dr. Mitchell's office and said that the girl had no authority to sign that, that Cohn was not the manager, and to return the paper."

Miss Olson, as a witness for the prosecution, testified that she was cashier of the office, and that at the time alleged in the accusation Cohn was bookkeeper, "superintendent of lab and to prepare the advertising"; that his duty as superintendent of the laboratory was "to see that the work went out on time"; that "all that he did was to attend to the advertising and to keep the books and * * * superintend the laboratory"; that he sometimes signed checks; that "he received dividends"; that Dr. Mitchell signed the dividend checks; that Cohn "was interested the same as the rest of the doctors"; that he purchased supplies for the office; that the receipts of the office were deposited in the bank in the name of "Dr. Ralph Mitchell, trustee"; that she never believed that Cohn was manager, but that "Dr. Mitchell was manager"; that she "inserted Cohn's name as manager because the inspector told her to do so; that she wanted to put him down as advertising manager, and he (the inspector) said, 'No; that covers everything, and so put him down as manager,' instead of writing it all out it covered that"; that Cohn "had money in the trust the same as the rest of them."

A licensed dentist, who was employed in the office at the time alleged in the accusation, was a witness for the prosecution, and he testified:

That Cohn "evidently took care of the books and the advertising and took care of the cash register and totaled it up at night and took care of the money; just general duties like that. * * * He would arrange credit for patients, and if they gave notes in payment for their work, he evidently took care of them and saw that those notes were paid when they became due. * * * I don't know of him ever discharging anybody, but one nurse that worked for me I know he hired her. * * *

"Q. From the observation that you had of the work that was being done and the duties performed by Mr. Cohn in that office, what was your impression as to his connection with the office? A. I thought that he must be the manager. Q. Did you participate in the profits of that office or that trust agreement? A. I did. Q. Do you know whether Mr. Cohn participated in it or not? A. I think he did, yes. Q. Do you know whether or not Mr. Cohn signed that trust agreement? A. I am pretty positive that he did, yes, sir. * * * Q. By whom was that (profit) paid to you? A. Mr. Cohn."

The accused, who appeared without counsel, testified:

"I was never led to believe that Mr. Cohn was manager. I was led to believe that Dr. Mitchell was the sole owner and trustee of that office. Now that trust agreement, I didn't sign the first trust agreement, and the second I signed. * * * I did not think I was breaking the law in any way, manner, or form."

He further testified that it was his duty "to diagnose cases and fix prices"; that Cohn did not "at any time ever fix on the amount of money that was to be charged for the work"; that his "name was on a lot of my checks. They were 'Dr. Ralph Mitchell, signed by W. M. Cohn'"; that "the conduct of the office was absolutely in Dr. Mitchell's hands; it was entirely under him"; that Cohn "would buy office supplies and dental supplies"; that Dr. Mitchell would tell Cohn "what quantity of supplies were needed; * * * I am only presuming that." While the witnesses referred to a first trust agreement and a second trust agreement, neither was offered in evidence, nor was any attempt made to prove any of the terms of either except that it appears inferentially that the agreements provided for a division of profits in which Cohn was to and did share; the basis of distribution not being shown.

[1-3] It is reasonably inferable from the evidence that Cohn was credit and advertising manager, that he superintended the laboratory to the extent of seeing "that the work went out on time," that he purchased dental and office supplies, though it does not appear that he determined the grade or character of supplies to be ordered, and that he participated in the profits. The statement of a witness that "I thought he was the manager," being a mere opinion, is entitled to no greater weight than the facts to which the witness testified and upon which the opinion was based. Likewise, the hearsay testimony to the effect that the cashier said that Cohn was manager is of no greater value than the facts to which she testified as a witness for the prosecution. Whether Cohn was manager and of what he was manager must be determined by the duties he performed, or was authorized to perform, and not by what his position was called, and on principles not unlike those which govern in the determination of whether a position or employment is a public office. In Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 186, 201 P. 120, 123, in discussing the meaning of the words "public office," it is said:

"Its definition and application depend not upon what the particular office in question may be called, nor upon what a statute may call it, but upon the power granted and wielded, the duties and functions performed and other circumstances which manifest the true character of the position and make and mark it a public office, irrespective of its formal designation."

[4] It fairly appears from the evidence that Cohn had charge of the purely business end of the dental office in question, except that of fixing prices for work, but there is no evidence that he had or exercised the slightest control or direction of the professional work performed in such office. There is an entire absence of evidence to show that such office was "managed and conducted by the said W. M. Cohn" as charged in the accusation. To manage a place of business is to exercise, to some extent at least, control or direction thereof. Gordon v. Industrial Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 420, 426, 249 P. 849; E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 180, 190, 193 P. 105, 16 A. L. R. 611. Section 11 of the statute under which the prosecution was had provides:

"Any person shall be understood to be practicing dentistry within the meaning of this act * * * who manages or conducts as manager, proprietor, conductor, or otherwise a place where dental operations are performed." Stats. 1921, p. 236.

[5, 6] This does not mean, of course, that one who merely manages a building or a room in which licensed dentists perform dental operations is practicing dentistry. A reasonable construction of the quoted provisions of the statute appears to be that, to come within the terms thereof, one must in some manner, to some extent, directly or indirectly, control or direct some professional service of the kind that dentists are licensed to render. To take charge of the advertising, the arrangement with patients for credit, the accounting and collection department, the purchase of supplies as directed, and to see that the laboratory work is promptly delivered, do not, singly or collectively, call for any of the professional skill required of a dentist but rather that of one trained in business transactions. Had it been shown that Cohn had authority to participate in the employment or discharge of those engaged to do professional work and the fixing of their compensation a different question would arise. The power to hire and discharge and to fix the compensation of an employee necessarily implies the power to control his work. But no such power is shown to have been given Cohn. The statute does not purport to prohibit the doing by an unlicensed person of any act which the testimony shows Cohn performed. "The ultimate purpose of the Dental Act [St. 1915, p. 698, as amended by St. 1921, p. 233] is to bring about and insure skill and proficiency in the practice of the profession in this state." Jacobs v. Board of Dental Examiners, 189 Cal. 709, 714, 209 P. 1006, 1008.

[7, 8] The terms of the trust agreement referred to by the witnesses may be such as to show that the accused and his associates were violating the law, but, in the absence of evidence thereof, the presumption is that the law has been obeyed. The statute is highly penal, and a proceeding thereunder for the revocation of a license to practice dentistry is in the nature of a criminal trial, in which all intendments are in favor of the accused. Osborne v. Baughman (Cal. App.) 259 P. 70.

[9] The evidence being insufficient to show that Cohn managed or conducted a place where dental operations were performed, the order of the respondent sustaining the charge was in excess of the power conferred upon it by the Dental Act. Garvin v. Chambers, 195 Cal. 212, 223, 232 P. 696; Osborne v. Baughman, supra.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled, and the order suspending petitioner's license to practice dentistry is annulled.

HUMPHREYS v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 3345.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

Physicians and surgeons § 11(3) — In proceeding to suspend dentist's license for aiding unlicensed person, occurrence of which defendant had no knowledge held immaterial.

In proceeding for suspension of dentist's license on ground that he aided and abetted unlicensed person, in which there was issue whether such unlicensed person was practicing dentistry, fact that such person, who was in charge of business end of dental office, instructed dentist in office what to charge in prospective case, is immaterial, where defendant had no knowledge of such occurrence.

Application by D. A. Humphreys for certiorari to review an order of the Board of Dental Examiners of California. Order annulled.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an original application for a writ of review, by which the petitioner seeks to have annulled an order of the respondent board suspending his license to practice dentistry for a period of five years.

The accusation is in substance identical with that considered in Messner v. Board of Dental Examiners, 262 P. 58, this day decided by this court. Both accusations relate to the same time and the same dental office, and both charge that W. M. Cohn, an unlicensed person, was manager thereof. The evidence is substantially the same as in the Messner Case, except that the licensed dentist referred to in that case as a witness for the prosecution testified in this case that on one occasion Cohn told him what to charge in a prospective case. This is immaterial, however, because the evidence does not show that the petitioner had any knowledge of the occurrence. Osborne v. Baughman (Cal. App.) 259 P. 70.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled, and the order suspending petitioner's license to practice dentistry is annulled.

LEACH v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3346.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1927.

Evidence ⇨595—Statement that witness does not know which of two inconsistent things are true raises no inference that either is fact.

When witness states that he does not know which of two inconsistent things are true, it cannot be inferred therefrom that either the one or the other is the fact.

Application by Roy C. Leach for certiorari to review an order of the Board of Dental Examiners of California. Order annulled.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Frank J. Burke, of Petaluma, and Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an original application for a writ of review by which petitioner seeks to have annulled an order of respondent board suspending his license to practice dentistry for a period of five years.

The accusation is, in substance, the same as those in Messner v. Board of Dental Examiners, 262 P. 58, and Humphreys v. Board of Dental Examiners, 262 P. 60, this day decided by this court. The three accusations relate to the same time and the same dental office, and all charge that W. M. Cohn, an unlicensed person, was manager thereof. The evidence herein is substantially the same as in the other cases, but, in addition thereto, a witness for the prosecution testified in this case that "there was a sign down in the entrance to the building" on which Cohn's name was listed as "superintendent" or "superintendent of the laboratory," he did not know which. If Cohn's name appeared thereon as "superintendent of the laboratory," it was consistent with the testimony given by the same witness that Cohn was in fact superintendent of the laboratory. When a witness states that he does not know which of two inconsistent things are true, it cannot be inferred therefrom that either the one or the other is the fact.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled, and the order suspending petitioner's license to practice dentistry is annulled.

87 Cal. App. 262

MASERO et al. v. BESSOLO. (Civ. 3364.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1927.

1. Judgment ⇨252(1)—Plaintiffs in equity suit to rescind deed held entitled to relief made appropriate by pleadings and testimony, regardless of relief demanded.

In equity case for rescission of deed to realty where complaint contained general prayer for relief, plaintiffs are entitled to relief made appropriate by their pleadings and testimony, irrespective of whether they were correct or incorrect as to relief which they were entitled to.

2. Judgment ⇨251(1)—Judgment fixing damages to vendor for failure of consideration may be entered under complaint for rescission and evidence showing value of property and consideration (Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

In action to rescind deed to real property in which answer was filed, and complaint alleged value of property obtained by defendant without paying therefor, value of equities in patents which defendant agreed to transfer to plaintiffs and which had not been transferred, judgment based on complaint and evidence showing value of property or consideration to be paid could have been entered, fixing damages suffered by plaintiff, under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, providing that in case where answer is filed court may grant any relief consistent with case made by complaint and embraced within issues.

3. Trial ⇨165—Trial court, on motion for nonsuit, must view case in light of every favorable presumption supporting plaintiff's claim.

On motion for nonsuit, trial court must view case in light of every favorable presumption fairly arising therefrom and inference that might arise to support plaintiff's right to relief.

4. Cancellation of instruments $\S$ 50—Testimony showing transfer of property worth \$10,000 without being paid raises inference that vendor suffered damages, as respects nonsuit.

In action to rescind deed conveying realty, held, that, as respects propriety of nonsuit, where testimony showing plaintiff transferred property worth $10,000 to others without consideration being paid therefor, inference, if not necessary, at last fairly and strongly arises that plaintiff suffered damages in such amount.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 241—Ground, not stated in motion for nonsuit, should not be considered and cannot be presented on appeal to support nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, ground not stated in motion should not have been considered by trial court and cannot be presented on appeal in support of order granting motion for nonsuit.

6. Pleading $\S$ 250—Vendor seeking rescission of deed for failure of consideration should not be nonsuited, but permitted to amend complaint where amendment would permit award of damages.

In action to rescind deed conveying property, where pleadings and testimony showed that grantor conveyed property valued at $10,000 and failed to receive consideration promised by purchaser, plaintiff, if necessary, should have been permitted to amend complaint so that he may be awarded relief consistent with evidence and pleadings, and grant of motion of nonsuit, leaving plaintiffs remediless for defendant's failure to comply with agreement, was error, though rescission of deed cannot be had for subsequent failure of purchaser to comply with agreements.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Joe H. Masero and others against W. L. Bessolo. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

John Perry Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

P. El. Greer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Judgment of nonsuit was entered in favor of the defendant in the above-entitled action begun and prosecuted by the plaintiffs for rescission of a certain deed of conveyance made and executed by the plaintiffs and delivered to the defendant, granting and conveying certain lands and premises set forth in the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The amended complaint, among other things, alleges that the plaintiffs were the owners of the land described in the complaint; that the defendant, with the intent to obtain the ownership in fee of plaintiffs' real property as described in the complaint, represented to the plaintiffs that the said W. L. Bessolo was the owner of patents covering the manufacture and sale of 38 different kinds of tools, including valuable big rotary tongs; that if the said plaintiffs would deed their real property to the defendant, the defendant would use the real property in question as a factory site for the manufacture of all of said tools, including the manufacture of said valuable big rotary tongs, and that the plaintiffs would participate in a partnership with the said defendant in such manufacture and receive equities in all of said defendant's patents covering said 38 tools, including the patent covering the said valuable big rotary tongs; that the plaintiffs, believing said representations to be true, and being induced thereby, did, on the 13th day of June, 1922, grant and convey to said defendant the property described in the complaint; that said defendant, at the time of making said representations, had no intention of carrying out the same; that the defendant has not, since the 13th day of June, 1922, assigned, sold, or transferred to the plaintiffs, or either one of them, any interest whatsoever in any partnership in said valuable big rotary tongs, or the patent therefor; that the plaintiffs have received no consideration whatever on account of the transfer of their said real estate to the defendant; that plaintiffs have offered to deliver to defendant everything of value received by the defendant, and, further, demanded a reconveyance and possession of the property covered by said deed; that the defendant has refused to reconvey said property to the plaintiffs; that the real estate involved is now, and was at the times mentioned, of the value of $10,000. The prayer of the complaint is for cancellation of the deed, and for such other and further relief as the court may deem just and equitable.

At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case defendant interposed a motion for nonsuit on the following grounds:

"Mr. Greer (Counsel for Defendant): At this time I should like to make a motion for a nonsuit based on two grounds, first, that no offer has been shown, and, second, that lack of consideration is not a sufficient ground for the cancellation or rescission of a deed of conveyance of real property" (citing a leading case decided in bank in the Supreme Court of the state of California in 1889, the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 P. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29).

Thereupon, the trial court awarded judgment of nonsuit to the defendant upon the following grounds:

"First, that no fraud has been shown; second, that lack of consideration is not sufficient ground for cancellation or rescission of a deed of conveyance of real property."

The testimony set forth in the transcript shows that, at the time of the transactions herein referred to, the plaintiffs were the owners of the premises described in the complaint; that the defendant promised and agreed to assign and deliver to the plaintiffs three equities in the 38 patents owned by him, including the patent of big rotary tongs; that the patent covering the rotary tongs was the one of value; that the value of the equities in said patent was discussed by the defendant and the plaintiffs. The testimony of the defendant as to the value of the patents is as follows: "I told them that the patent was valued at $6,000,000." The testimony further shows that each equity therein agreed to be transferred by the defendant to the plaintiffs was of the value of $3000. The testimony of the plaintiffs is to the effect that the defendant told them that the transfer of the equities to be made by them to the defendant would give them an interest in the partnership and entitle them to a participation therein; that they were to have half the profits of making the tongs. The testimony of the defendant in this particular, by question and answer, is as follows:

"Q. What did you say about participation in the partnership? A. Participation in the partnership, it is in the contract that they had made, that they would have half of the profits on making the tongs.

"Q. You were very careful to state then at that time that they only were to participate as a partner with you in the profits, and not in the patent, is that true? A. The equity and the filing of the Patent Office, it was read very carefully and it was so understood; yes, sir.

"Q. Did you say that to them? A. We talked to them—we talked about it; yes, sir."

The testimony of the plaintiffs, as stated, was to the effect that they were to participate in the partnership as well as in the profits of the making of the tongs. We take the following also from the defendant's testimony:

"Q. Didn't you say to them, before they signed this contract, that you were the owner of a patent covering the rotary tongs, and that they could manufacture and sell 100 of them as per your blueprint? A. Yes, sir; I told them that rotary tong."

That the defendant did not render to the plaintiffs, or any of them, the consideration agreed upon, is established by the defendants' own testimony, to wit:

"Q. Mr. Bessolo, did you actually transfer, at any time, to Joe H. Masero and Lina Masero, his wife, any bills of conveyance in your patents at the Clearwater factory? A. I can't answer that question.

"Q. Mr. Bessolo, did you actually and personally give any equity to Frank Zamboni or Carmellina Zamboni, his wife, as a consideration for the transfer of this 10 acres to you? A. No.

"Q. Did you see any one give Frank Zamboni and Carmellina Zamboni, his wife, this one equity that you mention? A. No."

The testimony of other witnesses established the fact that no equities, as testified to, were ever transferred by the defendant to the plaintiffs. The equities referred to in the testimony are definite interests in the patents belonging to the defendant, evidence by declaration filed in the patent office, and are and were transferable only by assignment made and filed in that office. The testimony of the plaintiffs was further to the effect that they had received no consideration whatever for the transfer to the defendant of the 10 acres of land mentioned in the complaint, and that the defendant had not retransferred said lands to the plaintiffs, or to any one of them.

[1] Upon this appeal the respondent relies simply upon the two grounds upon which the motion for nonsuit was granted, to wit, that no fraud had been shown; and that failure of consideration was not sufficient to support a judgment for cancellation or rescission of a deed of conveyance to real property. The fact that the complaint sets forth sufficient allegations, and the testimony in the record amply justifies a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiffs is unmentioned. This being an equity case, the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief made by their pleadings and the testimony, irrespective of whether they were correct or incorrect in their views as to the relief to which they were entitled. The relief to which parties may be entitled in an action for rescission is set forth in 4 California Jurisprudence, p. 797, § 29:

"In an action for cancellation, the court is not limited as to its decree by the mere offers and demands of the parties, but it may do exact justice between them all. It may decree cancellation on the basis simply of a general prayer for relief, though not on a prayer for a money judgment alone. Where the instrument is evidence of different rights or obligations, the cancellation may be as to only a part thereof, allowing the residue to stand. And where it is necessary and appropriate, the decree may take the form of a personal monetary judgment."

Other forms of the decree are set forth in the section of California Jurisprudence cited, but are not material here. The forms of relief which we have set forth are supported by numerous authorities. In the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra, the proposition of law which we have here stated is fully set forth. That action had for its purpose the setting aside of two deeds of conveyance affecting property alleged to be of the value of $10,000, at the time of the conveyance, and which had since increased to the value of $40,000. The action was based upon failure of consideration, and that the defendant had not complied with the agreements made by him. The court, after holding that failure of consideration furnished no ground for the cancellation of the deed before delivered, where the consideration related to some act to be performed in the future, said:

"Leaving out of sight the question of fraud which, as we have seen, was found against the respondent by the court below, the case cited and the one before us are identical in principle. Such a rule may work hardship in individual cases, and this may be one of the cases; but to hold that a vendee of real estate could, for a failure to pay the purchase money, repudiate his deed and recover the land would render real estate titles dangerously uncertain, and result in the most serious consequences. The judgment is not sustained by the findings. The complaint in this case and the prayer for relief were such as to entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for damages, and as his right to such recovery was not based thereupon, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with instructions to the court below to grant a new trial and allow the parties to amend their pleadings if they so desire."

The prayer in the case at bar, attached to the complaint which we have set forth, asked for any relief that might be just and equitable, but irrespective of the prayer, the defendant having answered the complaint and gone to trial, the plaintiffs were entitled to any relief shown by their testimony and supported by the pleadings. The same doctrine as set forth in Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra, is upheld in the case of Schott v. Schott, 168 Cal. 342, 143 P. 595. It is there held, quoting from the syllabus:

"As to the first parcel of land, the mother's remedy for the breach of the son's undertaking is, at most, an action for damages. Under all the circumstances, in the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, she has no right to rescind or to have the deed set aside."

In the case of James v. James, 251 P. 666, this court had before it an action prosecuted to secure the cancellation of a deed on account of the failure of the defendant to comply with certain promises involving certain acts thereafter to be performed. The plaintiff had judgment in the trial court, and that judgment was reversed in this court on the principle that under such circumstances the plaintiff was entitled only to damages.

The trial court in the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra, having before it pleadings very similar to the ones in the case at bar, took into consideration only the two grounds upon which rescission was sought, and overlooked entirely the fact that, if rescission could not be had, redress might be granted by a court of equity as the justice of the case might require. The opinion from that case which we have quoted shows that the subject of damages was not considered, and, in sending the cause back for a new trial, leave was granted to amend the pleadings so as to fully present the question of damages to the trial court. In the case at bar the judgment of the trial court leaves in the possession of the defendant title to $10,000 worth of property, without having paid any consideration therefor whatever. The real thing of value, which, according to the testimony it was agreed that the defendant should pay to the plaintiffs, was the transfer by the defendant to the plaintiffs of three equities covering an interest in the business, the profits of the business and interest in the patent to the big rotary tongs and participation in the profits of its manufacture. Section 580, Code of Civil Procedure, after setting forth the relief to which a plaintiff may be entitled in the event that the complaint is not answered, further provides:

"But in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue."

In the case of Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 193 P. 84, where a nonsuit was granted, based upon a contract that could not be enforced, the Supreme Court, in reversing the judgment of the trial court, thus states the law:

"While the contract cannot be enforced, either in law or equity, we think that the plaintiff is, nevertheless, entitled to some relief under the pleadings and evidence offered in support thereof, and that, as a consequence, the judgment of nonsuit was erroneous. There being but one form of civil action in this state, a plaintiff may recover if his complaint 'states any cause of action entitling the plaintiff to any relief at law or in equity.' Hayden v. Collins, 1 Cal. App. 259, 261, 81 P. 1120. It is not essential that a complaint state a cause of action for the relief which plaintiff seeks, provided the facts stated show some right of recovery, and a party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have misconceived the form of relief to which he is entitled" (citing Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 P. 673; Rogers v. Duhart, 97 Cal. 500, 32 P. 570; Brown v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation Dist., 183 Cal. 186, 190 P. 797).

Likewise, in Nathan v. Dierssen, 164 Cal. 607, 130 P. 12, in an action for recovery of rents, issues, and profits, where restitution of the premises was not sought, a judgment of restitution was awarded, the court saying:

"The complaint contains every allegation necessary in an action of ejectment. It alleges ownership in plaintiff, that defendant wrongfully entered and dispossessed him and that he still keeps him out of possession. No further averment was required" (citing authorities). "There was, therefore, a statement of every fact necessary to entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for possession of the premises, together with the facts essential to a demand for rents and profits. It is true that the complaint contains no prayer for the restitution of the premises. If the defendant had defaulted, judgment for such possession could not properly have been rendered, but when an answer has been filed and issues raised, the court may grant plaintiff any relief 'consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issues'" (citing a number of authorities).

[2] An answer having been filed in the case at bar, the fact that the complaint alleges the value of the property obtained by the defendant without paying therefor, the value of the three equities which the defendant had agreed to transfer to the plaintiffs, and which he had not transferred, judgment in damages, based upon the complaint and the evidence showing the value of the property or consideration to be paid, could have been entered fixing damages suffered by the plaintiffs by reason of the failure of the defendant to comply with his promise or agreements.

[3, 4] In overlooking the question of damages the trial court, in granting a judgment of nonsuit, virtually placed the plaintiffs in a position where they are left absolutely remediless for all the wrongs suffered by them through the failure of the defendant to comply with his agreement. That wrong consists in there being transferred from the plaintiffs to the defendant real property of the value of $10,000 or thereabouts, without consideration. In considering the evidence in this case, all of which is along the line of excerpts which we have set forth in this opinion, it was the duty of the trial court, upon a motion for nonsuit, to view it in the light of every favorable presumption fairly arising therefrom or inference that might arise therefrom to support the plaintiffs' right to relief. Thus, the testimony showing that property worth $10,000 had been transferred by the plaintiffs to the defendant without consideration being paid therefor, the inference, if not necessarily, at least very fairly, and we may say strongly, arises that the plaintiffs have suffered damages in just that sum. The rules in relation to inferences and as to how testimony should be viewed upon a motion for nonsuit are set forth in the following excerpts which we take from the case of Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 443, 213 P. 45:

"Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence adduced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiffs. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may be reasonably made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiffs. If contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252. The plaintiff must also be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments, and such evidence must be weighed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs' claim. * * * The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and if the plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, the motion, if made upon the close of the case, should be denied" (citing a number of authorities).

Other California cases might be cited supporting this rule, but it is too firmly established to require further citation.

[5] Our attention is also called to the fact that the nonsuit in this case was granted partly upon grounds not stated in the motion, and the ruling of the court in this particular is presented to us as an additional reason for ordering a new trial herein. The order granting the nonsuit was based upon two grounds, as we have stated, to wit, first, that no fraudulent representations were shown; second, that cancellation of a deed could not be had for subsequent failure of consideration. The first ground herein stated was not included in the motion and should not have been considered by the court. In Moore v. Moffatt, 188 Cal. 1, 204 P. 220, in considering the question of granting a motion for nonsuit on grounds not stated, the court held as follows:

"It was a defect in the plaintiff's case which might have been remedied had attention been called to it by the motion for nonsuit, and, inasmuch as it was not made a ground for the motion for a nonsuit, it could not, upon that motion, be considered by the trial court, nor can it, for the same reason, be considered by this court in determining the merits of the motion."

A large number of cases supporting this statement are set forth on page 5 of the opinion in the case from which we are quoting. 204 P. 222, 223. The law on this subject is well stated in 9 California Jurisprudence, 548, § 33:

"It is therefore settled law that a motion for a nonsuit must point the attention of the court and counsel to the precise grounds upon which it is made" (citing, in footnotes, a large number of cases).

For the reasons which we have heretofore stated, however, we do not need to inquire whether this error of the court was of such a prejudicial character as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment, as the cause must go back for retrial for other reasons, and as the alleged failure of proof to support rescission or cancellation on the charge of fraudulent misrepresentations, as not presented to the trial court, and therefore cannot be presented here, in support of the order granting the motion for nonsuit, we will not consider that subject, further than to state that an examination of the complaint discloses apparent defects that should be remedied by proper amendments in order to properly tender the issue of fraud, and the omissions in the evidence may doubtless be supplied by proper inquiry of the different witnesses. The essential averments alleging fraud that should be in the complaint, and which are wanting here, are fully set forth in 12 California Jurisprudence, 806, § 64, and the authorities there cited, and also in the recent case of B. G. Towels et al. v. Jesse Campbell et al., 204 Ky. 591, 264 S. W. 1107, and reported in 50 A. L. R. 175.

[6] While agreeing with the trial court that the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra, and the subsequent cases following the same rule established the law in this state that rescission of a deed to real estate cannot be had on account of the subsequent failure of the grantee to comply with his agreements, we are nevertheless of the opinion that upon the case made, as presented by the transcript, the trial court should have followed all, instead of a part of the holding had in the Lawrence-Gayetty Case, and directed an amendment of the complaint, and then proceeded to award the plaintiffs the relief to which the evidence showed them to be entitled.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is hereby directed to allow the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, if so advised, so as to present all the issues which may be properly tendered and tried in this case, to the intent that the plaintiffs may be awarded such relief as may be consonant with equity and justice.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

87 Cal. App. 272

AZARELLO et al. v. BESSOLO. (Civ. 3365.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1927.

1. Deeds ☞188—Complaint not alleging purchaser's representations were untrue, or intention not to perform, was insufficient for cancellation of deed for fraud.

Complaint for rescission of deed to real property on ground of fraud failing to allege that representations made by purchaser to vendor were untrue, or that purchaser had no intention of performing material promises referred to in complaint, though alleging that vendor relied on representations or promises of purchaser, but not alleging that vendor was otherwise deceived, failed to state cause of action for cancellation for fraud.

2. Pleading ☞237(6)—Complaint to rescind conveyance for failure of consideration held not material variance from testimony showing damages requiring allowance of amendment to conform to proof (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470).

Complaint alleging transfer by plaintiffs of property to defendant valued at $14,500, for which defendant was to transfer equities in patents, but that no such transfer was made, set forth action for damages at least in amount of value of equities in patents to have been transferred to plaintiffs, and hence there was no material variance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, between testimony showing such damage and complaint, though seeking rescission of conveyance, and court should have directed finding in accordance with evidence or order amendment, under section 470, to conform to proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Savatore Azarello and others against W. L. Bessolo. To review a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John Perry Wood, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

P. E. Greer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiffs for rescission of deed to real estate based upon fraud and failure of consideration. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case judgment of nonsuit was entered, and the plaintiffs appeal.

In all essential particulars this is a companion case to that of Masero et al., Plaintiffs and Appellants, v. W. L. Bessolo, Defendant and Respondent, in action Civil No. 3364 (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 61, this day decided by this court. All the authorities cited in that case are pertinent here, save and except as to those relating to the court granting a nonsuit for reasons not stated in the motion therefor.

The complaint in this action involves 23 acres of land situate in the same vicinity as the 10 acres of real estate involved in action Civil No. 3364, and was to be used by the defendant for the same purposes. In the complaint herein it is set forth, among other things, that the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that, if the plaintiffs would transfer to the defendant said 23 acres of real property, the defendant would transfer to the plaintiffs the equities valued at $9,000 in 38 patents, including a patent covering the valuable oil tongs manufactured by the defendant, and in addition thereto would pay the plaintiffs the sum of $14,500. Thereupon, and about the 14th day of June, 1922, the plaintiffs entered into a contract agreeing to convey to the defendant the 23 acres of land. Thereafter and on or about the 15th day of November, 1922, it is alleged that the defendant represented to the plaintiffs, and stated to them, that the land had increased somewhat in value on account of the good prospect for oil therein, and used this language:

"This land has gone up, and there is a good chance for oil there; if you will deed me an undivided one-half interest in the land covered by the option, and keep the equities, I will not pay you the $14,500, and you can keep your one-half of the land, and you will still have your interest in the oil tongs and all the patents and tools."

Thereupon, and on the 16th day of November, 1922, the plaintiffs executed and delivered to the defendant a deed conveying a one-half interest in and to the real property herein referred to. The complaint then alleges:

"That the defendant has not, since the 16th day of November, 1922, or at any other time, assigned, sold or transferred to the plaintiffs, or either or any of them, any interest whatever in said valuable big rotary tongs, although the said defendant is now manufacturing and selling said big rotary tongs to the oil trade of California."

It is further alleged that the plaintiffs have received no benefit, financial or otherwise, for the real property transferred to the defendant, save and except that the defendant has transferred to the plaintiffs certain alleged equities in patents obtained by him not covering the oil tongs referred to. The complaint further shows that the defendant had not filed in the office of the Commissioner of Patents of the United States any declaration dividing the equities in said oil tongs, as represented by him, but that the declaration so filed covered other and different tools patented by the defendant. The prayer of the complaint was that the deed conveying the real estate to the defendant be canceled, and that the plaintiffs have such other and further relief as to the court might seem meet and just. The transcript sets forth, in substance, the same testimony from which we have taken excerpts as set forth in action Civil No. 3364, and in addition thereto we here set forth the following (testimony of defendant Bessolo):

"Q. What did you say, Mr. Bessolo? A. I told him that I was willing to take the land at that price that was spoken about, $14,500, and one equity, and he says, 'No,' he says, 'there will be one equity each, or none at all.' He says 'I will take one equity, and Sal take one equity, and Cira take one equity.'

"Q. What did you say? A. Well, we had quite a long conversation, as Italians generally do, and afterwards we agreed upon it.

"Q. What did you say you would give him an interest in, in reference to your oil tongs and 38 patents? A. There never was 38 patents mentioned.

"Q. What did you say about your patents? A. I told him that we were going to manufacture, in fact, we were at that time already manufacturing the tongs. But regarding patent or any 38 patents, there was never any conversation.

"Q. Did you tell him that you had a patent on a rotary tongs? A. No, sir; they all knew that—I told everybody I was trying to take a patent, although it was disclosed into the equity system patent.

"Q. Didn't you tell him that the oil rotary tongs was included in all the patents you owned, and that he would get an interest in that? A. I told him that every equity holder would participate in all those tools that we were manufacturing.

"Q. Didn't you state and demonstrate at that time to him the rotary oil tongs as a part of them? A. We demonstrated that."

Further on, as to the value of the equities, the witness testified:

"What did he say? A. He said that was all right with him, one equity each, for which I told him that they were worth $3,000 each."

In answer to a question by the court, of the defendant, as to the profits in the manufacture of oil tongs, the defendant replied that the profits were about $40,000, and that at no time had the plaintiffs received any part thereof. The testimony of the plaintiffs is substantially to the effect that the defendant represented that the equities which he was conveying to them included equities in the patent issued covering the rotary oil tongs, and that they were to participate in the profits of the business of manufacturing all of the tools, included in any and all of the patents. As stated, at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' testimony, the court granted the defendant's motion for nonsuit on the two grounds mentioned, and in its opinion granting a nonsuit summarized the testimony shown by the transcript, which we will use as being a correct statement thereof, and as testified to by the defendant, to wit:

"His testimony simply amounts to this, that he (the defendant) told these people that if they would give him a deed to this property, in the first instance, he would make them a partner, each of them a partner, and give them an interest in each of these patents, including the oil tong. * * * Then, later, when it came to the question of cancellation of the agreement (referring to the whole title of the 23 acres of land), he (the defendant) said to them that it appeared to have prospects of being oil land, and in view of that fact, why not release him from his obligation to pay the $14,500 and keep a half interest in the land, which would entitle them to retain their interest in the patent, and also their interest in the oil, if any was produced."

Zamboni's testimony was as follows:

"Bessolo said, 'I will give you an equity apiece, $3,000, and then pay you the balance as it becomes due.'"

Campagna said:

"If those are the conditions that I am to receive that royalty and the profits and part of the patent, I will be glad to make the transfer. * * * Relying upon that" (referring to the statements of the defendant, "they" (the plaintiffs) "deeded a half interest in this land.")

The court then further says:

"I am satisfied that these people have an action against Bessolo requiring him to assign to them not only an interest in these profits, but an interest in these patents, and they are entitled to an accounting. As equity holders, they are entitled to an accounting to compel him to account to them for their portion of what has been received out of the profits of the tongs. I do not think there is any doubt at all about that, and if that were before me, that would be the way I would hold under the present condition of the evidence in this case."

The court then, upon authority of Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 P. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29, granted the defendant's motion for nonsuit.

[1, 2] In addition to the fact that the court did not take into consideration that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages in a sum equal at least to the value of the equities as stated by the defendant and agreed to be transferred by the defendant to the plaintiffs, it is further urged upon this appeal that the evidence makes out a case warranting cancellation upon the grounds of fraud, to wit, misrepresentation. While the testimony as summarized by the trial court, and which we have set forth very briefly, does show that the plaintiffs are entitled to relief, the complaint in this action, as we read it, is almost silent with reference to the essential allegations necessary to justify a rescission on the grounds of fraud. There is no allegation in the complaint that the representations made by the defendant to the plaintiffs were untrue. There is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant had no intention of performing the material promises referred to in the complaint. There is an allegation in the complaint that the plaintiffs relied upon the representations or promises of the defendant, but there is no allegation that they were in any wise deceived. Other shortcomings of the complaint might be mentioned, but the foregoing are sufficient to show its essential deficiencies. While the complaint was one for rescission, it nevertheless did set forth an action entitling the plaintiffs to relief. The trial court particularly expressed the relief to which the plaintiffs were entitled, as shown by the testimony, and a consideration of the summary of the complaint which we have set forth herein discloses practically every essential allegation to show damages suffered by the plaintiffs in at least the sum of $9,000, the value of the equities covering the patent to the rotary tongs agreed to be transferred and assigned by the defendant to the plaintiffs. Thus, there was no material variance between the allegations of the complaint and the testimony, even though the plaintiffs were seeking rescission. The allegations of the complaint showed the plaintiffs' damages, and the testimony likewise establishes such damages. Thus, section 469, Code of Civil Procedure, applies, wherein it is stated:

"No variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense, upon the merits."

Therefore, the court should have followed section 470, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

"Where the variance is not material, as provided in the last section, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, or may order an immediate amendment, without costs."

The essential averments alleging fraud that should be in the complaint, and which are wanting here, are fully set forth in 12 California Jurisprudence, 806, § 64, and the authorities there cited, and also in the recent case of B. G. Towels et al. v. Jesse Campbell et al., 204 Ky. 591, 264 S. W. 1107, and reported in 50 A. L. R. 175.

Upon the case thus made the court should have followed the latter portion of the rule laid down in the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra, and supported by the case of Schott v. Schott, 168 Cal. 342, 143 P. 595, and James v. James (Cal. App.) 251 P. 666, and, instead of granting a nonsuit, denied the same, with permission or direction to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint to conform to the proofs.

In view of what has been said in this opinion, and in the opinion deciding the companion case of Masero v. Bessolo, it would serve no useful purpose to enter into a consideration of the testimony establishing fraud, as claimed by the appellant, for the simple reason that reversal could not be had upon that ground by reason of the deficiencies of the complaint, and for the further reason that upon a retrial, which must be ordered upon other grounds, the deficiencies in the testimony may be supplied by questions propounded and based upon what we have said should be in the complaint to sustain rescission on account of fraudulent misrepresentations. This being an action in equity, and the case stated showing that the plaintiffs are entitled to relief, either by way of damages or by way of an accounting and judgment for their share in the profits, and that the motion for nonsuit was granted notwithstanding such facts, it is hereby ordered that the judgment be and the same is hereby reversed, and the trial court further directed to permit the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, if so advised, so as to enable the plaintiffs to obtain such relief as the testimony may show them to be entitled.

LIBBY v. KIPP. (Civ. 3387.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. Dec. 13, 1927.

1. Attorney and client $\S$ 169—In suit for attorney's fees, trial court's allowance is conclusive, where not so excessive as to shock conscience of appellate court.

In suit for attorney's fees, trial court's judgment for plaintiff is conclusive, where not so plainly excessive as to shock conscience of appellate court, regardless of whether appellate court, if deciding matter in first instance, would have allowed compensation in a materially reduced sum.

2. Evidence $\S$ 523, 571(7)—Expert opinions are admissible as to value of attorney's services, but are not conclusive; question being finally for trial court.

In suit for attorney's fees, expert opinions are admissible as to value of services, but they are not conclusive, and the question is eventually one for the sound judgment of the trial court.

3. Attorney and client ☞169—Appeal from judgment for plaintiff in suit for attorney's fees cannot be converted into trial de novo.

In suit for attorney's fees, appeal from judgment for plaintiff cannot be converted into a trial de novo.

4. Attorney and client ☞141—In suit for attorney's fees for looking after widow's property interests, evidence held not to show trial court's allowance of $11,000 to be so excessive as to justify reversal.

In suit for attorney's fees for services in looking after widow's property interests, which necessitated consideration of several important legal questions, and involved a saving to her of $75,000, evidence held not to show that trial court's allowance of $11,000 was so excessive as to justify reversal on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action for attorney's fees by Frank A. Libby against Ida Belle Kipp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. Joseph Ford and Robert A. Jarrott, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. As the assignee of Frank G. Tyrrell, attorney at law, the plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $10,545.89 as attorney's fees and costs. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The record in this case shows: That for some years prior to the 6th day of March, 1923, the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, had been the wife of Bernhardt A. Kipp. That on the 6th day of March, 1923, Bernhardt A. Kipp died at the city and county of Los Angeles, leaving him surviving, as his widow, the defendant in this action. The record further shows: That Bernhardt A. Kipp and the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, contracted the relationship of husband and wife at a time when Bernhardt A. Kipp was well advanced in life and had accumulated an estate valued somewhere in the neighborhood of $500,000. That, just preceding the marriage of the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, and Bernhardt A. Kipp, a prenuptial agreement was entered into between said persons, by virtue of which the said Ida Belle Kipp relinquished all claim of whatsoever character against the estate or property of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp, including all right to dower and right to inherit, as surviving widow. This agreement was entered into in consideration of the said Ida Belle Kipp receiving from the estate of said deceased, upon his death, the sum of $25,000. This sum was to be in lieu of any property rights which she might have or otherwise be entitled to as his widow. A will subsequently executed by the said Bernhardt A. Kipp provided for the payment to the defendant of an additional sum of $3,000 per year. During the time the defendant and the said Bernhardt A. Kipp were living together as husband and wife in the city of Los Angeles, the said Bernhardt A. Kipp had, in taking title to what is called the home place, occupied by said parties, procured the title in the name of himself and the said Ida Belle Kipp, as joint tenants, with the right of survivorship. In addition to this, the said Bernhardt A. Kipp had registered under the Torrens Act, as community property of himself and his wife, about $40,000 worth of property. So far as our attention has been called to anything in the record, Bernhardt A. Kipp died childless. On the 17th day of February, 1923, Bernhardt A. Kipp and his wife, Ida Belle Kipp, entered into an escrow agreement with William Bauermeister and his wife, whereby it was agreed that the said Bernhardt A. Kipp and his wife would transfer to the said William Bauermeister and his wife certain property situate on Elden street, in the city of Los Angeles, estimated to be worth the sum of $22,000, and pay the additional sum of $53,000, in consideration of which the said Bauermeister and his wife agreed to transfer to the said Bernhardt A. Kipp and Ida Belle Kipp, as joint tenants, a certain apartment building in the city of Los Angeles known as the La Rae Apartments, to Bernhardt A. Kipp. The deeds as executed by the respective parties pertaining to the transfer of the properties just above mentioned, together with the escrow agreement, were deposited with the Westlake Branch of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank in the city of Los Angeles. The time limited in the escrow agreement for the completion of the transfer of said properties and the payment of the sum above mentioned was 30 days. Thus over one-half of the time limited for the completion of the transfer of the properties above mentioned had expired. The building on Elden street above referred to was a part of the separate property of Bernhardt A. Kipp, and the $53,000 additional to be paid by the Kipps to the Bauermeisters was to be paid out of the separate property of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp. In order to enable him to make the payment in the sum of $53,000 to carry out his contract with Bauermeister, the said Bernhardt A. Kipp had directed his brother, Frank Kipp, who lived in Milwaukee, to collect the sum of $75,000, which was due the said Bernhardt A. Kipp from certain parties owing him that sum in the city of Milwaukee, and to deposit the same in a Milwaukee bank to the credit of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp. It appears, however, that the said Frank Kipp collected the money upon the mortgages, as requested, but deposited the money in a Milwaukee bank in his own name.

After the death of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp on the 6th day of March, 1923, as aforesaid, his widow, the defendant herein, Ida Belle Kipp, consulted attorneys Ralph W. Pontius and Frank G. Tyrrell, having offices in the Washington building in the city of Los Angeles, and retained said attorneys in the matter of looking after her property interests. The exact language of the conversation that took place between the defendant and the said attorneys relative to the retention of their services is not set forth, and there is a conflict in the testimony as to just what services the attorneys were to perform. However, the matter of securing title to the La Rae Apartments, the obtaining of an additional $53,000 from the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, the matter of perfecting her title to the home place and her interest in the community property appear to have been mentioned. The securing of the title to the apartments and the funds to carry out the escrow agreement and to keep the same alive until it could be completed was the principal subject of consideration. It also appears that the said Bernhardt A. Kipp, by his will, disposed of his property in trust, this trust to be administered principally in the city of Milwaukee, state of Wisconsin. The widow, the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, was not named as one of the trustees in the will just referred to, nor was she named as an executrix of the estate. Shortly after the death of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp, Frank G. Tyrrell, acting as the attorney of Ida Belle Kipp, filed a petition for special letters of administration upon the estate of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, upon the hearing of which petition such letters were granted to the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, and immediately thereafter a draft was drawn for the sum of $75,000 upon the money collected by the said Frank A. Kipp, as directed by the said Bernhardt A. Kipp, and at that time supposed to be deposited in bank in the city of Milwaukee, in the name of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp. There being no money in the name of Bernhardt A. Kipp in bank in the city of Milwaukee upon which the draft was drawn, by reason of the fact that the money had not been deposited by the said Frank A. Kipp, as directed, the draft was returned unpaid and no money was immediately available for the payment of the sum of $53,000 in order to carry out the terms of the agreement with the Bauermeisters. Thereafter, and before the prenuptial agreement had been examined by Mr. Tyrrell, an application was made to the court for a widow's allowance and an allowance of $1,500 per month ordered by the court. This order was subsequently vacated. The record shows considerable negotiation between Mr. Tyrrell, representing the defendant, Mr. Bauermeister and the attorney representing Mr. Bauermeister relative to keeping alive the escrow agreement, and that in order to secure an extension of time and to permit the same to run until the money could be obtained to comply with the agreement, a bonus of something over $3,000 was paid by the defendant to Mr. Bauermeister. That in carrying out the agreement with Bauermeister, and before the money was obtained from the estate, the defendant borrowed something like $16,000. That in obtaining the loan of said moneys, Mr. Tyrrell rendered some assistance and did secure an advance payment of some $5,000 on the loan.

It further appears that when Frank A. Kipp came to Los Angeles he was somewhat put out by reason of the action taken by Ida Belle Kipp, and through his attorneys sued out an injunction against Ida Belle Kipp to prevent her from collecting or disposing of any of the moneys of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, and also proceedings were taken to obtain an inspection of the escrow agreement and the papers pertaining thereto placed in the hands of the bank hereinbefore named. It also appears that, during the course of the administration of the estate, M. Mr. Tyrrell, acting in behalf of the defendant, filed a petition in behalf of Mr. Bauermeister under the provisions of section 1597 of the Code of Civil Procedure, asking for specific performance of the escrow agreement on the part of the trustees of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, and also a like petition in behalf of the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp. In due course of time these petitions came on for hearing, and at the hearing, at least formal opposition was made by the trustees of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased. The hearing occupied, as stated by appellant, about one hour and a half. So far as the transcript shows, it would appear that the testimony taken upon this hearing related principally to identifying the signatures of the parties to the respective instruments, and the terms of the escrow agreement and the amount of money to be paid by Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, to Mr. Bauermeister in order to comply with the terms and provisions of the escrow agreement. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court made an order directing the trustees of the estate to pay over the sum of $53,380, in pursuance of which the record shows that the trustees of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp thereafter did turn over to the escrow holder said sum of money; this being paid on or about the 10th day of October, 1923. It may be here stated that the trustees of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, after making of the two orders above mentioned, took an appeal to the Supreme Court from these orders, which appeals were dismissed prior to the 10th day of October, 1923. At the time the orders were made and subsequently thereto, it appears, at least from the statements of the attorneys representing the trustees, that all that was desired was that the trustees of the estate of said deceased would be protected from liability on account of such payment, and that the orders of the court should be so made as to afford protection to the trustees. Upon the settlement of the account of the defendant as special administrator, attorney's fees were allowed in the sum of $500, and the same were paid, and are not taken into consideration in this action. Proceedings were also taken by Mr. Tyrrell in behalf of the defendant, under the provisions of section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in order to obtain a decree adjudging termination of the estate and interest of the said Bernhardt A. Kipp in and to the home place heretofore referred to which was held by the said Bernhardt A. Kipp and Ida Belle Kipp as joint tenants with the right of survivorship. Some other proceedings were taken upon a citation directed to the trustees, to show cause why they should not be removed from their trusteeship. This proceeding, however, was dismissed. After these proceedings had been taken and had, it appears from the transcript that the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, wrote to her attorneys, Pontius and Tyrrell, notifying them that she no longer desired their services. However, no substitution of attorneys was ever made. Mr. Tyrrell, who was the attorney of record in all these proceedings, then made out his bill for services rendered in behalf of the defendant in matters pertaining to the properties which we have mentioned in the sum of $11,000, giving credit to the defendant for the sum of $500, paid as aforesaid, leaving due as attorney's fees the sum of $10,500, and also the further sum of $45.89 paid out as costs advanced in the course of the proceedings referred to. Payment being declined by the defendant, assignment of the account was made to the plaintiff herein, and this action begun for the collection of the same.

[1] It is contended upon this appeal that the allowance of fees in the sum named by the trial court is exorbitant and is so grossly excessive that this court should interfere and either reverse the judgment or modify the same. It is perhaps difficult to conceive of any record that could be presented to the appellate court which would give less light upon the subject to be determined than a transcript relating to the fees or compensation that should be awarded for professional services, for the simple reason that only a few pages of testimony or a few simple statements contained in the record may be necessary to state the proceedings taken and had so far as the court records are concerned, whereas the time required to ascertain and determine the proceedings that should be taken or the skill required to determine the proper proceedings to be taken are the real elements which enter into the value of the services for which compensation is properly awarded, cannot be placed upon, and never do appear on a typewritten or printed page. It is for this reason that the matter of awarding compensation for professional services, when that service is rendered by an attorney, is left, to so great a degree, in the judicial discretion of the trial court, so much so that, unless the sum allowed is plainly and palpably exorbitant and such as shocks the conscience of an appellate court, the determination of the trial court will not be disturbed. It is not sufficient that the transcript, as read by an appellate court, discloses a case from which, if the court of appeal were to decide the matter in the first instance it would only allow compensation in a materially reduced sum. There is nothing in the record that shows any prejudice or bias on the part of the trial court, or that the trial court did not conscientiously endeavor to ascertain the compensation that should be justly awarded for the services rendered by the attorneys involved in this action for the defendant Ida Belle Kipp.

While the testimony does not show, as we have stated, that the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, gave any specific directions to Mr. Tyrrell or to Mr. Pontius, to examine into either the prenuptial agreement or the will of the deceased, creating a trust to be administered in the city of Milwaukee it is nevertheless apparent that an attorney, in order to ascertain just what rights the widow had in the matter, and how to proceed in relation to securing compliance with the escrow agreement which we have herein referred to, and to have the title of the La Rae Apartments vested in the widow, would necessarily desire to acquaint himself fully with every instrument affecting the estate of the deceased in order that he might be in a position to take advantage of any defect therein, to the intent that parties representing opposing interests might be induced to accede to a fair, advantageous, and perhaps a liberal settlement of property upon the widow, in order to avoid a contest such as might be instituted to set aside the prenuptial agreement, especially in view of the fact that it provided for a payment of $25,000 out of the estate of the deceased after his death, and was not an advance payment of any sum, at a time when neither the deceased nor his estate was under any obligations to the defendant. On the face of it, it would appear that the widow had, in consideration of the sum of $25,000, to be paid out of the estate Bernhardt A. Kipp, after his death, relinquished all claim to the decedent's estate valued, as shown by the record, at the sum of about one-half million dollars. We may here state the record does disclose that Mr. Pontius drew the will creating the trust for Bernhardt A. Kipp, but the record does not show that either Mr. Pontius or Mr. Tyrrell knew anything about the prenuptial agreement entered into between the deceased and the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, who, after the death of Bernhardt A. Kipp, became their client. And if the prenuptial agreement contained terms and provisions which were subject to doubt, and in the light of which the will executed by the deceased might be open to litigation, it was the duty of Mr. Tyrrell or Mr. Pontius to investigate the subject thoroughly, even though the widow did not desire to contest either the prenuptial agreement or the will creating the trust. It of course required no great consideration to determine that Mr. Bauermeister had a right to petition, under section 1597 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for an order directing the trustees of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, to comply with the escrow agreement and pay over to him or to the persons to whom the sum of money was directed to be paid for his benefit by the said Bernhardt A. Kipp to complete the portion of the agreement that was to be carried into execution by said deceased, but there was a serious question as to where the title would be vested to the La Rae Apartments when the deed placed in escrow by Mr. Bauermeister and his wife, purporting to convey the La Rae Apartments to Bernhardt A. Kipp and the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, as joint tenants, with the right of survivorship, should be delivered. Would that title be vested absolutely in the defendant, or would she take that title, as a tenant, of an undivided one-half interest therein and as holding an undivided one-half interest therein as trustee for those entitled to take under the will of the deceased?

The general rule in relation to escrows is that a deed does not transfer title, or that an instrument does not take effect, until the contingency has occurred which entitles the grantee to a delivery of the instrument. This rule is obviated to some extent by the fiction of law whereby a subsequent delivery is held to relate back. The rule also is that, where a valid escrow agreement has been entered into, the death of one of the parties does not invalidate the agreement, and the other party has a right to insist upon its performance. As the matter is not before us, we express no opinion as to the title that would or could have come to the defendant in this case by the payment of $53,380 to Mr. Bauermeister by the trustees of the estate of Bernhardt A. Kipp, deceased, if the question of the title that would have been required under the deed delivered after the death of Bernhardt A. Kipp which purported to convey to him and to the defendant, Ida Belle Kipp, a joint estate with the right of survivorship, had been contested. It is sufficient to say that the circumstances which we have detailed required careful, as well as skillful, consideration, procedure, and management in order that the title to the property valued at $75,000 should be vested in the defendant. The circumstances upon their face show that the results attained actually removed from the separate property of the estate of the deceased and vested in the defendant property of the value above stated. While the record does not show many appearances in court, and it is not indicated that the time consumed in hearing any of the motions or proceedings presented to, or taken, and had in the courts, occupied any considerable period or even amounted to more than formal hearings, such as the necessary identification of signatures and an exhibit of the various instruments relating to the property involved, there is, however, testimony to the effect that a considerable portion of counsel's time was devoted to the consideration of the rights of the defendant in and to the property mentioned, almost daily for a number of months.
